Yama, Vayu, Mrityu, the Patalas, the equine mouth, Badavamukha, that roves through the ocean, vomiting ceaseless flames, the sharpness of the razor, virulent poison, the snake, and fire—all these exist together in women. That eternal Brahman from where the five great elements have sprung into existence, from where the Creator Brahma ordained the universe, and whence, indeed, men have sprung, verily, from the same eternal source have women sprung into existence. At that same time, O Narada, when women were created, these faults that I have enumerated were planted in them.'"

CANTO 39

Yudhishtira says, ‘All men, O king, in this world, are seen to attach themselves to women, overcome by the illusion that is created by the Divine Being. Similarly, women too, are seen to attach themselves to men.

This happens all over the world. On this subject a question exists in my mind. Why, O delighter of the Kurus, when women are stained with so many faults, do men still attach themselves to them? Who, again, are those men with whom women are most pleased and who are they with whom they are not? Pitamaha, explain to me how men can protect women. While men take pleasure in women and sport with them, women, it seems, are engaged in deceiving men.

Then, again, if a man once falls into their hands, it is difficult for him to escape. Like cows ever seeking fresh pastures, women seek new men, one after another. That maya which the Asura Sambara possessed, the Asura Namuchi, Bali or Kumbhinasi, the sum of all those is possessed by women.

If men laugh, women laugh. If man weeps, they weep. If the time requires, they receive the man that is disagreeable to them with agreeable words. The neeti which Sukra, the preceptor of the Asuras, and the Devaguru Brihaspati knew, cannot be regarded as being deeper or more distinguished for its subtlety than what woman’s intelligence naturally brings forth. How can women, then, be restrained by men? They make a lie appear as truth, and a truth appear as a lie. They who can do this, I ask, O Kshatriya, how can they be ruled by those of the other sex?

It seems to me that Brihaspati and other great thinkers, O slayer of foes, evolved the science of policy from observing women. Whether treated by men with respect or with disdain, women are seen to turn the heads and agitate the hearts of men.

Living creatures, O Mahabaho, are naturally virtuous. This is what has been heard; hence how can this be consistent with fact? For treated with affection and respect, or otherwise, women are seen to deserve censure for their wanton conduct towards men.

Great doubts fill my mind: when such is their very nature, how can men restrain them within the bounds of dharma? Tell me this, O most blessed scion of Kuru's race! It becomes you to tell me whether women can at all be restrained within the bounds prescribed by the scriptures or if anyone before our time did succeed in so restraining them.'

Bhishma says, 'It is even so as you say, mighty one, and there is nothing untrue in all that you say. You are truly a scion of Kuru's vamsa, and on the subject of women, I will narrate the old story of how, in yesteryears, the noble Vipula succeeded in restraining women within the bounds laid down for them. I will also tell you, O king, how women were created by the Grandsire Brahma and the object for which they were created.

There is no creature more sinful, O son, than woman. Woman is a blazing fire, an illusion that the Daitya Maya created. She is the sharp edge of the razor, poison, a snake and fire; and verily, all these together. I have heard that, once, all the human race was distinguished by dharma, and that, in course of natural evolution, they attained the status of gods. This alarmed the Devas. They, Parantapa, went together to the Pitamaha, and, heads bowed in reverence, told him what troubled them, and then stood silent in his presence, with eyes cast down. The mighty Grandsire, having ascertained what was in the hearts of the Devas, created women, using an Atharvan rite. In a former creation, son of Kunti, all women were virtuous.

Those, however, that sprang from this new creation of Brahma's, using an illusion, were sinful. The Grandsire bestowed upon women the ravening lust for enjoyment, all kinds of carnal pleasures, thereby tempting them to pursue the other sex, men.

The powerful Lord of the gods created wrath to be the companion of lust. Men, yielding to the power of kama and krodha, sought the company of women. Women have no special dharma prescribed for them. Even this is the niyama that was laid down. The Sruti declares that women are endowed with the most powerful senses, with no scriptures to follow, and they are as living lies.

Beds, seats, ornaments, food and drink, and the absence of all that is respectable and righteous, indulgence in disagreeable words, love of sexual companionship: these were bestowed by Brahma upon women. The Creator himself cannot keep them within the limits of propriety; then what need be said of mere men?

Mahabaho, I once heard how Vipula succeeded in protecting his guru's wife in ancient times.

There was in days of yore a most blessed Rishi called Devasarman, of great celebrity. He had a wife, Ruchi, who was unequalled on earth for beauty. Her loveliness intoxicated everyone who saw her among the Devas, Gandharvas and Danavas. Indra, the chastiser of Paka, the slayer of Vritra, was particularly enamoured of her and coveted her person. The great Rishi Devasarman was fully cognisant of the nature of women, and, to the best of his power, he protected Ruchi from every kind of evil influence. The Rishi knew that Indra was held back by no scruples in slaking his lust with other men's wives, and the sage put forth all his power to constantly safeguard his wife.

Then, there came a time when the Rishi wanted to perform a sacrifice. He began to think of how his wife could be protected from Indra while he was away. Blessed with high punya, he hit upon the course he would adopt. Summoning his favourite disciple, whose name was Vipula and who was of Bhrigu's race, Devasarman said, "I shall leave home for a while to perform a yagna. The king of the Devas always covets this Ruchi of mine. Do you, during my absence, protect her, putting forth all your energy. You will pass your time vigilantly because of Indra. O foremost of Bhrigu's vamsa, beware, for Purandara assumes many disguises."'

Bhishma continues, 'Thus addressed by his guru, the ascetic Vipula, his senses under control, always engaged in stern tapasya, possessed of the splendour of Surya or Agni, knowing of all the duties of dharma, and ever truthful in speech, answered him, saying, "Tathaastu, so be it."

However, as his master was about to set out, Vipula asked him again, "Tell me, Muni, what forms does Sakra assume? Of what kind is his body and what is his maya? You must tell me all this."

The illustrious Rishi described to the great Vipula all the illusions of Sakra, O Bhaarata.

Devasarman said, “The mighty Indra, Rishi, is full of maya and he assumes whatever forms he chooses. Sometimes he wears a diadem and holds the vajra; sometimes wearing a crown on his head, he adorns himself with earrings and in a moment he transforms himself into a devil. Sometimes, he appears with coronal locks on his head; soon again, O son, he shows himself with matted jata and clad in rags.

At times, he assumes a godly and gigantic frame. The next moment, he transforms himself into one of emaciated limbs, and again wearing rags. Always contradictory in appearances—fair, dark, ugly, handsome, young, old—at times he appears as a Brahmana, at others as a Kshatriya, as a Vaisya and as a Sudra.

He of a hundred sacrifices appears at times as a man born of impure order, mixed castes, varnasamkarsana: the son of a superior father by an inferior mother or of an inferior father by a superior mother. Frequently, he appears in various bird and animal forms. He shows himself as a Deva, then again as a Daitya, and then he assumes the guise of a human king. At times he appears as being plump or fat; at others, as one whose limbs have been broken by wayward Vayu in the body.

Able to assume any form, he can appear as an idiot, destitute of all intelligence. He also assumes the forms of flies and gnats.

O Vipula, no one can make him out because of these innumerable guises that he is master of, not even the Creator of the universe.

He makes himself invisible when he chooses, except to the eye of knowledge. Indra transforms himself into the wind; yes, the mighty one always assumes these myriad disguises. Will you, therefore, Vipula, protect this slender-waisted wife of mine with great care? O best of the Bhargavas, will you see that the Devaraja does not defile my wife, like a wretched dog licking the havis kept for a sacrifice?”

With these words and intent upon performing his yagna, Devasarman set out from his asrama.

Vipula thought, “I will certainly protect this devi Ruchi in every way from Indra. But what means should I use to protect my guru’s wife? Sakra has great powers of maya, awesome tejas, and is irresistible. Indra cannot be kept out by enclosing this retreat of ours, or by fencing the yard, since he can assume innumerable and subtle forms.

Assuming the form of the wind, he may ravish my guru's wife. I believe the best course for me would be to enter the devi's body through yogic power, and remain there. There is no other way than through my yoga shakti to protect her from the king of the Devas. If, on his return, my master sees his spouse defiled, he will surely curse me in anger, for he has great tapasya and possesses mystic vision.

Yes, this devi cannot be safeguarded as other women are because of Indra's powers of maya. Alas, critical is the situation in which I find myself, and I must obey my guru's command. And if I do watch over her successfully with yoga shakti, my feat will be regarded by all as being wonderful.

So, with yoga, I will assume control of her body, even as a drop of water lies on a lotus-leaf and yet does not wet it. If I am free of the taint of passion, I cannot incur any sin by doing what I wish. As a wayfarer shelters for a day in any empty dwelling he finds shall I spend this day within the body of my guru's wife. Verily, with my mind rapt in yoga, I shall dwell in her today!"

Carefully considering these points of dharma of all the Vedas and their angas, and with an eye on the great measure of tapasya, which both his preceptor and he possessed, Vipula concluded that the only way to protect the devi Ruchi was to enter her body, in occult fashion, and he went to some pains to accomplish what he planned.

Listen now to me, O king, and I will tell you what he did. Vipula, of much penance, sat himself down beside Ruchi, of faultless features, in her kutila, her cottage. He then began to speak to her gently, bringing her over to the cause of dharma.

Fixing his gaze to hers, uniting the light from her with that which issued from his, Vipula, in a subtle form, a sukshma rupa, entered the devi's body, even as the element of Vayu, wind, does Akasa, ethereal space. Vipula remained unmoving within her, invisibly, like her shadow; and every part of her in his control, he stayed thus, to protect her from Indra.

Ruchi herself knew nothing of this! It was in this way, Rajan, that Vipula continued to keep his guru's wife safe until his master Devasarman returned after completing the sacrifice he had gone to perform.'

CANTO 41

Bhishma says, 'One day, assuming a form of divine beauty, Indra came to Rishi Devasarman's asrama. Verily, O king, he came as an Apsara-like beauty who would inspire envy in even other women. As the Deva entered the hermitage, he saw Vipula, who sat still as a post, gazing vacantly before him, as if his eyes had no sight, like a figure in a painting. Ruchi was also there, she of the long and enchanting eyes, rounded hips and deep and full breasts. Her great eyes were like lotus petals, and her face was as radiant as the full moon.

Seeing Indra in his assumed guise, Ruchi wanted to welcome him. She was wonderstruck and curious about who this dazzling beauty was. Yet, try as she would to rise to make the visitor welcome, Vipula, who had taken subtle possession of her body, prevented her. She found she could not move at all.

Then Indra spoke softly and sweetly to her, "O sweet smiles, know that I am Indra, come here for you, for I am stricken with desire, and driven to distraction thinking of you, and time goes on."

Vipula heard Indra and saw everything from within Ruchi's body. And even though Ruchi heard every word Indra spoke, she could not move at all to welcome him, since Vipula controlled her body and senses, and she remained speechless. Using his yoga shakti, binding her with bonds of occult power, Vipula of mighty tejas restrained her from speaking or stirring.

Indra, abashed a little, said again to Ruchi, "Come, come to me, my lovely one!"

She tried to answer him warmly, but Vipula did not let her utter a word that she meant to. Instead, the words that he made her say were, "Why have you come here?"

She said them in chaste, formal language, Ruchi who was as beautiful as the moon. No sooner did she speak, than she felt ashamed at what she said and her own tone of voice, which so surprised her.

Hearing her, Indra was crestfallen. Then, O king, Indra sensed something amiss, and with his mystic eye he saw Vipula within Ruchi's body, like some reflection in a strange mirror. Indra trembled that the Rishi would curse him. Now the mighty Vipula left the body of his guru's wife, and returned to his own body.

He addressed the terrified Indra. Vipula said, "Purandara of the sinful mind, you have no control over your senses and neither the gods nor men will worship you in times to come. Have you forgotten, O Sakra, when Gautama cursed you, and your body sprouted a thousand phalluses, which the merciful sage later changed into eyes?

Ah, you are exceedingly foolish and your soul is still lascivious and unclean, and your mind unstable. O sinner, I protect Ruchi, so fly back to where you belong. Truly, you are so foolish that I am filled with pity for you, and have no wish to kill you. My preceptor, of vast intelligence, has terrible power. If he saw you like this, come to seduce his wife, a look from his wrathful eyes would turn you to ashes.

Never dream of committing such a sin again. You must hold great Brahmanas in the highest esteem. See that you and your kin do not meet your deaths through the might of an angry Brahmana. Being immortal does not give you liberty to do whatever you please. Never take a Brahmana lightly, or cause him offence. And, also, know that there is nothing you cannot attain through tapasya."

Hearing these words of the Mahatman Vipula, Indra, overwhelmed with shame, vanished from there. A mere moment later, Devasarman of great tapasya and punya, having completed his yagna, returned to his asrama. On his guru's return, Vipula returned Ruchi, of faultless beauty, whom he had protected against Indra's lascivious designs. He then stood fearlessly, in reverence, before his guru and paid homage to his preceptor.

Devasarman rested awhile and when the couple were together, Vipula narrated the entire incident with Indra. Devasarman was pleased with what his sishya had done, as he always was with his conduct and disposition, his vows and his penance.

Exclaiming, “Uttamam, excellent!” the most righteous Devasarman blessed Vipula with a boon, which the disciple received with a solemn vow that he would never stray from dharma.

Vipula went away to practise the most severe tapasya. Devasarman and Ruchi lived on together in that asrama in the solitary forest, fearless and content.’

CANTO 42

Bhishma says, 'Having served his master so admirably, Vipula of great tejas observed the most fervid tapasya, and in time came to own what he considered sufficient punya; and with some satisfaction and pride at his achievements, he wandered fearlessly over the earth. And, indeed, he was famed for his feat everywhere.

The mighty Bhargava was widely regarded as having conquered this world and the next by that exceptional protection he gave his guru's wife, as well as by his fierce tapasya. After a while, Kurunandana, the occasion arose for the ceremony of gifts for Ruchi devi's sister, at which abundant wealth and grain were to be given away.

Meanwhile, a certain Apsara of vivid beauty was ranging through the skies. From her body, as she coursed along, some flowers dropped down to the earth. Those flowers of celestial fragrance fell close to Devasarman's asrama. Ruchi picked up the flowers. Soon thereafter, Ruchi was invited to the country of the Angas; Ruchi's sister, Prabhavati, was the queen of Chitraratha, king of the Angas. Ruchi, her complexion superior, wore the unearthly blooms and went to the kingdom of Anga and to her sister's palace.

On seeing the heavenly flowers that Ruchi wore, Prabhavati wanted some for herself. Ruchi of the beautiful face told her husband of her sister's wish, and the Rishi agreed to grant his sister-in-law's desire. Summoning Vipula into his presence, Devasarman of austere tapasya commanded his disciple to bring him some flowers of the same kind, saying, "Go, go!"

Without hesitation, Vipula replied, “So be it!” and hurried to the place where Ruchi had picked up the flowers. Arriving where the flowers had fallen from the sky, he found a few still lying strewn on the ground. They were as fresh as if they had been newly plucked from the plants on which they grew; none had wilted or even drooped in the least. He gathered those exquisite flowers of mesmerising fragrance.

O Bhaarata, Vipula found those flowers as the result of his tapasya. Having got them, he happily set out for the city of Champa, adorned with festoons of unworldly Champakas. On his way, he saw a couple moving in a circle, hand in hand. One of them made an abrupt movement and broke the cadence of their movement; a dispute arose, with each one blaming the other. “You took a quicker step!” The other retorted, “No, verily!”

Both were obstinate, O king, and they began arguing, and then they swore an angry oath. Vipula was startled to hear himself being mentioned in that oath!

They both said, “Let the one among us who spoke falsely meet the fate of Vipula in the next world! That most painful of all fates.”

Hearing this, Vipula’s face became pale. He began to reflect, “I have performed stern tapasya. The dispute between the couple is searing and painful to me. What sin have I committed that they should refer to my end in the next world as the most painful one of all?”

O best of kings, with his head hung down, and with a dejected heart, Vipula began to think of what sin he had committed.

Walking ahead, he saw six men playing with dice made of gold and silver. Engrossed in the game, they seemed to be so excited that the hair on their bodies stood on end. A dispute arose among them, and Vipula heard them swear the same oath as the couple.

“The one among us who spoke falsely shall meet the most dreadful fate of Vipula in the next world!”

Hearing this again, Vipula strove earnestly to recollect any transgression of his from his early years, but failed, O Kurunandana. Ah, he began to burn like a fire within a fire, his mind aflame with grief. After deep and anguished reflection, Vipula at last remembered what he had done to protect the chastity of his guru’s wife Ruchi from the lascivious Indra.

“I entered the body of that devi, limb within limb, face within face, and, having done this, I hid that truth from my guru!”

Indeed, most blessed king, without doubt that was a grave sin. Coming to the city of Champa, he gave the flowers to his guru. In devotion, he worshipped his preceptor.’

CANTO 43

Bhishma says, 'Seeing Vipula returned from his mission, Devasarman spoke to him. Listen to what the Rishi said, O king.

"Vipula, during the course of your journey through the great forest, what did you see? My sishya, the people you saw knew you, and both my wife and I knew the manner in which you protected Ruchi."

Vipula said, "O illumined Rishi, who are the two whom I first saw? And the six that I saw subsequently? Do all of them know me? And how do you know about them?"

Devasarman said, "The first couple, who were dancing seamlessly, moving in an unbroken circle, were Day and Night, and the six men whom, learned Brahmana, you saw playing cheerfully with the dice, are the Six Seasons. All of them knew the sin of which you have been guilty. Having committed a sin in secrecy, no sinner should assume that his sin is known only to himself. When a man sins in secret, the Seasons as well as the Day and the Night are witness to it.

You thought your sin was hidden; you were pleased and did not tell me the whole truth. But the Seasons and Day and Night know everything that happens in this world, and all that is good or bad within us. They spoke to you as they did to remind you that everything is known, even that which you did not have the courage to tell me.

For this reason those regions that are reserved for the sinful will be yours. You hid what you did from me. You protected my wife whose character by nature, as a woman, is sinful. I am grateful, and no sin was committed. Vipula, if I had known that you had sinned, I would have cursed you.

However desirable the union of women with men may be, you protected Ruchi in a different and pure spirit. If you had done otherwise, I would have cursed you. My son, you protected my wife in manner even as if I had knowledge of it. I am grateful and now relieved of all anxiety, and you shall find not hell but swarga for yourself!"

Saying this to Vipula, Devasarman and his wife themselves ascended into heaven, leaving Vipula relieved and happy.

During the course of our conversation, O king, the great Rishi Markandeya narrated this tale on the banks of the Ganga. I, therefore, say to you that you must always safeguard women from every temptation and opportunity to sin. Amongst them, some are virtuous and some are not. Virtuous women are blessed and they are the very mothers of the universe, for it is they who love and cherish all creatures everywhere. They support the earth with all her waters and forests.

Sinful women, on the other hand, are the very destroyers of their races. Their hearts and their resolves are evil, and they are known by the evil manifested in their bodies.

Only great men, Mahatmans, can protect women, and they cannot be protected in any other way. Women, O king, are fierce and possess great power. They bear no one any love and only their insatiable lust for sexual union drives them. Why some women are even like the most fell mantras from the Atharva, those that kill.

Even after being married, they abandon their husbands for other men since they are never satisfied with one. Pandava, men should neither feel affection, nor should they harbour possessiveness or jealousy for women. O king, a man must have dealings with women always keeping dharma before him; and not with enthusiasm and attachment, but with reluctance and detachment; otherwise a man will meet his end. Kurunandana, this must be borne in mind at all times and under all circumstances.

Only one man, Vipula, ever succeeded in protecting a woman. There is none else in the three worlds who can do what he did, and without himself sinning."

CANTO 44

Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, tell me what is the first dharma of man, which is the root of the welfare of kinsmen, of the home, of the manes and of guests? I believe the marriage of one's daughter should be regarded as the first duty. But upon what sort of man should one bestow one's daughter?'

Bhishma says, 'There are five different kinds of weddings: the Brahmana, Kshatriya, Gandharva, Asura and the Rakshasa.

The one in which the birth, conduct and character of the groom are ascertained, and then the daughters are given in marriage, is the Brahmana way of marriage; and this is how all good Brahmanas give their daughters away.

Where the father decides to give his daughter in marriage, with gifts of diverse kinds to the groom, is the Kshatriya form of marriage.

The Gandharva vivaha is where the father of the girl, disregarding his own wishes, marries his daughter to her liking; and this is also in accord with the Vedas.

The wedding where a girl is purchased at a high cost and only after gratifying the greed of her kinsmen is known as the Asura vivaha.

The final kind of marriage, where there is the brutal slaying and cutting off the heads of weeping kinsmen, and where the bridegroom forcibly takes the girl, is called Rakshasa vivaha. Of the five, three are righteous, Yudhishtira, and two are sinful. The Rakshasa and the Asura forms should never be resorted to.

The Brahmana, Kshatriya and Gandharva forms are righteous, O king. Pure or mixed, these are the forms one engages in. A Brahmana can take three wives; a Kshatriya can take two wives and the Vaisya should take a wife from only his own order. The children born of these wives should all be regarded as equal.

Both in the Brahmana and Kshatriya forms of marriage, the woman chosen from the groom's own varna should be regarded as the best of all wives. Some say that men belonging to the three higher orders may take a woman from the Sudra order for enjoyment, but not dharma. Others, however, forbid the practice.

The righteous condemn the practice of begetting children from Sudra women. A Brahmana who begets children from a Sudra woman must perform expiation. A thirty-year-old man should wed a ten-year-old girl, called a Nagnika.

Or, a twenty-year-old should marry a seven-year-old girl. A girl who has neither a brother nor a father should not marry for she may be intended to become a putrika of her sire.

After attaining puberty, if the girl remains unmarried for three years, then in the fourth year she should look for a husband herself, without waiting any longer for her kinsmen to choose one for her. The children of such a girl do not lose their respectability nor does marriage with such a girl become disgraceful. If, instead of choosing a husband for herself, she does otherwise, she incurs the wrath of Prajapati. One should marry a girl who is not a sapinda of one's mother or of the same gotra of one's father. This is a practice consistent with the sacred law which Manu has declared.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Desirous of marriage, the groom gives a dower to the bride's kinsmen; some say the girl's kinsmen promise to give a dower; some grooms say, I will abduct the girl by force!; others simply display their wealth to the girl's kinsmen, intending to offer a portion thereof as dower; some actually take the hand of the girl with the rites of wedlock. I ask you, Pitama, whose wife does the girl actually become? To those who want to know the truth, you are the eye with which to see.'

Bhishma says, 'Actions of men, which have been approved, or settled in consultation, by the wise, are seen to be good. Falsehood, however, is always sinful.

The girl who becomes the wife, the sons born of her, the ritwiks, the gurus, sishyas and Upadhyayas present at the marriage, all become liable to sin and expiation if the girl gives her hand to a man other than he whom she promised to marry. Some of the wise, though, are of the opinion that no expiation is necessary for this. Manu does not laud a girl living with a man whom she does not like.

Living as a wife with a man whom she does not like leads to disgrace and sin. Why, less sin is incurred when a girl is forcibly abducted for marriage, then bestowed upon the abductor by the girl's kinsmen with due rites and also a dower paid and accepted.

On the girl's kinsmen expressing their consent, mantras should be chanted and homa performed, as these truly accomplish their purpose. Mantras and homa recited and performed for a girl who has not been bestowed by her kinsmen do not accomplish their purpose.

The engagement made by the kinsmen of a girl is no doubt binding and sacred. But the engagement that is entered into by the man and the woman with the help of mantras is very much more so, for it is such an engagement which really creates the relationship of husband and wife. According to the scriptures, a husband should regard his wife as an acquisition due to his own karma of a previous life, or to what has been ordained by God. A man, therefore, incurs no reproach by accepting as his wife a girl who has been promised to another by her kinsmen or for whom dower has been accepted by them.'

Yudhishtira says, 'When, after receiving dower, a girl's father seeks out a more eligible man, to present himself for her hand—one that is blessed with the three gunas in judicious proportions—does that father incur reproach by rejecting the man from whom he first received dower, in favour of the one that is more eligible? In such a case, both alternatives seem to be wrong—discarding a man to whom the girl has been promised, or rejecting the more eligible one, since we must consider a father's solemn duty to give his daughter to the best suitor. In such a case, what should a father do?

To me, of all duties, this seems to demand the utmost measure of deliberation. I want to know the truth of it from you, for you are indeed my eyes of dharma. I beg you, explain this to me, Pitama, ah, I am never sated with listening to you!'

Bhishma says, 'The giving of dowry does not determine or confirm the acquisition of a wife, and this is well-known to the person paying it. He pays it only as the nominal price of the girl. Also, the good never bestow their daughters for the sake of the dowers that others offer. When a groom possesses such qualities that are not agreeable to the girl's kinsmen, then a dower is demanded from him. However, when a father is pleased with a suitor's qualities and accomplishments, he says to him, "Do you wed my child, adorning her with proper ornaments of gold and gems."

And neither the bride's father nor the man who does as he is asked can be said to have demanded or given any dower, for such a transaction, in truth, is no sale at all. Bestowing a daughter, on acceptance of gifts given out of love and affection is an eternal practice. In matters of marriage, some fathers say, "I will give my daughter to a man with certain qualities." Some say with passion, "I will give my daughter only to such an individual!"

Such declarations do not amount to actual marriage. People are seen to solicit one another for the hands of maidens, give their word, and then break their pledge. Until it is actually solemnised with the proper rites and vows, a marriage cannot be said to have taken place. I have heard that that this was a boon granted to men of old by the Maruts themselves, regarding unwed daughters.

The ancient Rishis have declared that unless the groom is indeed fit and eligible, a young woman must not be given to a man in marriage, for a daughter is the very root of desire and of the descendants of a race. I, also, concur with this; it is indeed so. The practice of giving and taking a dowry to buy and sell daughters is known to men from days of great antiquity, and upon close examination you may well find many faults with this ancient and familiar practice. And indeed, the gift or acceptance of dowry alone cannot be regarded as solemnising a marriage or creating a husband and a wife. Listen to what I have to say on this matter.

Once, after defeating the Magadhas, the Kasis and the Kosalas, I brought away by force three maiden princesses for Vichitravirya. Two of them he married with the proper rites; the other he never formally wed, because the dowry had been paid in the form of valour.

My uncle, King Bahlika of the Kuru vamsa said, "The princess brought and not married with the due rites should be set free."

Vichitravirya was asked to marry that maiden princess with proper ceremonies. Doubting Bahlika's words, I asked others for their opinion. Since my uncle was profoundly learned and exceedingly punctilious in matters of dharma, and how men of dharma act with respect to marriage, I went to him, O king, and asked, "Sire, tell me what righteous men do in such a circumstance."

I repeated this several times with eagerness and curiosity, and Bahlika answered me, "If in your opinion a man and a woman become husband and wife on account of gifts and acceptance of dowry and not the actual taking of the young woman's hand with the proper rites, the father of the maiden, who permits and acknowledges such a marriage, allowing his daughter to go with the giver of the dowry, would follow a new creed, setting him apart from the scriptures. This is also what the shastras themselves declare. Men conversant with dharma and kartavya do not acknowledge a marriage declared through gifts and acceptance of dowry, but only one in which the groom takes the bride's hand with the prescribed rituals.

There is a well-known saying that a marriage is truly solemnised when the father actually bestows his daughter and she is accepted by the husband with all due rites.

The status of "wife" cannot be bestowed on young women acquired through sale and purchase and those who regard such transactions to be equal to marriage are unacquainted with the scriptures. No one should give his daughter to men who are not eligible by their worth and qualities; neither should a wife ever be bought, nor should a father sell his daughter. Only those with sinful souls, and driven by greed, besides, to sell and buy women to make slaves of them, regard a wife as arising from the gift and acceptance of a dowry.

On this subject, some once asked Prince Satyavat the following question, "If a man who gives dowry to the kinsmen of a young woman dies before the marriage, can another man marry the girl? O Satyavat, we are full of doubt about this, and beg you to clear our doubt for you are blessed with great wisdom and honoured by the wise. Enlighten us who want to know the truth."

Prince Satyavat answered them, "The kinsmen should bestow the bride on a groom whom they find eligible and do so without misgiving or hesitation. Without any doubt, the righteous would act in this way, why, even if the giver of the dowry is alive. Some say that the virgin wife or widow, whose marriage has not been consummated, either because of her husband's absence or death, may marry her husband's younger brother or another such relation. She also has a choice to become a sannyasin, and live a life of tapasya.

In the opinion of some, the younger brother of the husband or any other such relative may use the unused wife or widow. Others maintain that such practice, though prevalent, is not the law of the scripture but that which arises from one's own desire. They also say the father of the bride can bestow her upon a different eligible man despite accepting the dowry from another. If, after the hand of a maiden is promised and even if all the rites before those of actual marriage are performed, the girl can still be given to a man other than the one to whom she had been promised.

The giver only incurs the sin of falsehood, of breaking his word: but the marriage performed with the due rituals to another man will be held sacred. The mantras chanted during a marriage accomplish their objective of bringing about an indissoluble union at the seventh step taken around the sacred fire. The woman becomes a wife to him who gives a gift of holy water. Young women must be given away in the following way; the wise know this for certain. A superior Brahmana should wed a maiden who is not unwilling, who belongs to a family equal to his own, in purity or status, and who is given away by her brother. Such a girl should be wed in the presence of fire, with the due rites, causing her, amongst other things, to circumambulate the sacred Agni for the ordained number of times."'

Yudhishtira says, 'After giving dowry for a young woman, if the giver goes away, what should her father or other kinsmen do? Tell me this, Pitamaha!'

Bhishma says, 'If the girl's father is sonless and he is wealthy, he should support her and return the dowry to the man who gave it. Indeed, if the father does not return the dowry to the giver, the daughter should be regarded as belonging to the giver. She may even raise a child for the giver during his absence by the means ordained in the scriptures. No other man, however eligible and able, can marry her, even with all the lawful rites.

Commanded by her father, Princess Savitri, in the days of old, chose a husband; some lauded what she did, but others conversant with the scriptures, condemned it. Some say that the righteous do not act in this manner, while others hold that dharma is even what the righteous do, their deeds being dharma's foremost evidence. Sukratu, the grandson of the high-souled Janaka, king of the Videhas, declared his opinion on this matter, "The holy scriptures have declared that women may enjoy freedom at any time of their life. If the righteous did not follow this path, how could this scriptural declaration exist? How can there be any question or doubt in respect of this matter? How can men violate their own dharma by acting differently? Such disregard of scriptural law is said to be the practice of the Asuras, which is unheard of even among the ancients."

The relationship of a husband and wife is very subtle, being acquired through destiny, and therefore, understood only with the help of the inspired revelations of the scriptures. It is different from the relationship of a man and woman that consists only in the desire for sexual pleasure. This also was said by the king from Janaka's race.'

Yudhishtira says, 'On what authority to daughters inherit their fathers' wealth? Should the father regard both the daughter and son as equal?'

Bhishma says, 'A son is like one's own self; and since the son and the daughter are alike, both their father's children, how can any outsider inherit a man's wealth when he lives in the form of his daughter? Whatever wealth is called Yautuka property is maternal wealth, which belongs to the maiden daughter. If the maternal grandfather dies without having sons, the inheritance goes to the daughter's son. The daughter's son offers pindas to his own father as well as to his maternal grandfather. Hence, by law, there is no difference between the son and the daughter's son. When a father has only a daughter, he grants her the status of a son. If he then happens to have a son, the son then shares the inheritance with his sister.

Then, again, when a daughter is granted the status of a son, and the father takes a son by adoption or purchase, then she is regarded to be superior to such a son, for she takes three shares of her father's wealth while the adopted son receives only two. Where the daughter has been sold by her father, I do not see any reason why the status of the sold daughter's son should attach to the sons of one's own daughter. The sons born to a daughter who has been sold belong exclusively to her husband, even if he has not sired them himself, but acquired them according to the laws of the scriptures with regard to the bearing of children through the agency of others. Such sons can never belong, even as daughter's sons, to their maternal grandfather because of his having sold their mother for a price and lost all his rights in or to her by that act.

Such sons, again, become full of malice, evil in their ways, the misappropriators of others' wealth, and cunning and deceitful, having sprung from the Asura form of marriage, which is both sinful and vile. Those who know the ancient Itihasas, the histories of times of yore, and who also know dharma, and are devoted to the shastras, sing a legend once narrated by Yama himself. This is what Yama said:

"That man who acquires wealth by selling his own son, or bestowing his daughter by accepting a dower for his own livelihood, has to sink in seven terrible hells, one after another, all known as Kalasutra.

That wretch has to feed on sweat, urine and faeces all the time. In the Asura vivaha, the groom has to give a bull and a cow to the father-in-law.

Some agree this is a dower and some do not. The truth is that any gift, however small or big, O king, should be regarded as dowry. The practice of giving a daughter under such circumstances should be viewed as a sale. The fact that it has been practised by a few persons cannot be taken as the eternal usage.

In some forms of marriage, men marry girls after abducting them by force from amidst their kinsmen, and others have sexual intercourse with a maiden by force; both are regarded as perpetrators of sin. They have to fall into darkest hell. No human being should be subjected to sale, irrespective of whether they are related by blood or not. What need then be said of one's own child? No action which leads to punya can be performed with wealth acquired by sin."'

Bhishma says, 'Those who know ancient history recite the following verse of Daksha, the son of Prachetas: A maiden cannot be considered to have been sold if no dowry is taken by her kinsmen.

The bride should be treated with respect and kindness, and everything else that is agreeable; her father, her brothers, her father-in-law and her husband's brothers should all adorn her with jewellery and ornaments, for this will bring happiness and all felicity to the family. A husband cannot have children to increase his vamsa, if his wife dislikes and fails to please him. Women, O king, should always be worshipped and treated with affection and when this is done, the very gods are pleased; and where women are not respected and worshipped, everything, all karma, becomes fruitless.

If a family ill-treats a woman, making her grieve and shed tears, and she curses them, that family soon becomes extinct. Houses cursed by women meet with ruin and destruction, as if scorched by some Atharvan rite. Such houses lose their splendour, growth and their prosperity ends. O king, on the eve of his departure for swarga, Manu made over women to the care and protection of men, saying that they are weak, that they fall an easy prey to the seductive wiles of men, and are naturally disposed to accept the love that is offered to them, and also that they are devoted to truth.

There are other women that are full of malice, covetous of honours, fierce in disposition, unlovable, and impervious to reason. All women, however, deserve to be honoured, and men must show them respect because the dharma of men depends upon women, all the artha and kama of men depend upon women. So men must serve and worship them, bend their wills before them. The conception and birth of children, the nursing and nurture of children already born, and the accomplishment of all karma which upholds the needs of society—behold, all these have women for their cause!

By honouring women, one is sure to attain the fruition of all desires. In this connection, a princess of the house of Janaka, king of the Videhas, sang: "Women have no sacrifices ordained for them, and they are not called to perform sraddhas and are not required to regard facts or tell the truth. Serving their husbands with reverence and willing obedience is their only dharma. They succeed in conquering heaven by discharging just this duty. A woman is protected by her father during her childhood, by her husband in her youth and by her sons in her old age; indeed, she must be protected at all times.

Those who wish for affluence and prosperity should honour women, for they are the goddess of prosperity. By cherishing women, O Bhaarata, one cherishes the goddess of prosperity herself, the Devi Sri, and by oppressing her, one afflicts the goddess of fortune.'"

Yudhishtira says, ‘You know all the niyamas of all the scriptures, you know the dharma of kings and you are celebrated the world over as a great dispeller of doubts. I have a doubt; clear it for me, Pitamaha. I will not ask this of another, but only you, Mahabaho. How should a man who wants to tread the path of duty and righteousness conduct himself? It has been declared that a Brahmana can take four wives, one of his own varna, one a Kshatriya woman, a Vaisya and a Sudra woman, if the Brahmana desires sexual intercourse. Tell me, best of the Kurus, in what order do sons born to these different wives deserve to inherit their father’s wealth, who amongst them shall inherit what share of the paternal wealth and how is the distribution ordained?’

Bhishma says, ‘The Brahmana, the Kshatriya and the Vaisya are regarded as the three twice-born varnas, whom the Brahmana has been ordained to marry. Only through erroneous judgment or greed or lust, O scorcher of foes, does a Brahmana take a Sudra wife, even though the scriptures forbid him from doing so, and he finds a lowly end in the next world by taking a Sudra woman to his bed and he must perform expiation for this sin by the rites prescribed in the shastras. That expiation must be twice as severe if the Brahmana begets children by a Sudra woman.

I will now tell you, O Bharata, how paternal wealth is to be distributed among the children of different wives. First of all, the son born of the Brahmana wife shall have from his father’s wealth a bull of auspicious markings, and the best chariot or carriage. After this, what remains of the Brahmana’s possessions should be divided into ten equal portions. The son by the Brahmana wife shall take four of these, and although the son born of the Kshatriya wife has, doubtless, the status of a Brahmana, in consequence of the distinction attaching to his mother, he shall take three of the ten shares into which the father's property has been divided.

The son born to the Vaisya wife, belonging to the third varna, shall take two of the three remaining shares of the father's property. It has been said, the son born of the Sudra wife is not considered an heir and hence should not inherit his father's wealth; however, out of compassion, one remaining share should be given to such a son.

Even this should be the order of the ten shares into which the Brahmana's wealth is to be divided. All sons born of the same mother or of mothers of the same caste, shall equally share their portion. The son born of the Sudra wife is untutored in the scriptures and the karmas ordained for Brahmanas, and is neither regarded nor invested with the status of a Brahmana. Only children born of wives of the three higher varnas should be recognised and given the status of Brahmanas. It has been said that there are only four varnas, and no fifth. The son by the Sudra wife shall take his part of the wealth after the distribution among the other children, as ordained; and he shall not take even this unless it is given to him. However, some portion of the sire's wealth should without doubt be given to the son of the Sudra wife.

Compassion, known as karuna or daya, is one of the cardinal virtues, and wherever it exercised, it always results in great punya. It is through compassion that some portion of a Brahmana father's property is given to the son of the Sudra wife. Irrespective of whether the Brahmana has children belonging to wives of other castes, to the son of a Sudra wife O Bhaarata, only a tenth part of the sire's wealth should be given, and no more.

A Brahmana should never acquire wealth without a purpose; if he has more wealth than what is necessary to maintain his family and himself for three years, he should perform sacrifices with that wealth.

The highest amount that a husband should give his wife is three thousand coins of the prevailing currency which can be spent as the wife pleases. However, she should never take wealth without her husband's knowledge, although upon her husband's death she can enjoy all his wealth by herself, if he leaves no child as his heir. However, she shall not sell or otherwise dispose any portion of his property and possessions.

Whatever wealth, Yudhishtira, the Brahmana wife receives as a gift from her father, should be taken after her death by her daughter, for the daughter is equal to a son as ordained in the scriptures, O delighter of Kurus. Thus has the law of inheritance been ordained, Bharatarishabha. Bearing in mind these laws about the distribution and disposal of wealth, one should never acquire wealth heedlessly or in vain.'

Yudhishtira says, 'If the son born of a Sudra woman by a Brahmana father has been declared in the scriptures to be not entitled to any wealth, by what exceptional rule then is a tenth part of the paternal property to be given to him? A son born of a Brahmana wife by a Brahmana is unquestionably a Brahmana. One born of a Kshatriya wife or of a Vaisya wife, by a Brahmana husband, is similarly invested with the status of a Brahmana. Why then, best of kings, are such sons to share the paternal wealth unequally? All of them, you have said, are Brahmanas, having been born of mothers that belong to the three higher orders equally entitled to be called deviyas.'"

"Bhishma says, 'O Parantapa, all spouses in this world are called data. Although that name is applied to all, yet there is this great distinction to be observed. If, having married three wives belonging to the three other orders, a Brahmana takes a Brahmana wife the very last of all, yet shall she be regarded as the first in rank among all the wives, and as deserving of the greatest respect. Indeed, among all the co-wives, she shall be the foremost in consideration. In her apartments should be kept all such articles that are necessary for the husband's baths, personal adornments, the cleaning of his teeth and application of kohl to his eyes. In her apartments should be kept the havya and the kavya and all else that the husband may require for the performance of his religious karmas.

If the Brahmana wife is in the house, no other wife is entitled to attend to these needs of the husband. Only the Brahmana wife, O Yudhishtira, should assist in these kriyas of the husband. The husband's food and drink, garlands, clothes and ornaments—all these should be given by the Brahmana wife to the husband, for she is the foremost in rank and consideration among all his wives. These are the niyamas of the scriptures as laid down by Manu, O joy of the Kurus. Even this, O monarch, is seen to be the course of eternal usage. If a Brahmana, O Yudhishtira, led by lust, acts in a different way, he shall come to be regarded as a Chandala among Brahmanas.

Sons born to Brahmana and Kshatriya wives may be said to be equal in status. For all that, the Kshatriya woman cannot be regarded as being the Brahmana woman's equal, and so a son born of the Brahmana wife must be also regarded as superior to that of the Kshatriya wife and he takes the best, O Yudhishtira, of his father's possessions.

Similarly, the Vaisya and the Kshatriya cannot be regarded as being equals by birth. Prosperity, kingdom and treasury, O Yudhishtira, belong to the Kshatriya as they have been ordained. All the earth, O king, with her girdle of seas, is seen to belong to him; he acquires an extensive affluence by following the svadharma of his caste. The sceptre of royalty is held by him, for without the Kshatriyas there can be no protection.

The Brahmanas are blessed indeed, for they are the gods of the very gods. Kshatriyas should worship the Brahmanas with due rites, even as ordained by the ancient Rishis, for this is the sanatana dharma. Coveted by thieves and others, the possessions of all men, their wealth, wives and everything else would have been taken forcibly from them but for the protection given them by Kshatriyas in observing the duties assigned to their varna. The Kshatriya, as the king, becomes the protector or rescuer of all the others. Hence, the son of the Kshatriya wife shall, without doubt, be held as superior to that of the Vaisya wife. He for this takes a larger share of the paternal property than the son of the Vaisya mother.'

Yudhishtira says, 'You have declared the laws that apply to Brahmanas. What are the laws that apply to others?'

Bhishma says, 'For the Kshatriya, O Kurunandana, two wives have been ordained; and they may take a third wife from the Sudra class. Even though such practice prevails, it is not sanctioned by the scriptures. The property of a Kshatriya should, O king, be divided into eight shares. Four shares of the paternal property must go to the son of the Kshatriya wife, three to the son of the Vaisya wife, and one remaining share to the son of the Sudra wife, but the last only if father gives it.

For the Vaisya, only one wife has been decreed and a second wife is taken from the Sudra order, although this is not sanctioned by the shastras. If a Vaisya has two wives, a Vaisya and the other a Sudra, there is a difference in status between them.

The wealth of a Vaisya should be divided into five portions and it is to be distributed to sons of the Vaisya wife and the inferior Sudra wife in the following manner. The son of the Vaisya wife shall take four shares and the fifth share will go to the son of the Sudra wife, but only when the father gives it, not otherwise. The son of a Sudra wife fathered by men of the three higher varnas shall never be entitled to any part of his paternal wealth.

The Sudra should have only one wife taken from his own varna and under no circumstances should he take any other.

Even if a Sudra has a hundred sons by such a spouse, they will share the wealth left behind equally. As ordained, children born to the wife of the same varna will share the paternal wealth equally, and the eldest of them gets a larger share than all his brothers, and best belongings of his father.

Even this is the law of inheritance, O son of Pritha, as declared by the Svayambhuva Manu himself. Among children born from the wife of the same caste, there is a distinction for marriage, O king: the elder ones precede the younger. Wives being equal in the varna of birth and children being equal in their mother's status, the first son will inherit a greater share than his brothers, the next son, by age, shall take a share next in value and the youngest shall have the share that belongs to the youngest.

Thus, among wives from all varnas, the ones belonging to the husband's own caste are regarded as the first. Even this is what was declared by the great Rishi Kasyapa, the son of Marichi.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Through inducements offered by wealth, or through mere lust, or through ignorance of the true order of birth, of both sons and daughters, or through folly, varnasamkarshana, or interbreeding of castes, occurs in all the varnas. What, O Grandsire, is the dharma and the karma laid down for those born in the mixed classes?'

Bhishma says, 'In the beginning, the Lord of all creatures created the four varnas and laid down their respective dharmas and prescribed karmas, for the sake of sacrifice. The Brahmana may take four wives, one from each of the four varnas. The children from the Brahmana and Kshatriya wives are invested with the status of a Brahmana. But sons born of the two other wives, of the Vaisya and Sudra order, are inferior and their status is determined by that of their mothers and not the father.

The son of a Brahmana begotten from a Sudra wife is called Parasara, implying one born of a corpse, for the Sudra woman's body is as inauspicious as a corpse. He should serve his father's family and it is improper for him to give up the duty of service that has been ordained for him. By doing all that he can, he should support the burdens of his family. He must dutifully serve his brothers and sisters, even if he is the eldest and they are younger, and give them his earnings.

A Kshatriya may take three wives; in two of them, the one from his own caste and the other from the Vaisya varna, he takes birth himself. His children born to wives of his own varna are invested with the status of Kshatriyas. His third wife of the Sudra caste is regarded as most inferior and the son from her is called an Ugra.

The Vaisya may take two wives, one from his own varna, and the other from the lowest, Sudra caste. He is born himself as the children born to the wife of his own varna, and these are invested with a Vaisya's status. The Sudra can take only one wife and she is to be from own caste and their son becomes a Sudra.

A son born under circumstances other than those mentioned above, is looked upon as an inferior one. If a man of a lower caste begets a son upon a woman of a superior varna, such a son is regarded as outside the pale of the four pure orders. Indeed, such a son is an object of censure with the four principal varnas.

A son born of a Brahmana woman to a Kshatriya, without being included in any of the four pure varnas, is called a Suta and his duties are connected with the reciting of eulogies and encomiums of kings and other great men. A son born of a Brahmana woman to a Vaisya man is known as a Vaidehaka and his duties consist of being in charge of locks, bars and bolts for protecting the privacy of women of respectable households. Such sons have no cleansing rites laid down for them.

If a Sudra marries a woman belonging to the foremost of the four varnas, the son that is begotten is called a Chandala. Endowed with a fierce disposition, he must live on the city outskirts and his assigned duty is that of a public executioner; and such sons are always regarded as wretches of their race.

These, O foremost of intelligent men, are the children of mixed varnas. The son begotten by a Vaisya upon a Kshatriya woman becomes a Vandi or Magadha. His duties are the eloquent recitations of praise. The son begotten through transgression, by a Sudra upon a Kshatriya woman, becomes a Nishada and his dharma is to be a fisherman. If a Sudra unites with a Vaisya woman, a son begotten upon her is called Ayogava and his work is that of a Takshan, a carpenter.

Brahmanas should never accept gifts from such persons, for these are not entitled to possess any kind of wealth. Men belonging to the mixed castes take wives from their own kind and their children are invested with the same status. When they beget children in women taken from inferior castes, these children become inferior to their fathers and they are invested with the status of their mothers. Thus, as regards the four pure varnas, men beget children invested with their own status upon wives taken from their own varnas, as also upon them that are taken from the varnas immediately below their own. When, however, children are begotten from other wives, they have a status that is outside the pale of the four pure varnas.

When such sons beget progeny in women taken from their own varnas, those sons are given the status of their fathers. It is only when they take wives from other varnas that the children they beget are given an inferior status.

If a Sudra marries a Brahmana woman, the son born of that union is called a Chandala. If such a Chandala also begets a son from a Brahmana woman, that child is considered to be even lower than his father. From those born outside the pale of the four varnas and those again that are further inferior, children multiply because of their union with women of castes superior to their own. In this way, fifteen progressively mixed classes spring up.

Mixed varnas arise solely from the sexual union of women with men who should abstain from such a union. Among the classes that are outside the pale of the four principal or pure varnas, children are begotten upon women belonging to the class called Sairindhri by men of the caste known as Magadha. The occupation of such offspring is the adornment of the bodies of others, and they are knowledgeable in the preparation of liniments, lotions and unguents, the making of garlands, and other adornments. Although free by the status they have by birth, they should yet lead a life of service.

Another, Ayogava, caste comes from the union of Magadhas of a certain kind with women of the Sairindhri caste. Their occupation is weaving nets used for fishing, and hunting fowl and animals. The union of Vaidehas with women of the Sairindhri caste begets children called Maireyakas, whose occupation is the making of wines and spirits. From Nishadas spring a caste called Madgura and also the Dasas, whose profession is plying boats. From the Chandala springs a race called Swapaka, whose employment is keeping guard over the dead.

If women of the Magadhi caste unite with these four castes of vile dispositions, they produce Mansa, Swadukara, Kshaudra and Saugandha children, who live by deceit. From the Vaideha springs up a cruel and sinful caste that also lives by practising deception. From the Nishadas spring Madranabhas who ride on carriages drawn by donkeys. From the Chandalas arise the Pukkasas, who are seen eating the flesh of animals like donkeys, horses and elephants. These cover themselves with garments obtained by stripping human corpses and eat from cracked or broken earthenware.

From the union of fathers from different castes with an Ayogava women, three castes of a base and most inferior kind originate. The Kshaudras spring from the Vaidehakas; the Andhras, who live in the outskirts of towns and cities, also come from the Vaidehakas. The Karavara caste arises from the union of a Charmakara with a Nishada woman. From the Chandala again there springs the caste known as Pandusaupaka, whose occupation is weaving baskets and other similar articles using cleft and shaven bamboo. An Ahindaka comes from the union of a Nishada man with a woman of the Vaidehi caste. The son of a Chandala begotten upon a Saupaka woman has the status and occupation of a Chandala. A Nishada woman uniting with a Chandala man brings forth a son who lives on the outskirts of villages and towns. Such offspring live in smasanas, crematoria, and are regarded by the very lowest varnas as unworthy of being counted among them.

Thus, further mixed castes are born from unlawful and sinful unions of fathers and mothers belonging to different castes. Whether they live in concealment or openly, they should be known by their occupations. Duties have been ordained in the scriptures for only the four principal varnas and there is no mention of any svadharma for any other varnas. By the scriptures, they need not fear for what they do and how they earn their livelihood. By uniting with women of other castes, led not by considerations of righteousness but by uncontrolled lust, men unaccustomed to the performance of sacrifices or for whom yagnas have not been ordained, and who are deprived of the company and the instruction of the righteous, whether numbered among the four principal orders or not, cause numerous mixed castes to come into existence, whose occupations and abodes depend on the circumstances connected with the irregular unions to which they owe their births.

Having recourse to crossroads, or crematoria, or hills and mountains, or forests and trees, they build their habitations there and wear ornaments made of iron. Living in such places openly, they earn their livelihood from producing diverse kinds of domestic and other utensils, and adorn their persons with crude ornaments. Without doubt, by helping with kine and serving Brahmanas, practising the virtues of abstention from cruelty, compassion, truthfulness of speech, forgiveness and, if need be, preserving others by sacrificing their very lives, persons of the mixed castes may achieve success. I have no doubt that such virtues become the cause of their salvation.

An intelligent man should take all things into consideration and beget offspring upon a woman that is fit for him, as ordained in the scriptures. A son begotten from a woman belonging to a degraded caste brings him to grief instead of rescuing him, even as a heavy weight drowns a swimmer who wants to cross a body of water.

Lust and wrath are natural attributes of humanity in this world, irrespective of a man being learned or not. Women, therefore, may always be seen as dragging men onto the wrong path, of darkness and sin. The very nature of women is such that a man's contact with her brings him misery and ruin. Hence, wise men do not suffer themselves to be excessively attached to women.'

Yudhishtira says, 'There are men who belong to the mixed castes, and who are of very impure birth. Though presenting the features of respectability, they are in reality anything but so. In consequence of their external aspects we might not be able to know the truth about their birth. Are there any signs, Pitamaha, by which the truth can be known about the origin of such men?'

Bhishma says, 'A person born of an irregular union shows diverse features of character. One's purity of birth, again, must be ascertained from one's actions which must resemble the actions of those who are good and righteous. One's impure origin is proclaimed by disreputable behaviour, deeds that violate those laid down in the scriptures, crookedness, cruelty, abstention from sacrifices and other spiritual practices which fetch punya. A son either receives his father's character or his mother's, and sometimes both.

A man of impure birth cannot conceal his true character. Just as a tiger or a leopard's cub inherits stripes or spots, a man cannot hide his origin; his impure descent will manifest itself, to some degree, despite all attempts to conceal it. For his own purposes a man may choose to walk an insincere, hypocrite's path while outwardly displaying such conduct as might seem righteous. However, his demeanour will inevitably betray him, and the truth of his varna, good or base.

Creatures in the world have different characters and are seen to conduct themselves in diverse ways. Amongst all the living, there is none better than he who is of pure birth and of righteous conduct. A man born into a lower varna, even though he is thorough with the scriptures, fails to prevent his body from committing vile deeds.

Absolute goodness of understanding may be of different degrees; it may be high, middling, or low. Even if such sattva does manifest in a man of lowly birth, it disappears like autumn clouds which never bring any rain, without any consequence. On the other hand, the goodness which shows itself in those of better lineage will invariably reveal itself in his actions.

If a man is born into a superior varna, but yet shows no righteous conduct, he deserves neither respect nor regard. And one may worship even a Sudra if he is lives by his svadharma and is of good conduct. A man proclaims himself by his own good deeds as much as by his good or bad nature and birth.

If one's vamsa is dishonoured for any reason, one soon elevates it and makes it splendid and famed by one's deeds. For these reasons the wise should avoid women of the diverse castes, mixed or pure, upon whom they should not beget offspring.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Can you speak to us, Pitamaha, about the varnas and classes separately, on different kinds of sons begotten from different types of women, and about men entitled to have them as sons, and their status in life ? It is known that disputes frequently arise with regard to sons. I beg you, resolve the doubts that have seized our minds, for we are bewildered by this matter.'

Bhishma says, 'The son of one's loins is regarded as one's own self. The son that is begotten upon one's wife by a man who has been invited for the task is called niruktaja, and if the father was uninvited, such a son is called prasritaja. The son begotten upon his own wife by a man fallen away from his caste is called patitaja. There are two other sons: the one given, the one created, and there is another called adhyudha.

The son born of a maiden in her father's house is called kanina. Besides these, there are six other kinds of sons called apadhwansaja and six others yet that are called apasadas. These are the several kinds of sons mentioned in the scriptures.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Who are the six that are called apadhwansajas and who are the apasadas? I beg you, explain all these to me in detail.'

Bhishma says, 'The sons of a Brahmana begotten upon women taken from the three inferior varnas, by a Kshatriya upon women taken from the two varnas inferior to his own, and sons that a Vaisya begets upon a spouse taken from the Sudra varna, the one inferior to his own, are all called apadhwansajas. The six kinds are thus explained.

Listen now to who the apasadas are. The son that a Sudra begets upon a Brahmana woman is called a Chandala; the son begotten upon a Kshatriya woman by a Sudra man is called a Vratya. He who is born of a Vaisya woman by a Sudra father is called a Vaidya. These three kinds of sons are called apasadas.

The Vaisya, by uniting himself with a Brahmana woman, begets a son that is called a Magadha, while the son that he begets upon a Kshatriya woman is called a Vamaka. The Kshatriya can beget but one kind of son upon a woman of a superior order. Indeed, the son begotten by a Kshatriya upon a Brahmana woman is a Suta. These three also are called apasadas. It cannot be said, O king, that these six kinds of sons are no sons at all.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Some say that one's son is he that is born in one's soil. Some, on the other hand, say that one's son is he who has been begotten from one's seed. Are both these kinds of sons equal? Whose, again, is the son to be? Do you tell me this, O Grandsire!'

Bhishma says, 'His is the son from whose seed he has sprung. If, however, the owner of the seed abandons the son born of it, such a son then becomes his upon whose spouse he has been begotten. The same rule applies to the son called Adhyudha. He belongs to the man from whose seed he has taken his birth. If, however, the owner of the seed abandons him, he becomes the son of the husband of his mother. Know that even this is what the law declares.'

Yudhishtira says, 'We know that the son becomes his from whose seed he has taken birth. Whence does the husband of the woman that brings forth the son derive his right to the latter? Similarly, the son called Adhyudha should be known to be the son of him from whose seed he has sprung. How can they be sons of others by reasons of the engagement about owning and rearing them having been broken?'

Bhishma says, 'He who begets a son from his own loins and then abandons him for some reason, cannot be regarded as the father, for the vital seed alone does not confer fatherhood and the son also must be held to belong to the man who owns the maternal soil and raises him. Wanting a son, if a man marries a pregnant girl, the son of his wife will belong to him, for he is the fruit of his own soil; and the man from whose seed the son has sprung can have no right to such a child.

The son born from a man's wife but not begotten by him bears all traits of the actual father and not those of he who is only his mother's husband. The son thus born cannot conceal the evidence of his natural physiognomy, and will be known at once upon sight as belonging to another.

The son adopted is sometimes regarded as the child of the man who has made him a son, and who thus raises him. In his case, neither the seed of his birth nor the soil in which he is born makes him a son.'

Yudhishtira says, 'What kind of a son is he who has been adopted and who is neither his father nor mother's natural son?'

Bhishma says, 'When a man brings home and raises a son, cast off on the streets by his parents, and when he fails to find his natural parents after searching, he becomes the father of such a son and the latter becomes what is called his created son. Having no one else to own him, he becomes owned by him who raises him. Such a son, again, comes to be regarded as belonging to that varna to which his adoptive father belongs.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How should one perform the purificatory rites of such a man and what sort of rites should be performed? What girl should he marry? Tell me all this, Pitamaha!'

Bhishma says, 'A son who is cast off by his parents obtains the varna of the man raising him, hence the rites of purification should be performed by the adoptive father raising him, according to his own race and kinsmen. Such a son should marry a girl belonging to the varna of the adoptive father, and this is done only when the varna of the son's true mother cannot be ascertained.

Among sons, he that is born to an unwed mother and he who is born to a mother who conceived before her marriage but brought him forth after marrying, are regarded as disgraceful and degraded.

Even those two, however, should receive the same rites of purification that are laid down for sons begotten by the father in lawful wedlock. With respect to the son who becomes his father's because of his birth from his father's wife and of those sons that are called apasadas and those conceived by the woman in her maidenhood but brought forth after marriage, Brahmanas and others should apply the same rites of purification that hold good for their own varnas. These are ordained in the scriptures with respect to the different varnas. I have told you everything pertaining to your questions. What else do you wish to hear?'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'What is the nature of the compassion that is felt at the sight of another's woe, and that which one feels because of living in companionship with the other? What is the nature and degree of the high blessedness that attaches to kine? Pitamaha, explain all this to me.'

Bhishma says, 'In this regard, O you of great radiance, I will narrate to you an ancient narrative of a conversation between Nahusha and Rishi Chyavana. In days of yore, Maharishi Chyavana of Bhrigu's race, always observant of high vows, wanted to lead the way of life called Udavasa for some time and set himself to embark on it. Casting off pride, wrath, joy and grief, the ascetic pledged himself to observe that vow for twelve years. The Rishi inspired all land creatures with a happy trust and inspired similar confidence in all creatures living in water. The powerful sage resembled the moon himself in his behaviour towards all; bowing to all the deities and having cleansed himself of all sins, he entered the water at the confluence of the Ganga and the Yamuna and stood there motionless.

Placing his head against it, he bore the fierce and roaring current of the two rivers united together, whose speed was like that of the wind itself. Instead of drowning the Rishi, the Ganga, the Yamuna, the other streams and lakes, whose waters come together at the confluence at Prayaga, flowed past him in respect. Assuming the aspect of a wooden post, the great Muni laid himself down in the water and slept at ease; and sometimes, Lord of the Bharatas, the most intelligent sage stood upright. He was at ease with all aquatic creatures, without the least fear; all these would come and gently sniff the Rishi's lips.

In this way, the Rishi spent a long time at the grand confluence of waters. One day, a large number of fishermen came to that place with their nets. Well-built and broad-chested, endowed with great strength, courage, and not afraid of the water, those men lived by fishing. They tied all their nets together and approached the water that teemed with every kind of fish.

All those Kaivartas together cast their strong nets, all made from fresh string, across a wide area of the waters of the Ganga and the Yamuna. Working in cheerful unison, the fishermen entered the water all together, quite fearlessly, and began to haul in their net in which they had caught a vast number of fish and other water creatures. As they did this, they also hauled up Chyavana Muni, his body overgrown with river moss so even his matted jata and long beard were green, and conch shells and other molluscs covered him, having attached themselves by their heads.

Seeing the sage, that master of the Vedas, the fishermen stood before him with bowed heads and folded hands; they prostrated repeatedly before him. Meanwhile, all the fish those men had caught died in agony. Seeing the great and cruel slaughter of the fish, Chyavana was filled with pity and he sighed repeatedly.

The fishermen said, “We have sinned by dragging your holy self from the water in our ignorance. Be merciful to us! What wish of yours shall we accomplish? Command us, O great sage.”

From among the heap of dead fishes around him, Chyavana said, “Attentively hear what my most cherished wish is. I shall either die with these fish or you must sell me with them, for I have lived with them for a long time in the water. I do not wish to abandon them now.”

When he said these words to them, the fishermen became terrified. With pale faces they went to King Nahusha and told him what had happened.’”

CANTO 51

"Bhishma says, 'When he heard what had chanced with Chyavana, Nahusha immediately went to the Rishi, taking his ministers and priests with him. Having purified himself, the king introduced himself, with joined palms and concentrated attention, to Chyavana Mahatman. The king's priests worshipped the Rishi with due ceremony, that sage who observed the satya vrata, the vow of truth, and who resembled a god in splendour and vitality.

Nahusha said, "Tell me, O Dvijottama, what shall we do to please you? However difficult it may be, there is nothing, Holy One, that I will not be able to accomplish at your bidding."

Chyavana said, "These men that live by fishing have all been sorely tried with labour. Pay them the price that may be set upon me along with the value of these fish."

Nahusha said, "Let my priest give these Nishadas a thousand coins as the price for these fish, as you, Swami, have commanded."

Chyavana said, "A thousand coins cannot be my price. Use your discretion and intelligence to set a fair price on their catch."

Nahusha said, "Let, O great Brahmana, a hundred thousand coins be given to these Nishadas. Will this be fair price, O Holy One, or do you think otherwise?"

Chyavana said, "I will not be bought for a hundred thousand coins, O best of kings! Give them a just price. Do you want to consult with your ministers?"

Nahusha said, "Let my priest give these Nishadas a crore of coins. If even this does not meet your price, let more be paid to them."

Chyavana said, "O king, I do not deserve to be bought for a crore of coins or even more. Let the fishermen be given a fair and proper price. Do you want to consult with the Brahmanas?"

Nahusha said, "Let half of my kingdom or even the whole be given to these Nishadas. I think that would be a fair price. But what do you think, O Dvijottama?"

Chyavana said, "I do not deserve to be bought with half of your kingdom or even the whole of it, O king! Let a fair price be given to these men. Do you consult with your Rishis."

Hearing these words of the great Muni, Nahusha was grief-struck. He deliberated on the matter with his ministers and priests. Then an ascetic who was living in the forest came to King Nahusha. This sage lived on fruit and roots and was born of a cow. Addressing the king, the Holy One said, "O king, I shall soon gratify you and the Rishi as well. I never tell a lie, not even in jest, what then should I say of otherwise? You should, without any scruple, do what I tell you."

Nahusha said, "Illustrious one, you tell me what the price is of the Maharishi of Bhrigu's race. Save me, my kingdom and my vamsa from this terrible pass! If the holy Chyavana became angry, he would destroy the three worlds. What then need I say of me, who is destitute of any tapasya and who depends only upon only the might of my arms? O Maharishi, become a raft to us, for we have fallen into a fathomless ocean with all our counsellors and priests. I beg you, settle what the price should be before the Rishi."

Hearing these words of Nahusha, the ascetic born of a cow and endowed with great tejas spoke in this strain, gladdening the monarch and all his counsellors, "Brahmanas, O king, belong to the foremost of the four varnas, and no value, however great, can be set upon them. Cows also are invaluable, therefore, Lord of men, regard a cow as the value of the Rishi!"

Hearing these words of the great Rishi, Nahusha, his counsellors and priests were filled with joy. Going then to the presence of Bhrigu's son, Chyavana of rigid vows, he addressed him thus, to gratify him to the best of his ability.

Nahusha said, "Rise, rise, O enlightened Rishi, you have been bought, O son of Bhrigu, with a cow as your price. O foremost of men of dharma, I think this is your price."

Chyavana said, "Yes, O king of kings, I do rise up. I have been properly bought by you, O sinless one! You of unfading glory, I do not see any wealth that is equal to kine. To speak of kine, to hear others speak of them, to make gifts and to see kine, O king, are all acts that are lauded, Kshatriya, as being most auspicious and sin-cleansing. Cows are always the root of prosperity and there is no fault in them. They always afford the best food, in the form of havi, to the Devas, and sacred mantras, Swaha and Vashat, are always established in them.

They are the chief conductresses of sacrifices for they constitute the mouth of sacrifice. They bear and yield excellent and strength-giving amrita and receive the worship of all the worlds and are regarded as the source of nectar. On earth, cows resemble fire in energy and form. Verily, they bestow great happiness upon all creatures. That country where kine, established by their owners, breathe fearlessly, shines in beauty and the sins of that country are washed away. They constitute the stairs that lead to heaven and are adored in heaven itself. They are goddesses that are competent to give everything and grant every wish; there is nothing else in the world that is so high or so superior!"'

Bhishma continues, 'On the subject of the glory and superiority of cows, this is what I have to say, Lord of the Bharata vamsa. I am competent to proclaim only a part of the punya attached to cows, I cannot exhaust the subject!

The Nishadas then said, "Muni, you have met and also spoken to us; it has been said that friendship with those that are good depends upon just seven words.

Will you then, Lord, show us your grace? The blazing sacrificial fire consumes all the oblations of clarified butter poured upon it. Of righteous soul and great energy, you are among men a blazing fire of tejas. We worship you, learned one! We surrender ourselves to you. Do you, to show us favour, take from us this cow?"

Chyavana said, "The eye of a poor man or a distressed one, the eye of an ascetic, or that of a venomous snake consumes a man with his very roots, as a fire fanned by the wind blazing up consumes a stack of dry grass or straw. I will accept the cow that you wish to gift me. Fishermen, freed from every sin, go you to swarga without any delay along with these fishes you have caught in your nets."

After this, because of the great Rishi's tejas and his cleansed soul, Fishermen and the fish, through virtue of those words that he had uttered, ascended into heaven and King Nahusha was filled with wonder.

The two Rishis, the one born of a cow and the other, Chyavana of Bhrigu's race, pleased Nahusha by granting him many boons. Then King Nahusha of great tejas, Lord of all the earth, filled with joy, said, "Enough!"

Like a second Indra, he accepted the boon about his own steadfastness in virtue. The delighted king worshipped both the Rishis who had blessed him with great reverence. As for Chyavana, he returned to his own asrama for his vrata was completed. The Rishi born of a cow and of great tejas, also went back to his own retreat.

All the Nishadas ascended into swarga with the fishes they caught, O monarch, King Nahusha, too, having obtained those valuable boons, entered his own city. I have thus, O son, told you everything that you asked of me. The affection generated by the mere sight of others beings, as also by living with them, O Yudhishtira, and the high blessedness of the cow, and the ascertainment of true dharma, are the matters upon which I have discoursed. Tell me, O Kshatriya, what else is in your heart.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O wisest one, a doubt as vast as an ocean has engulfed me, Listen to it, O Mahabaho, and having learnt what it is, resolve it for me. I am taken with great curiosity about Jamadagni's son Parasurama, that foremost of all men of dharma. Pitamaha, tell me how Rama, who was endowed with prowess that could never be baffled, was born. He belonged by birth to a race of regenerate Rishis. How did he become a follower of the ways of a Kshatriya?

Lord, tell me in detail about the circumstances of Rama's birth. Also tell me how Viswamitra, who was a son of the race of Kusika and born a Kshatriya, became Brahmana and a Brahmarishi. Ah, great indeed was the puissance of the high-souled Rama, as also that of Viswamitra. Why did Richaka's grandson and not his son become a Kshatriya in deeds? Why did the Kusika's grandson and not his son become a Brahmana? Why did such an exceptional fate overtake the grandsons of both, instead of their sons? I implore you, explain the truth of both these to me.'

Bhishma says, 'O Bharata, an ancient itihasa is related with regard to these, of a discourse between Chyavana and Kusika. Endowed with great intelligence, Chyavana of Bhrigu's race, that best of Rishis, saw with his spiritual eye the stain that would affect his own race because of his descendant marrying a Kshatriya. Reflecting upon the merits and faults of that marriage, as also its strength and weakness, Chyavana, possessed of tapodhana, wanted to consume the race of the Kusikas, for he knew it was from that race that the taint of Kshatriya dharma stained his own vamsa.

Chyavana went into the presence of King Kusika, and said to him, "O sinless one, the desire has arisen in my heart to stay with you for some time."

Kusika said, "Holy One, living together is something which the wise ordained for girls when they are given away and only in this context do the sages always approve this practice. O Rishi endowed with a wealth of asceticism, the residence which you seek with me is not sanctioned by any law. Yet, however opposed to the dictates of neeti and dharma, I will do what you command."

Ordering a seat to be fetched for Maharishi Chyavana, Kusika, accompanied by his wife, stood in the presence of the Rishi. From a small jar of water, the king offered him water to wash his feet and then, through his servants, caused all the appropriate rites to be duly performed to honour his high-souled guest. Kusika, who always observed his vows and was self-restrained, cheerfully presented the arghya of honey and the other prescribed ingredients to the great Rishi and induced him to accept it.

Having welcomed and honoured the learned Brahmana, the king addressed him and said, "We two await your command. Tell us what we are to do for you, Holy One. If it is our kingdom or wealth or cows, O you of rigid vows, or all that is given away as dakshina in sacrifices which do you want, only tell us and you shall have them all. This palace, the kingdom, this throne of justice, all await your pleasure. You are the Lord of all these. Do you rule the earth, for I am entirely dependent upon you."

Addressed in these words by Kusika, Chyavana of Bhrigu's race, filled with great delight, said to Kusika in reply, "I do not, O king, covet your kingdom, wealth, young women, cows, provinces, or your golden vessels of sacrifice. If it pleases you and your wife, I will observe a certain vrata. I want you and your wife to serve me during that period without any scruple or reserve."

Thus addressed by the Rishi, the king and the queen were filled with joy and answered him, saying, "Tathaastu! Be it so, Rishi." Delighted with the Rishi's words, the king led him into an apartment of the palace. Kusika showed Chyavana everything in that room and said, "This, Holy One, is your bed. Live here as you please. O you imbued with a wealth of intelligence, and my queen and I will strive to provide you every comfort and pleasure."

While they were thus conversing with each other, the sun passed the meridian. The Rishi commanded the king to bring him food and drink. King Kusika, bowing to the Rishi, asked him, “Whatever kind of food is agreeable to you will be brought to you.”

Filled with delight, the Rishi answered, “Let food that is proper be given to me.”

Respectfully, the king said, “So be it!” and fetched the Rishi food of the best and proper kind. Having finished his meal, the holy Chyavana, knower of every dharma, said, “I want to sleep, O powerful one, for slumber steals over me now.”

Going into the bedchamber prepared for him, that best of Rishis laid himself down upon a bed and the king and queen sat themselves down beside him. The Rishi said to them, “Do not, while I sleep, awake me. Keep yourselves awake and continually press my feet for as long as I sleep.”

Without hesitation, Kusika said, “So be it!”

The king and the queen, duly engaged in tending to the Rishi, kept themselves awake all night, and accomplished his bidding with earnestness and attention. Meanwhile the holy Brahmana, having laid his commands upon the king, slept deeply, never once stirring, not even to turn or change his position, for twenty-one days. That whole time, with his wife beside him, and without so much as eating, the king sat contentedly, happily watching over the Muni.

When twenty-one days passed, Chyavana of the Bhrigus awoke and arose of his own accord and went out of the bedchamber without acknowledging the king and queen. Famished and exhausted they followed him, but that foremost of Rishis did not deign to cast a single glance at them. Going a short way, the Rishi abruptly vanished from before their eyes, making himself invisible with his powers of yoga. At this, the king, struck with grief, fell to the ground. Recovering in some moments, he rose and, with his queen, Kusika of great splendour began to look everywhere for the Rishi.’”

"Yudhishtira says, 'After the Rishi disappeared, what did the king and his most blessed queen do? Tell me this, Pitamaha.'

Bhishma says, 'When the Rishi vanished, the king, overwhelmed by tiredness and shame, stricken by grief, returned to his palace with his queen. Entering his palace dejectedly, he spoke not a word to anyone, but was plunged in the thought of Chyavana's inexplicable behaviour. His heart full of despair, Kusika repaired to his private chambers.

There he saw the son of Bhrigu stretched out as before on his bed. Beholding the Rishi there, they were wonderstruck, and reflected again upon that strangest incident. The sight of the Rishi dispelled their fatigue.

They sat beside him again and gently began to press his feet as before. Meanwhile, the great Rishi slept soundly as before but this time he lay on another side. Endowed with great tejas, he slept for another twenty-one days. Fearful of him, the royal couple showed no change in their attitude or sentiment towards the Rishi.

Waking from his slumber, the Rishi addressed the king and his queen, saying, "Rub my body with oil, for I want to bathe."

Though they were famished and tired, they readily assented and approached the Rishi with a costly oil which had been prepared by boiling it a hundred times. While massaging the Rishi who was seated at ease, they refrained from speaking. Without saying a word to make them stop, the Muni suddenly rose and entered the bathing chamber. Everything fit for a king's bath was ready there. But not so much as casting a glance at any of those excellent ablutionaries, let alone using them, Chyavana yet again vanished from before their eyes, using his yoga shakti.

This, however, Lord of the Bharatas, failed to disturb the equanimity of the royal couple. The next time, they saw great Rishi seated, after a bath, on a throne; indeed, it was thus that he showed himself again to the king and the queen. King Kusika with his wife cheerfully offered the Rishi food with great reverence. Endowed with wisdom and with an unmoved heart, Kusika made this offering. "Let the food be brought" were the words that the Rishi then spoke and, assisted by his queen, the king soon brought forth the food. There were diverse kinds of meat, in different preparations, a large variety of vegetables, pot-herbs, juicy cakes too, among those viands, several kinds of sweets, and preparations of milk payasas. Indeed, all the food offered different kinds of taste.

There was also some produce of the wilderness which Rishis like, among them diverse kinds of fruit, fit to be eaten by kings. There were also badaras, ingudas, kasmaryas and bhallatakas, all of which grihastas eat, as also wild produce that vanaprasthas take.

Fearing the Rishi's curse, the king had all kinds of food fetched and prepared for his guest. All this was brought from the kitchen and placed before Chyavana. A fine seat was also set out and a bed, too, was laid. All the food was covered with white cloth. Chyavana of Bhrigu's race, however, set fire to all the dishes and reduced them to ashes. Possessed of great intelligence, the royal couple showed no annoyance at the conduct of the Rishi, who once more made himself invisible before their very eyes.

The Rajarishi Kusika and his queen stood in silence throughout the night, never moving. Endowed with great prosperity, he did not give way in the least to pride or anger. Every day, diverse kinds of good and pure food, excellent beds, abundant bathing oils and herbs and fine clothes of various kinds were kept in readiness in the palace for the Rishi. Indeed, Chyavana could find not the slightest fault in the king.

Then the illumined Rishi said to King Kusika, "Yoke a chariot, O king, and you and your queen take me in it wherever I tell you to."

Without any hesitation, the king answered Chyavana, saying, "So be it!" and he further enquired of the Rishi, "Which chariot shall I fetch? Shall it be my pleasure-carriage or shall it be my war chariot?"

On being asked this by the delighted and contented monarch, the Rishi said, "Yoke your war chariot with which you besiege hostile cities. Indeed, ready your battle-car with every weapon, with its standard and flags, its arrows and javelins and golden columns and poles. It is adorned with tinkling bells and with arches of pure gold. It is always furnished with high and excellent weapons in hundreds."

The king said, "So be it!" and quickly had his battle ratha yoked and fetched, and himself mounted the right side and set his wife upon the left. Among its other accoutrements, Kusika furnished that mighty chariot with his goad of three handles and a point hard as the vajra and sharp as a needle.

Having placed every requisite upon the chariot, the king said to the Rishi, "Holy One, where shall the chariot proceed? Let the son of Bhrigu issue his command. This chariot shall go to the place which you indicate."

Thus addressed, the holy man replied to the king, saying, "Let the ratha go hence, dragged slowly, step by step. Obedient to my will, you two must pull me along in such a way that I do not feel any fatigue and should be borne along pleasantly. Let all your people come out and watch this progress that I make through their midst. Let none approaching me be sent away, I shall give gifts of wealth to all. To the Brahmanas, I shall grant their wishes and bestow upon them wealth without stint. Let this be accomplished, O king, and do not entertain any scruples."

Hearing these words of the Rishi, the king summoned his servants and said, "You should, without any fear, give away whatever the Rishi orders."

Then jewellery and gemstones in abundance, beautiful women, and pairs of sheep, coined and uncoined gold, elephants resembling hills or mountain summits, and all the ministers of the king began to follow the Rishi as he was borne away on that chariot. Cries of "Oh!" and "Alas!" arose from every part of the city which was plunged in grief at that extraordinary sight.

And suddenly the royal couple were struck by the Rishi with that goad with the sharp point. Though they were struck on their backs and faces, Kusika and his queen still showed no sign of protest or agitation. On the other hand, they continued to bear the Rishi on as before. Trembling from head to foot, for no food had passed their lips for fifty nights, and exceedingly weak, the heroic couple somehow succeeded in hauling along that chariot. Being repeatedly and deeply cut by the goad, the royal couple was covered in blood. Indeed, they looked like a pair of Kimsuka trees in the flowering season. Seeing the plight to which their king and queen were reduced, the people were grief-stricken, but fearing the Rishi's curse, they remained silent.

Gathering in knots they said to each other, "Behold the might of tapasya! Although we are angry, we still cannot even look at the holy Rishi. Such is his tejas, such the dazzling splendour of his purified soul. Ah, look also at the endurance of the king and his royal queen. Though bleeding, and worn with toil and hunger, they still drag the chariot along. And notwithstanding the misery and pain the sage has inflicted on Kusika and his queen, they show no sign of their anguish to Chyavana."

Seeing the king and the queen unmoved, Chyavana began to give away large sums of wealth from the king's treasury, as if he were a second Kubera, a Lord of treasures. Even at this, King Kusika showed no mark of dissatisfaction; he did just as the Rishi had commanded regarding the disbursal of gifts. Seeing this, that illustrious and best of Rishis became delighted. Alighting from that excellent chariot, he unharnessed the royal couple.

Having freed them, he said to them in a soft, deep and delighted voice, "I am ready to grant you both any boon you want!"

The son of Bhrigu, moved by fond affection, saw their delicate royal bodies pierced with the goad and bleeding, and laid his blessed palms, whose healing powers were like those of amrita, on their wounds, which promptly vanished.

Then the king answered the Rishi, "My wife and I have felt no toil or pain." And indeed, all their exhaustion and pain had been dispelled by the power of the Rishi.

Pleased no end with them, the illustrious Chyavana said, "I have never before spoken an untruth and it must, therefore, be as I have said. This place on the banks of the Ganga is both delightful and auspicious. I shall keep a vrata here for a while, O king. Do you return to the city for you are exhausted. Come with your wife again tomorrow and you will see me here. You should not give way to wrath or grief, the time has come for you to reap a great reward. That which you covet in your heart shall verily be accomplished."

King Kusika, with a joyful heart, replied to the Rishi in these words of grave import, "I have cherished no wrath or grief, O most blessed one. We have been purified and sanctified by you, Holy One. We have become youthful again. Behold our bodies have become exceedingly beautiful and strong, I do not see those wounds and scars anymore, which you inflicted on us. Verily, my wife and I are in good health. I see my devi has become as beautiful as an Apsara and she is much more comely and radiant than ever before. All this, O great Rishi, is due to your grace and there is nothing astonishing in all this, O most holy and powerful Rishi, who are forever unbaffled."

Chyavana said to him, "Return here with your queen tomorrow, O king."

With these words, the Rajarishi Kusika was dismissed. Saluting the Rishi, the king, now endowed with a handsome body, returned to his capital like a second Indra. His ministers and priests, his troops, dancing women and all his subjects came out to receive him. Surrounded by them, King Kusika, blazing with beauty and splendour, entered his city with a delighted heart, and his praises were sung by bards and encomiasts.

Having entered his city, he performed all his morning rites and ate with his wife. Endowed with great splendour and the handsome and beautiful forms they had obtained as a boon from Chyavana Muni, the royal couple spent the night happily at love. With all their afflictions and pains having ceased, they saw each other with youth renewed and looking like divine beings. Meanwhile, Chyavana, the Rishi possessed of tapodhana, the wealth of tapasya, used his yogic powers to transform the delightful wood on the banks of the Ganga into a magnificent palace full of wealth of every kind, and adorned it with a variety of unearthly jewellery and gems, so that it surpassed Indra's own palace in beauty and splendour.'"

"Bhishma says, 'When the night passed, King Kusika awoke and, after completing his morning rites, and taking his queen with him, he went to the wood where the Rishi had chosen to stay. Arriving there, the king saw a palace made entirely of gold, with a thousand columns, each of which was made of gems and precious stones. It looked like an edifice belonging to the Gandharvas.

Kusika saw in every part of that edifice evidences of celestial design. He saw hills with delightful valleys, lakes with lotuses on their bosom, mansions full of costly and curious artefacts, gateways and arches, O Bhaarata, and the king also saw many wide glades of grassy verdure and resembling level fields of gold. There were many sahakaras adorned with blossoms, ketakas, uddalakas, dhavas, asokas, flowering kundas, and atimuktas. He saw many champakas, tilakas, bhavyas, panasas, banjulas, and karnikaras laden with flowers. The king saw many varanapushpas and creepers called ashtapadika all clipped and tonsured.

The king saw trees on which lotuses of all kinds bloomed in great beauty, and some of which bore flowers of every season. He noticed many mansions that looked like celestial vimanas or like great mountains. In some places, O Bhaarata, there were tanks and lakes full of cool water and others had warm or steaming water. There were diverse kinds of excellent seats, costly beds, bedsteads made of gold, encrusted with jewels, and overlaid with cloths and carpets of exquisite appearance and value. Of foodstuffs, there were vast quantities, all deliciously prepared and ready to eat. There were talking parrots, she-parrots, bhringarajas, kokilas, and katapatras with koyashtikas and kukkubhas, and peacocks, cockerels, datyuhas, jivajivakas, chakoras, monkeys, swans, sarasas and chakravakas.

Here and there he saw bevies of rejoicing Apsaras and conclaves of happy Gandharvas, some of whom were sporting with their wives. The king saw these sights and sometimes the wonderful beings seemed to disappear. The monarch heard melodious songs and pleasing voices of gurus discoursing to their sishyas on the Vedas and the other shastras; and in the lakes he saw geese swim and play harmoniously.

Seeing such wonderful sights, the king began to reflect inwardly, "Is this all real or a dream? Or is it a delusion of my mind? I have, without casting off my earthly body, attained this heaven. This land is either the sacred country of the Uttara-Kurus, or the abode, called Amaravati, of Indra. What are these wonderful sights that I see?"

Reflecting in this strain, the monarch at last saw Chyavana in the golden palace supported by the columns made of jewels and gems, as he lay stretched on a priceless and gorgeous bed. The royal couple approached the Rishi with delighted hearts. Chyavana, however, vanished along with the very bed that he lay upon. The king then saw the Rishi in another part of those woods seated on a mat made of kusa grass, and engaged in silently chanting some high mantras. Thus by his yoga shakti, the Brahmana surprised the king. Then, in a moment all the delightful woods, bevies of Apsaras, bands of Gandharvas and towering, exotic trees disappeared. The banks of the Ganga became as silent as usual, and presented the old aspect of being covered with kusa grass and anthills. King Kusika and his wife, having seen a wonderful sight and its sudden disappearance, were amazed.

With a delighted heart, the monarch addressed his wife and said, "O delightful one, the various scenes and sights found nowhere else, which we have just witnessed, are due to the grace of Chyavana and the power of his tapasya. All that one cherishes in one's imagination can be attained by tapasya and it is superior to sovereignty over the three worlds. Well-performed tapasya leads to mukti.

Behold the power of the high-souled and celestial Rishi Chyavana derived from his tapasya. He can, at his pleasure, create even other worlds than those which exist. Only Brahmanas are born in this world to attain to speech and understanding, and deeds that are so sacred. Who other than Chyavana could do all this? Kingship may be acquired with ease, but the status of a Brahmana is not thus attainable. It was through the power of a Brahmana that we were harnessed to a chariot like well-broken animals!"

Chyavana became aware of these thoughts that passed through the king's mind. The Rishi said to him, "Come here quickly." The royal couple approached the great sage and, bowing their heads, they worshipped him who deserved worship. Praising the monarch, the most knowing Rishi comforted the king and said, "Sit down on that asana."

After this, O monarch, Chyavana, without guile or deceit of any kind, gratified the king with many soft words, and then said, "O king, you have completely conquered the five organs of action, and the five of knowledge, with the mind as their sixth. You have emerged unscathed from the fiery ordeal I prepared for you. Son, you have properly honoured and adored me, O foremost of all persons possessed of speech. You have no sin, not even a minute one, in you. Give me your leave, O king, for I will now return to the place from which I came. I have been exceedingly pleased with you. Do you accept the boon that I am ready to give you.

Kusika said, "In your presence, Holy One, I have lived like a man in the midst of a fire. That I have not been consumed, Chyavana, is sufficient for me. That you are gratified with me is the highest boon that I can have, Brahmana. I have succeeded in rescuing my race from destruction, sinless one, and this for me is the best of boons. I regard this as distinct evidence of your grace. The very goal of my life and kingship has been accomplished; this is the highest fruit of my tapasya. If you have been pleased with me, Chyavana, then I beg you explain some doubts that are in my mind."

Chyavana said, "Accept a boon from me, and tell me what the doubts are in your mind, O king, and I shall certainly clear them."

Kusika said, "If you are pleased with me, Chyavana, tell me your objective in living in my palace for some time, for I desire to hear it. What was your objective in sleeping on the bed I assigned to you for twenty-one days continuously, without changing sides? In going out of the room without speaking a single word? Without any apparent reason, making yourself invisible, and becoming visible again?

Why did you lay down once more and slept as before again for twenty-one days? Go out after you were massaged with oil before your bath? Burn diverse kinds of foods served in my palace? Your sudden journey through my city on the ratha? Your purpose in giving away so much wealth? Your motive in showing us the wonders of the forest created by yoga shakti?

What was your motive for showing us, great Rishi, so many palatial mansions made of gold, bedsteads supported on posts of jewels? Why did all these wonders vanish from our sight? I wish to hear the cause of all this. Thinking of all that you did, Chyavana, I was amazed repeatedly and I failed to find the motive the influenced you. Being endowed with the wealth of tapasya as you are, I wish to hear the truth about everything that you did in detail."

Chyavana said, "Listen to me as I detail the reasons which impelled me to all these actions. Since you have asked me, I cannot refuse to enlighten you, O king. Once, when the Devas assembled together, I heard the Grandsire Brahma say that because of a conflict between Brahmana and Kshatriya tejas, there will occur a fusion in my race. And your grandson, O king, will become endowed with great energy and prowess.

Hearing this, I came here, resolved to exterminate your race, in fact, to turn all your descendants into ashes. Inspired by this motive I came to your palace, and said to you, 'I mean to observe a vrata, attend upon me and serve me dutifully. While living, however, in your house I failed to find any faults in you. It is for that reason, Rajarishi, that you are still alive.

With this resolve I slept for twenty-one days in the hope that somebody would awaken me before I woke up myself. You, however, with your wife, did not awaken me. Even then I was pleased with you. Rising from my bed, I went out of the chamber without saying a word to either of you. I did this, O king, in the hope that you would ask me where I had gone, and thus have an opportunity to curse you.

I then made myself invisible, showed myself in the room in your palace, and once more resorting to yoga shakti, slept for twenty-one days again. I thought that worn out with toil and hunger, you two would be angry with me and do something that would be distasteful to me. That is why I caused you and your wife to be afflicted by hunger. In your heart however, O king, not the slightest feeling of vexation arose. I was delighted with you, king. When I had you bring me diverse kinds of food and then burned them, I hoped that at seeing this you and your wife would yield to anger. However, you accepted whatever I did with no murmur of protest. Ascending your chariot, then, I said to you, 'You and your wife bear me.' You did what I asked, without the least hesitation, king. This delighted me. The gifts of wealth I gave away did not provoke you. Being pleased with you, I created with my yoga shakti the forest which you and your wife saw.

Listen, O king, to the purpose I had. To gratify you and your queen, in your earthly bodies, I showed you a glimpse and a taste of heaven itself in these woods. All this I did to show the power of tapasya and the reward that is in store for righteousness. I know the desire that arose in your heart at the sight of those enchantments: you wanted to acquire the condition of being a Brahmana and the punya which accrues from it, O Lord of the earth; you no longer wanted sovereignty or even Swarga.

To become a Brahmana is exceedingly difficult, Rajan, and after becoming a Brahmana to evolve into a Rishi is even more so. And for a Rishi to become a true Sannyasi is still harder. But I say to you that your wish will be granted. From you, O Kusika, will spring a Brahmana, who shall be called after your name. That man will be the third in descent from you and will attain the status of a Brahmana.

Through the shakti of the Bhrigus, your grandson, O king, will be a Rishi endowed with the splendour of fire. He shall always strike fear into the hearts all men, indeed, into the inhabitants of the three worlds. O Rajarishi, accept the boon that is now in your mind. I shall soon set out on a tirtha yatra to all the sacred waters and fords. My time is running out."

Kusika said, "Even this, magnificent Rishi, is a great boon, for you have been gratified by me. Let what you have said come to pass. Let my grandson become a Brahmana and the status of Brahmatva attach itself to my race, O sinless one. This is the boon I ask for, but Bhrigunandana, most Holy One, tell me in detail how will the lofty condition of Brahmanahood attach to my race? Who will be my friend? Who will have my affection and respect?"

Chyavana said, “I should certainly tell you everything about the reasons for which I came here to exterminate your vamsa. It is well known that, in sacrifices, Kshatriyas must always have the assistance of the sons of Bhrigu. Through an irresistible decree of destiny, the Kshatriyas and the Bhargavas will fall out. The Kshatriyas, O king, afflicted by a law of fate, will slaughter the race of Bhrigus, not even sparing infants in their mothers’ wombs. Then, in Bhrigu’s race a Rishi with the name of Urva will be born. Endowed with great tejas, he will resemble fire or the sun in glory. He will know such wrath upon hearing of the extermination of his race that it will do for him to consume the three worlds. He will be powerful enough to reduce all the earth, with all her mountains and forests, to ashes; and for a while he will quell the flames of that fiery rage, by casting it into the mouth of the Mare that wanders through the ocean deeps. He will have a son named Richika. through a decree of destiny all the science of arms in its embodied form will come to him, for the extermination of the entire Kshatriya race. Receiving that science by inward light, he will, through yoga shakti, communicate it to his son, the most blessed Jamadagni of pure soul.

That tiger of Bhrigu’s race will bear that astra shastra in his mind. O righteous one, Jamadagni will marry a girl from your race, to spread its glory, lord of the Bharatas. Having acquired the daughter of Gadhi, and your granddaughter, that great Rishi will beget an enlightened son imbued with Kshatriya gunas. A Kshatriya son will be born into your vamsa, blessed with the virtues of a Brahmana. Possessed of great dharma, he will be the son of Gadhi. Known by the name of Viswamitra, he will in tejas come to be regarded as the equal of Brihaspati himself. The illustrious Richika will give this son to your vamsa, this Kshatriya of lofty tapasya. Two women shall be the cause of this exchange of sons, a Kshatriya son into the race of Bhrigu and a Brahmana son into your vamsa.

All this will come to pass at the command of the Grandsire and not otherwise. To Brahmanatva will be attached one who is third in descent from you, and you will become a kinsman of the Bhargavas through marriage.'"

"Bhishma continues, 'Hearing these words of Maharishi Chyavana, King Kusika was filled with joy, and cried, "Indeed, O best of the Bharatas, so be it!"

Chyavana spoke to the king again and urged him to accept a boon for himself.

The king replied, "Very well. From you, O Mahamuni, I shall obtain the fruition of my wish. Let my race become invested with the status of Brahmanatva, and let it always set its heart upon dharma."

Chyavana Muni granted the king's prayer and, bidding farewell to the monarch, set out on his tirtha yatra.

I have now told you everything, Bhaarata, about how the Bhrigus and the Kusikas became connected to each other by marriage. Indeed, O king, everything fell out as Rishi Chyavana had said. The birth of Rama of Bhrigu's vamsa and of Viswamitra of Kusika's came to pass in the way that Chyavana had indicated.'"

CANTO 57

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, I am overwhelmed to hear what you say. Reflecting that the earth is now destitute of almost all her kings and Kshatriyas, all of great power and prosperity, my heart is full of grief. Having conquered the earth and acquired kingdoms, counted by hundreds, Bhaarata, I am roiled with sorrow at the thought of the millions of men I have slaughtered. Alas, what will be the plight of those royal Kshatriya women whom we have deprived of their husbands and sons and fathers, uncles and brothers? Having slain those Kurus—our kinsmen, our friends and well-wishers—we shall have to fall into hell, with our heads hanging down. There is no doubt about this.

I want, O my Grandsire, to mortify my body with the most extreme penance. With that end in view, I beg you, instruct me what I should do.'"

"Vaisampayana continued, 'The Mahatman Bhishma listens to what Yudhishtira says, reflects upon it deeply for a while, then replies.

Bhishma says, 'Listen to what I say to you, Yudhishtira, for what I have to say is exceedingly wonderful, and constitutes a great mystery. I will tell you about what ends men acquire after death as the rewards for particular deeds or courses of action they follow.

One attains swarga through tapasya. By penance one attains fame. Through tapasya, O powerful king, one attains a long life and all things of enjoyment. Through penance one attains to knowledge, to wisdom, to health and freedom from disease, to beauty and radiance of person, to prosperity, and to blessedness, Lord of the Bharata vamsa. With tapasya one attains to wealth.

By observing the vow of mowna, of silence, one succeeds in bringing the whole world under one's sway. By giving dana, one acquires all kinds of pleasures and things of luxury.

By observing the rite of diksha one finds birth into a good and high family. Those that spend their lives subsisting upon fruits and roots, and avoiding cooked food, succeed in gaining kingdom and sovereignty. Those that live upon the leaves of plants and trees as their food succeed in attaining to swarga. He that subsists drinking only water surely attains swarga.

By giving gifts one merely increases one's wealth. By serving one's guru with reverence one acquires gyana. By performing sraddhas every day in honour of one's Pitris, one gains a large number of children. By observing diksha upon herbs and vegetables, one acquires a large number of kine. Those that subsist upon grass and straw succeed in attaining to heaven.

By bathing thrice every day with the necessary rites, one gains many wives. By living upon just water one acquires the regions of Prajapati. The Brahmana, who bathes every day and recites sacred mantras during the three sandhyas, becomes possessed of the status of Daksha Prajapati himself. By worshipping the Devas in a wilderness or desert, one acquires a kingdom or some great sovereignty, and by observing the vow of casting off the body through a long fast one goes straight into swarga.

One who owns the wealth of tapasya and who always passes his days in yoga acquires fine beds to lie upon, and seats and chariots and carriages. Casting off the body by entering a blazing fire, one becomes an object of reverence in Brahmaloka. Those that lie on bare and hard ground gain opulent houses and furnishings. Those that clothe themselves in rags and tree-bark obtain rich robes and ornaments. By not indulging the several agreeable tastes one succeeds in acquiring great prosperity. By abstaining from meat and fish, one gets long-lived children.

He who passes some time in the way of life called Udavasa becomes the very Lord of heaven. The man who speaks the truth, O best of men, succeeds in living in joy with the Devas themselves. By giving dana and dakshina one finds great fame in consequence of one's lofty achievements. Through abstention from cruelty one acquires health and freedom from disease. By serving Brahmanas with reverence one attains to kingdom and sovereignty, and the status of a Brahmana. By making gifts of water and other drinks, one acquires eternal fame. By making gifts of food one acquires diverse articles of enjoyment. One who gives peace to all creatures, by refraining from doing them any injury, is freed from every world.

By serving the Devas, a man obtains a kingdom and celestial beauty. By lighting lamps and bringing light to dark places frequented by men, one acquires excellent vision. By giving away goodly and beautiful objects one acquires a good memory and understanding. By giving away scents and garlands, one acquires fame that spreads far and wide. Those who abstain from shaving their hair and beards succeed in having noble children. By observing vratas and diksha and regular snanas, for twelve years, according to the shastra, a man acquires a realm superior to those attained by Kshatriyas who die in battle.

By bestowing one's daughter on an eligible bridegroom, according to Brahma vivaha, one gains, O best of men, male and female slaves and ornaments and fields and houses. By performing sacrifices and keeping fasts, one ascends to swarga. The man who gives away flowers and fruits succeeds in acquiring the most auspicious knowledge. The man who gives a thousand kine with horns adorned with gold, finds heaven. Even this has been said by the very Devas in a conclave in Devaloka.

He who gives away a Kapila cow with her calf, with a brazen pot for milking, and horns adorned with gold, and possessed of diverse other auspicious qualities, finds the fruition of all his wishes from that cow. Such a man, because of that gift, dwells in swarga for as many years as there are hairs on the body of the cow and, why he rescues his sons and grandsons and all his clan to the seventh generation from naraka in the next world.

The regions of the Vasus become accessible to that man who gives away a cow with horns beautifully adorned with gold, accompanied with a brazen jar for milking, along with a piece of cloth embroidered with gold thread, a measure of sesame and a sum of money as dakshina. A gift of kine rescues the giver in the next world when he finds himself falling into the deep darkness of hell; he finds himself restrained by his own punya karma in this world, like a boat with sails that have caught the wind, saving a man from being drowned at sea.

He who bestows a daughter according to Brahma vivaha upon an eligible and deserving groom, or who makes a gift of land to a Brahmana, or who gives food to a Brahmana with due rites, attains to Indraloka, the kingdom of Purandara. That man who makes a gift of a house, well furnished, to a Brahmana given to Vedic studies and possessed of every accomplishment and good conduct, finds residence in the country of the Uttara-Kurus.

By making gifts of draft bullocks, one acquires the realm of the Vasus. Gifts of gold lead to swarga. Gifts of pure gold lead to greater punya still. By making a gift of a fine parasol or chatra one acquires a palatial mansion. By making a gift of a pair of sandals or shoes one acquires fine conveyances. The reward attached to a gift of cloths is personal beauty, and by making gifts of scents one becomes a fragrant person in one's next life.

One who gives flowers and fruit, plants and trees to a Brahmana acquires, without any labour, a palatial mansion with beautiful women and a plenitude of wealth. The giver of food and drink of different tastes and of other things of pleasure gains a copious wealth of even such things of every enjoyment.

The giver, again, of houses and clothes receives houses and clothes. There is no doubt about this. The man who makes gifts of garlands and incense and scents and lotions and unguents such as men use after bathing, and floral wreaths, to Brahmanas, is freed from every disease and gains great personal beauty, and sports in joy in the world kept for great kings. The man, O king, who makes to a Brahmana the gift of a house that is stocked with grain, furnished with comfortable beds and mattresses, and full of gold and other wealth, a mansion auspicious and altogether delightful, receives for himself an even more palatial dwelling. He who gives to a Brahmana a good bed perfumed with fragrant scents, covered with fine sheets, and soft pillows, wins without any effort on his part a beautiful wife, belonging to a high family and loving, agreeable and obedient.

The man who dies a Kshatriya's death on the field of battle becomes the equal of the Pitamaha Brahma himself. There is no end higher than this. Even this is what the great Rishis have declared.'

Hearing these words of his grandfather, Yudhishtira, the delighter of the Kurus, becomes eager for the end that is kept for Kshatriyas and no longer expresses any disgust at leading a grihasta's life. Then, O foremost of men, Yudhishtira, addressing all the other sons of Pandu, says to them, 'Let the words which our Grandsire has spoken command your faith.'

At this, all the Pandavas, with the famed Draupadi amongst them, laud the words of Yudhishtira and say, ‘Yes, so be it.’”

"Yudhishtira says, 'I desire, lord of the Bharatas, to hear from you what rewards accrue from the planting of trees and the digging of tanks.'

Bhishma says, 'A piece of land that is pleasing to look at, fertile, situated in a scenic place, adorned with diverse kinds of precious metals, and inhabited by all sorts of living creatures, is regarded as the best. A part of such a piece of land should be chosen for digging a tank. I will tell you, in due order, about the different kinds of tanks. I will also tell you what the merits are that attach to the digging of tanks, with a view to draw water for the benefit of all creatures.

The man who causes a tank to be dug becomes entitled to the respect and worship of the three worlds. A tank full of water is as agreeable and beneficial as the house of a friend. It is gratifying to Surya himself. It also contributes to the nurture of the Devas. It is the foremost of all things that lead to fame for the one who causes it to be excavated. The wise have said that the excavation of a tank contributes to the three purusharthas—dharma, artha and kama. A tank is said to be properly excavated if it is dug on land that belongs to those worthy of respect. A tank is said to serve all the four purposes of living creatures. Tanks, again, are regarded as enhancing, indeed constituting, the beauty and grace of a country.

The Devas and Manavas and Gandharvas and Pitris and Uragas and Rakshasas, and even immobile beings all resort to a tank full of fine water as their refuge. I shall, therefore, tell you what the merits are that have been said by great Rishis to be attached to tanks, and what the rewards are that are attained by men that have them created. The wise have said that blessed indeed is the man whose tank is a repository for rainwater during the monsoon. The reward reaped in the world by the one who makes a gift of a thousand kine is won by that man whose tank contains water in autumn. The man whose tank holds water during winter acquires the merit of one who performs a sacrifice with plentiful gifts of gold.

He whose tanks have water in the season of dew wins, the wise have said, the merits of an Agnishtoma sacrifice. That man in whose well-wrought tank water occurs in the season of spring acquires the punya of the Atiratra yagna. That man in whose tank water occurs in summer acquires, the Rishis say, the merits that attach to an Aswamedha yagna.

That man rescues all his race in whose tank kine are seen to allay their thirst and from which righteous men draw their water. That man in whose tank cows slake their thirst, as also other animals and birds, and humans, surely acquires the punya of a horse sacrifice. Whatever measure of water is drunk from one's tank and whatever measure is taken therefrom by others to bathe, becomes stored punya for the weal of the excavator of the tank and he enjoys the fruit of that merit for unending days in the next world.

Water, especially in the other world, is difficult to obtain, O son. A gift of drink produces eternal happiness. Make gifts of sesame here. Make gifts of water. Do you also give lamps to light dark places. While alive and awake, you sport in happiness with your kinsmen. These are things which you will not be able to do in the other world.

The gift of drink, O chief of men, is superior to every other gift. In regard to punya it is distinguished above all other gifts. Therefore, do you make gifts of water.

Even thus have the Rishis declared the lofty punya of the excavation of tanks to be. I will now tell you about the planting of trees. Of immobile beings, the achalas, six classes have been spoken of—Vrikshas, Gulmas, Latas, Vallis, Twaksaras, and Trinas of diverse kinds. These are the several kinds of plants. Listen now to the punya that attaches to their planting.

By planting trees one acquires fame in the world of men and auspicious rewards in the world hereafter. Such a man is lauded and reverenced in the world of the Pitris. Such a man's name does not perish even when he becomes a dweller in Devaloka. The man who plants trees redeems the ancestors and descendants of both his father's and his mother's vamsas. Do you, therefore, plant trees, O Yudhishtira.

The trees that a man plants become the planter's children. There is no doubt about this. Leaving this world, such a man goes straight into swarga; many eternal regions of bliss become his. Trees gratify the Devas with their flowers; the Pitris by their fruits; and all guests and strangers by the shade they provide. Kinnaras, Uragas, Rakshasas, and Devas, Gandharvas and Manavas, as also Rishis, all have recourse to trees as their refuge. Trees that bear flowers and fruit gratify all men. The planter of trees is saved in the next world by the trees he plants, even like children saving their father. Thus, the man who wises his own weal should plant trees by the side of tanks and cherish them like his own children. The trees that a man plants are, according to both reason and the scriptures, certainly the children of the planter.

That Brahmana who excavates a tank, and he that plants trees, and he that performs sacrifices, are all worshipped in heaven even as men that are devoted to perfect truthfulness of speech. Hence should one cause tanks to be dug and trees to be planted, worship the deities in diverse sacrifices, and speak the truth.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Amongst all the gifts that are mentioned in the treatises other than the Vedas, which gift, O Lord of the Kuruvamsa, is the most distinguished in your opinion? O puissant one, great is the curiosity I feel about this. Do you also discourse to me about that gift which follows the giver into the next world.'

Bhishma says, 'An assurance to all creatures of love and affection and abstention from every kind of injury, acts of kindness and favour done to a person in distress, gifts made to one that solicits with thirst and satisfying the solicitor's wishes, and whatever gifts are given without the giver ever thinking of them as gifts made by him, constitute, O Yudhishtira, the highest and best of all dana.

Gifts of gold, gifts of kine, and gifts of land—these are regarded as sin-cleansing. They rescue the giver from his evil deeds. Do you always make such gifts to those that are righteous. Without doubt, gifts save the giver from all his sins. The man who wishes to make his gifts eternal should always give to deserving persons, and give whatever they wish for and whatever things are the best in his home. The man who makes gifts of agreeable things and who does unto others what is agreeable to them, always succeeds in acquiring things that are agreeable to himself. Such a man certainly becomes beloved of all, both here and hereafter.

That man, O Yudhishtira, is a cruel wretch who, through vanity, does not to the extent of his means attend to the wishes of one who is poor and helpless and solicits his help. And he is verily the best of men who shows favour to even a helpless enemy fallen into distress, when such an enemy presents himself and prays for help. No man is equal to him in merit who satisfies the hunger of an emaciated person who is possessed of learning, destitute of the means of support, and weakened by misery. One should always, O son of Kunti, dispel by every means in one's power, the distress of righteous men who keep vows and whose deeds are in accord with dharma, and who, though destitute of sons and wives and plunged in misery, do not yet solicit others for any kind of assistance.

Those who do not utter blessings upon the gods and men in expectation of gifts, who are deserving of reverence and always contented, and who subsist upon such alms as they get without solicitation of any kind, are regarded as veritable snakes of virulent poison. Do you, O Bhaarata, always protect yourself from them by giving them generous gifts. Such men are competent to make the foremost of Ritwiks. You must seek them out through your spies and agents. You should honour those men with gifts of fine houses, furnished with every necessity and luxury, with slaves and serving men, with fine robes and vestments, O son of Kuru, and indeed with everything that can contribute to their pleasure and happiness.

Righteous men of righteous deeds should make such gifts, impelled by the motive that it is their duty to act in this manner and not from the desire of reaping any rewards. Verily, good men should give in this way so that the virtuous men I have described might not, O Yudhishtira, feel any disinclination to accept those gifts sanctified by devotion and faith. There are persons bathed in learning and immersed in vows. Without depending upon anyone they obtain their means of subsistence. These Brahmanas of rigid vows are devoted to Vedic study and penance, without ever proclaiming their practices. Whatever gifts you make to such men of pure conduct, of thorough mastery over their senses, and always contented with their own wives in the matter of desire, are sure to win for you a merit that will go with you into all the worlds into which you may go.

One reaps the same punya by giving dana to regenerate men of restrained souls that one wins by properly pouring libations into the sacred fire morning and evening. Even this is the sacrifice laid out for you—a sacrifice that is sanctified by bhakti and sraddha and that is endowed with dakshina. It is distinguished above all other sacrifices. Let that sacrifice ceaselessly flow from you even as you give. Performed in the view of such men, O Yudhishtira, a sacrifice in which the water that is sprinkled to dedicate gifts constitutes the oblations in honour of the Pitris, and the devotion and worship rendered to such superior men, serves to free one of the debts one owes to the Devas.

Those that do not yield to wrath and that never desire to take even a blade of grass that belongs to others, as also they that are of agreeable speech, deserve to receive from us the most reverent worship. Such men and others, because they are free from desire, never pay their regards to the giver; nor do they strive to receive any gifts. They should, however, be cherished by givers even as they cherish their own sons. I bow my head down to them; from them both heaven and Hell may become one's own.

Ritwiks and Purohitas and Acharyas, who are knowers of the Vedas and who yet behave mildly towards disciples, become such men. Beyond doubt, Kshatriya prowess and energy lose their force upon encountering a Brahmana. Thinking that you are a king, that you possess great power, and that you have vast affluence, do not, O Yudhishtira, think to enjoy your prosperity without giving anything to the Brahmanas. Observing your svadharma, worship the Brahmanas with whatever wealth you have, O sinless one, to embellish your fortune and to sustain your power.

Let the Brahmanas live in whatever way they like; you must always bow your head before them with reverence. Let them always rejoice in you as your children, living happily and according to their wishes. Who other than you, O Kurusattama, can provide their means of subsistence for such Brahmanas as are endowed with eternal contentment, as are your well-wishers, and as are gratified by having only a little? As women have one eternal duty in this world—dependence upon and obedient service to their husbands—and as such duty constitutes their only end, even so is the service to Brahmanas our eternal duty and purpose.

If, at the sight of cruelties and other sinful deeds in Kshatriyas, the Brahmanas, O son, dishonoured by us, forsake us all, I say to you, of what use would life be to us in the absence of all contact with the holy ones, most especially since we shall then have to drag our lives on without being able to study the Vedas to perform sacrifices, to hope for worlds of bliss hereafter, and to achieve great feats? Let me, in this connection, tell you what the eternal usage is.

In days of yore, O king, the Kshatriyas used to serve the Brahmanas. The Vaisya, similarly, in those antique days worshipped the Kshatriyas, and the Sudra worshipped and served the Vaisya. Even this is what we have heard.

The Brahmana was like a blazing fire. Without being able to touch him or approach his presence, the Sudra would serve the Brahmana from a distance. It was only the Kshatriya and the Vaisya who could serve the Brahmana by touching his person or approaching his presence. The Brahmanas are endowed with a mild disposition. They are truthful in their conduct. They are followers of the sanatana dharma, the true religion. When angry, they are like snakes of virulent poison. Such being their nature, do you, O Yudhishtira, serve and attend upon them with obedience and reverence.

Brahmanas are superior to even those that are higher than all the high and the low. The tejas and tapasya of even those Kshatriyas who blaze forth with energy and might, become as nought when they are faced with the bala of the Brahmanas. My father himself is not dearer to me than the Brahmanas. My mother is not dearer to me than they. My Grandsire, O king, is not dearer, my own self is not dearer, and my life itself is not dearer to me than the Brahmanas.

On this earth there is nothing, O Yudhishtira, that is dearer to me than you are. But, Lord of the Bharata vamsa, the Brahmanas are dearer to me than even you.

I tell you this truly, O son of Pandu. I swear by this truth, through which I hope to acquire all those realms of bliss that have become my father Santanu's. Even now I behold those sacred regions with Brahma shining conspicuously before them. I shall repair thence, my son, and dwell in those worlds for unending days. Seeing these worlds, O best of the Bharatas, with my spiritual eyes, I am filled with joy at the thought of everything that I have ever done to help and honour the Brahmanas, O king.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'To which of two Brahmanas, when both are equally pure in their conduct, equally possessed of learning and purity, of birth and blood, but differing from each other in only that one solicits and the other does not—Pitamaha, to whom would a gift be more meritorious?'

Bhishma says, 'It has been told, son of Pritha, that a gift made to an unsoliciting person produces greater punya than one made to a person who asks. One possessed of contentment is certainly more deserving than that person who is destitute of that virtue and is, therefore, helpless amidst the storms and buffets of the world. The strength of a Kshatriya consists in the protection he gives to others. The strength of a Brahmana consists in his refusal to solicit. The Brahmana possessed of steadfastness and learning and contentment gladdens the very gods. The wise have said that an act of solicitation on the part of a poor man is a great reproach. Those that beg from others are said to annoy the world like thieves and robbers. The man who begs is said to meet with death; the one who gives, however, does not meet death. The giver is said to grant life to him who asks. Through an act of giving dana, O Yudhishtira, the giver is said to save his own self as well.

Compassion, karuna, is a very high virtue. Let people make gifts from compassion for those that ask. Those, however, that do not beg, but are plunged into poverty and distress should be respectfully and reverently invited to receive assistance. If such Brahmanas, who must be regarded as the foremost of their varna, live in your kingdom, you should look upon them as fire covered with ashes. Blazing with tapasya, they are capable of consuming the very earth. Such men, O son of Kuru's race, though not generally worshipped, must still be regarded as deserving of worship in every way. Endowed with gyana and dhrishti, tapasya and yoga, such men always deserve our worship. O Parantapa, always offer worship to such Brahmanas. One should go of one's own accord to those greatest Brahmanas that do not beg or ask anything from anybody, and make gifts of diverse kinds of wealth to them, in abundance.

The merit that flows from properly pouring libations into the sacred fire every morning and evening is won by the person who gives dana to a Brahmana endowed with knowledge, with the Vedas and with high and excellent vratas. You should, O son of Kunti, invite to you such Brahmanottamas as are cleansed by gyana and the Vedas and by vows, who live in independence, whose Vedic studies and penances are hidden without being proclaimed from any house-top, and who are observant of noble vratas, and honour them with gifts of well-constructed and delightful houses furnished with servitors, fine robes and every amenity, and all things of pleasure and enjoyment. Being conversant with every duty and possessed of acute vision, those greatest of Brahmanas, O Yudhishtira, might accept the gifts offered to them with devotion and respect, thinking that they should not refuse these and disappoint the giver.

You should invite to you those Brahmanas whose wives wait for their return like tillers in expectation of rain. Having fed them well, you should make gifts of additional food to them so that upon their return home their waiting wives be able to distribute that food among their children that clamoured for food but were pacified with promises. Brahmacharins of restrained senses, O son, by eating at one's house in the forenoon, cause the three grihapatyas, the sacrificial fires of the home, to be gratified with the grihasta in whose house they eat. Let the sacrifice of dana proceed in your house at midday, O son, and do you also give away kine and gold and fine garments to your guests after feeding them well.

By conducting yourself in this way, you are sure to gratify the king of the Devas himself. And that would constitute your third sacrifice, Yudhishtira, in which offerings are made to the Devas, the Pitris and the Brahmanas. By such sacrifice you are sure to gratify the Viswedevas. Let compassion, or daya, towards to all creatures, giving to them all creatures what is their due, restraining the senses, renunciation, steadiness, and truth, constitute the final bath, the avabhrita snana, of that sacrifice which is constituted by dana.

Even this is the sacrifice that is spread out for you—a yagna that is sanctified by bhakti and sraddha, and that has a vast dakshina attached to it. This sacrifice of giving is distinguished above all other sacrifices, my son, and so let this sacrifice always be performed by you.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'I wish to know in detail, O Bhaarata, where one meets with the high rewards of gifts and sacrifices. Are those rewards earned here or are they to come in the hereafter? Which amongst these two, dana and yagna, is said to yield the superior punya? To whom should gifts be made? In what manner are gifts and sacrifices to be made? When, also, are they to be made? I ask you all these. Most learned Pitamaha, discourse to me on the dharma of dana. Tell me what leads to the higher reward—gifts made from the sacrificial platform or those made out of that place?'

Bhishma says, 'A Kshatriya is usually engaged in deeds of fierceness. In his case, sacrifices and gifts are regarded as purifying or sanctifying him. They that are good and righteous do not accept the gifts of those of the royal order who are given to sinful deeds. For this reason, the king should perform sacrifices with abundant gifts in the form of dakshina.

If the good and the righteous accept the gifts made to them, the Kshatriya should incessantly give dana to them with devotion and faith. Dana is productive of great punya; giving is a most purifying act. Observing vows, one should perform sacrifices and gratify with wealth such Brahmanas as are friends to all creatures, possessed of righteousness, conversant with the Vedas, and pre-eminent for their deeds, their conduct, and their tapasya. If such Brahmanas do not accept your gifts, no merit becomes yours.

Perform sacrifices with copious dakshina, and make gifts of good and agreeable food to those that are righteous. While giving dana, you should regard yourself as performing a sacrifice. With generous gifts you adore those Brahmanas who perform sacrifices. By doing this you will acquire a share in the punya of their yagnas.

You must always support such Brahmanas as have children and as are capable through their power of sending men into swarga. By conducting yourself in this manner you are sure to beget numerous and noble progeny, why, they say as many as the Prajapati himself.

They that are righteous support and advance the cause of all deeds of dharma. Even by giving up one's all, support such men, as also those that do good to all creatures. Yourself being in the midst of the enjoyment of affluence, do you, O Yudhishtira, make gifts of cows and bullocks and food and parasols and fine umbrellas, and rich robes and sandals or shoes to deserving Brahmanas.

To sacrificing Brahmanas give ghrita, as also other fine and sattvic food and chariots and carriages with horses harnessed, and dwellings and mansions and soft beds. Such gifts are fraught with prosperity and affluence to the giver, and are regarded as pure, O Bhaarata. Those Brahmanas who cannot be censured for anything they do, and who have no means of support, should be sought out. Covertly or publicly do you cherish such Brahmanas by giving them the means of support. Such karma always confers higher punya upon Kshatriyas than even the Rajasuya and the Aswamedha yagnas. For through such karma, you will cleanse yourself of sin and become sure of attaining swarga.

Filling your treasury, you should do all the good that you can to your kingdom. Through this you are sure to win great wealth and become a Brahmana in your next life. O Bhaarata, protect your own wealth and livelihood, as well as your power to do good to others, especially to provide the needy with the means of sustenance. You support your servants as your own children. Protect the Brahmanas so that they can peacefully enjoy what they have and also give them whatever they do not have.

Let your life be devoted to the cause of the Brahmanas. Let it never be said that you do not grant protection to Brahmanas. Too much wealth or affluence, when possessed by a Brahmana, becomes a source of evil to him. Constant association with affluence and prosperity is certain to fill him with pride and cause him to be blinded to his true svadharma. If the Brahmanas become torpid and steeped in folly, dharma and karma are sure to be destroyed. Without doubt, if righteousness and duty are destroyed, that will lead to the destruction of all creatures.

That king who, having amassed wealth, makes it over for safe-keeping to his treasury officers and soldiers and guards, and then begins again to plunder his kingdom, saying to his men, "Bring me as much wealth as you can extort from the kingdom," and who spends the wealth, collected at his command through fear and cruelty, in the performance of sacrifices, should know that those yagnas of his are never approved, let alone lauded by the righteous.

The king should perform sacrifices with such wealth as is willingly paid into his treasury by prosperous and unpersecuted subjects. Sacrifices should never be performed with wealth acquired through severity and extortion. The just king should perform mahayagnas, great sacrifices, with large gifts in the form of dakshina, only when, because of his being devoted to the good of his subjects, they of their own accord shower him with copious wealth brought willingly by them for him to spend in offering worship.

The king must protect the wealth of the old, of minors, of the blind, and of those that are otherwise weak or handicapped. The king should never take any wealth from his people, if they, in a season of drought, succeed in growing any corn using water from wells. Nor should he take any wealth from weeping women. The wealth taken from the poor and the helpless is sure to destroy the kingdom and the prosperity of the king. The king should always make gifts of all things of enjoyment in abundance to the good and the righteous. He should assuredly dispel all fear of starvation which such men may have.

There are no men more sinful than those upon whose food children look with wistfulness without being able to eat. If within your kingdom any learned Brahmana languishes from hunger like any such children, you will incur the sin of foeticide for having allowed this.

King Sibi himself had said, "Fie on that king in whose kingdom a Brahmana or even any other man goes hungry.' The kingdom in which a Snataka Brahmana goes hungry is quickly overwhelmed with adversity. Such a kingdom, with its king, incurs dire censure. That king is more dead than alive in whose kingdom women are easily abducted from the midst of husbands and sons, even as they scream and cry in outrage and sorrow.

The people of a king who does not protect them should arm themselves to slay him, who only plunders their wealth, who confounds all discrimination, who is ever incapable of leading them in dharma, who is without compassion, and who is regarded as the most sinful of rulers.

That king who tells his people that he is their protector but who does not or is unable to protect them, should be killed by his people, even like a dog that has become rabid.

A fourth part of whatever sins that his subjects commit cling to that king who does not protect them. Some say that all the sins of his people fall on the head of such a king. Others are of the opinion that half of his people's sins become his. However, bearing in mind the Manu smritis, it is my opinion that a fourth part of his people's sins becomes the unprotecting king's.

That king, who properly protects his subjects, gains a fourth part of whatever punya his people acquire while living under his protection. Yudhishtira, rule your kingdom in such a way that all your subjects look upon you as their refuge as long as you are alive, even as all living creatures seek the succour of the god of rain or as the winged denizens of the air seek the refuge of a large tree. Let all your kinsmen and all your friends and well-wishers, O scorcher of your enemies, seek you out as their refuge even as the Rakshasas do Kubera or the Devas do Indra.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'People accept with love and joy the declarations of the Srutis which say, "This is to be given. This other thing is also to be given!" As regards kings, again, they make gifts of various things to various men. What, however, Pitamaha, is the best or the foremost of all gifts?'

Bhishma says, 'Of all kinds of gifts, the gift of land has been said to be the first in point of merit. Land is immovable and indestructible. It yields to him who owns it all the best things upon which his heart may be set. It yields robes and vestments, ornaments and gemstones, animals, paddy and barley. Amongst all creatures, the giver of land grows in prosperity for ever and ever. As long as the earth lasts, so long does the felicity of the giver of land grow.

There is no gift that is higher, O Yudhishtira, than bhumidana. I have heard that all men have given a little quantity of earth; and since all men have made gifts of earth, hence do all men enjoy a little of the earth. Whether in this or in the next world, all creatures live under conditions that depend upon their own actions. The earth is prosperity's self. She is a mighty goddess. She makes him her Lord in the next life who makes gifts of her in this life to others. That person, O best of kings, who gives away earth, which is indestructible, as dakshina, is born in his next life as a man and also becomes a lord of lands. The measure of one's enjoyment in this life is commensurate with the measure of one's gifts in a previous life. This is the conclusion to which all the scriptures point.

A Kshatriya should either give away the earth in dakshina or cast off his life in battle. Even this constitutes the highest source of prosperity with regard to Kshatriyas. We have heard that land, bhumi, when given away, purifies and sanctifies the giver. The man of sin, who is guilty of even Brahmahatya, the killing of a Brahmana, and of every falsehood, is purified of his sin by giving a gift of earth. Indeed, a gift of land saves even the worst sinner from all his sins.

The righteous accept only gifts of land and no other thing from kings that are sinful. Like one's mother, the earth, when given away, cleanses both the giver and the taker. And this is an eternal and secret name of the earth—Priyadatta. Given away or accepted in gift, the name that is dear to her is Priyadatta. The gift of earth is the most desirable. That king who makes a gift of earth to a learned Brahmana, obtains from that gift a kingdom.

Upon being reborn in this world, such a giver without doubt attains to a position equal to that of a king. Hence, a king as soon as he gets earth, should make gifts of land to the Brahmanas. None but a Lord of earth is competent to make gifts of land. Nor should one who is not a deserving one accept a bhumidana. They who desire land should, without any doubt, make gifts of earth.

That man who takes away earth belonging to a righteous man never receives any earth. By making gifts of earth to the righteous, one gets good earth. Of virtuous soul, such a giver acquires great fame both here and hereafter. That righteous king about whom the Brahmanas say, "We live on land given to us by him," is such that his very enemies cannot utter the least reproach about his kingdom.

Whatever sins a man commits from want of the means of support, are all washed away by a gift of only so much earth as is covered by a cow-hide. Those kings that are mean in their actions or are of fierce deeds, should be taught that bhumidana is exceedingly cleansing and is the highest gift in respect of punya. The ancients thought that there was always very little difference between the man who performs an Aswamedha yagna and him that makes a gift of earth to one that is deserving and righteous. The learned doubt the acquisition of punya through all other acts of dharma. The only karma about which they do not entertain any doubt is the bhumidana, which is the foremost of all gifts.

The man of wisdom who makes gifts of land, gives away all these—gold, silver, cloth, gems, pearls and other precious stones. Penances, sacrifice, Vedic lore, good conduct, absence of greed, firmness in truth, worship of elders, preceptors and the deities—all these dwell in him who makes a gift of land. They who ascend to the world of Brahma by giving their lives in battle, after having fought without any regard for themselves and only to secure their master's weal—even they cannot surpass the merit of those that make gifts of earth.

As the mother always nourishes her own child with milk from her breast, even so does the earth, this sacred Bhumi, gratify all the tastes and desires of the person that makes a gift of land. Mrityu, Vaikinkara, Danda, Yama, Agni who is possessed of great fierceness, and all the heinous and terrible sins cannot touch or come near the person that makes a gift of earth. That man of tranquil soul who makes a gift of land gratifies the Pitris dwelling in their own world and the Devas in theirs. The man who makes a gift of land to one that is emaciated and cheerless, destitute of the means of livelihood and languishing from weakness, and who thereby gives another in want the means of subsistence, becomes entitled to the honour and the great merit of performing a sacrifice.

Even as a loving cow runs towards her calf with full udders dripping milk does the most-blessed earth go in love after the one who makes a gift of land. That man who makes a gift of tilled land to a Brahmana, or land sown with seeds, or land that has standing crops, or a mansion well-furnished with every necessity, succeeds in the hereafter in becoming the accomplisher of the wishes of everybody.

The man who makes a Brahmana, possessed of a livelihood, owning a domestic fire and of pure vows and practices, accept a gift of earth, never falls into any danger or distress. As the moon waxes day by day, even so the punya of a gift of land is enhanced every time such earth yields crops.

Those conversant with ancient history sing this sloka in connection with the bhumidana. Hearing that sloka, Jamadagni's son Rama gave away all of this Bhumi to Kasyapa. This is that sloka: Receive me in gift. Give me away. By giving me away, you, O giver, shall gain me again!

That which is given away in this life is re-acquired in the next. The Brahmana who recites this high declaration of the Vedas at the time of a sraddha finds the highest reward. A gift of earth is a high expiation for the sin of such powerful men who betake themselves to Atharvan rites for doing harm to others. Indeed, by making a gift of earth one rescues ten generations of one's father's and one's mother's vamsas. That person who is even conversant with this Vedic declaration regarding the merits of a bhumidana, succeeds in redeeming ten generations of both his mother's and father's families.

The earth is the original source of all creatures, for it is from Bhumi that all creatures derive their sustenance. It has been said that Agni, the deity of fire, is the presiding genius of the earth. After the coronation ceremony of a king, this Vedic declaration should be recited to him, so that he may make gifts of earth and may never take away land from a righteous man. Without the least doubt, all the wealth owned by the king belongs to the Brahmanas. A king who properly knows dharma is the first requisite for the kingdom's prosperity. A people whose king is unrighteous and godless in his ways and beliefs can never be happy. Such a people can never sleep or wake in peace. Because of his evil deeds his subjects are always filled with anxiety. Protecting what his subjects already have and new acquisitions, by lawful means, is never seen in the kingdom of such a sinful ruler.

A people who have a wise and righteous king sleep happily and wake up in happiness. Through the blessed and righteous deeds of such a king his subjects are freed from all anxiety. The subjects, restrained from evil, grow in prosperity through their own pure conduct. Capable of keeping what they have, they continue to make new acquisitions in dharma. That king who makes gifts of earth is regarded as well-born. He is regarded as a man. He is a friend. He is righteous in his actions. He is a giver. He is regarded as possessing true prowess.

Those who make gifts of ample and fertile earth to Brahmanas who know the Vedas always shine in the world in consequence of their tejas, like so many suns. As seeds scattered in fertile soil grow and return a goodly crop, even so all one's wishes become crowned with fruition because of one's making gifts of earth. Aditya and Varuna and Vishnu and Brahma and Soma and Hutasana, and the illustrious and trident-bearing Mahadeva, all laud the man that makes a gift of earth. Living creatures spring into life from the earth and it is into the earth that they are merged when they die.

Living creatures of the four kinds all have earth for their essence. The earth is both the mother and father of the universe of creatures, O king. There is no element that can compare with Bhumi.

In this regard, Yudhishtira, listen to the old narrative of a discourse between the Devaguru Brihaspati and Indra, king of swarga. Having adored Vishnu with a hundred sacrifices, each of which was distinguished by plentiful dakshina, Maghavat put a question to Brihaspati, that greatest of all the wise and the eloquent.

Indra said, “Illustrious one, by what gift does one succeed in coming to swarga and attaining beatitude? O foremost of the eloquent, tell me of that gift which bestows truly high and inexhaustible punya.”

Thus addressed by the Deva king, the Devaguru Brihaspati of great tejas said these words in reply to him of a hundred sacrifices: “Endued as he is with the punya that attaches to the bhumidana, the realm of felicity reserved for the man who makes a gift of such earth as is auspicious and rich with every desirable thing, is never lost or exhausted. That king, O Sakra, who wishes for prosperity and who wants to win lasting happiness for himself, should always make gifts of earth, with due rites, and to the deserving. If after committing many sins a person makes gifts of earth to Brahmanas, he casts off all those sins like a snake casting off its slough. He that makes a gift of earth is said to make gifts of everything—of seas and rivers and mountains and forests. By making a gift of earth, the person is said to give away lakes and tanks, wells and streams.

Because of the moistness of earth, one is said to give away things of diverse tastes by making a gift of earth. The man who makes a gift of land is regarded as giving away herbs and plants possessed of high and efficacious virtues, trees adorned with flowers and fruit, delightful woods, and hillocks.

The punya that a man acquires by making a gift of earth cannot be gained by the performance of even such great sacrifices as the Agnishtoma and others, with plentiful gifts in the form of dakshina. The giver of earth rescues ten generations of both his father’s and his mother’s races. Similarly, by taking away earth that was given away, one casts oneself into hell and casts ten generations of both one’s paternal and maternal lines into the same place of misery. That man who having promised to make a gift of earth does not actually make it, or who having made a gift takes it back, has to pass a long time in great torment from being bound with the paasa, the noose, of Varuna at the command of Yama.

Men never to go to Yama who honour and worship those best of Brahmanas that pour libations every day on their domestic fire, who are always engaged in the performance of sacrifices, who have scant means of livelihood, and who receive with hospitality every guest seeking shelter in their homes. The king, O Purandara, should free himself from the debt he owes to the Brahmanas and protect the helpless and the weak belonging to the other varnas. The king should never take back land that has been given away by another to a Brahmana who is destitute of a livelihood. The tears that fall from the eyes of such Brahmanas can destroy the ancestors and descendants to the third generation of the one who takes their lands.

That man who succeeds through his endeavours in re-establishing a king driven out from his kingdom, gains heaven and is much honoured by the denizens of swarga. The king who makes gifts of land with standing crops of sugarcane or barley or wheat, or with kine and horses and other draft animals—earth that has been won with the might of the giver's arms—land that has mineral wealth in it and that is covered with every kind of natural verdure and richness, wins inexhaustible regions of felicity in the next world; and such a king is said to perform the earth sacrifice, the Bhumi yagna.

That king who makes a gift of earth is washed of every sin and becomes pure and approved of by the righteous. In this world he is highly honoured and lauded by all men of dharma. The merit that attaches to a bhumidana increases every time the land given away bears crops for the owner, even as a drop of oil, falling upon water, is seen to spread on every side and cover the water's surface. Those heroic kings and ornaments of great sabhas who cast off their lives in battle with faces towards the enemy, attain, O Sakra, to Brahmaloka. Beautiful women, skilled in music and dancing and adorned with garlands of celestial flowers, receive the giver of earth as he comes to swarga after leaving the world.

The king who makes gifts of earth with due rites to deserving Brahmanas, sports in bliss in the celestial realms, in the constant company of the Devas and Gandharvas. A hundred Apsaras, wearing unearthly garlands, approach the giver of earth as he ascends into Brahmaloka.

Flowers of exquisite fragrance, a majestic conch and throne, a royal chatra and matchless horses and magnificent and elegant rathas, await the one who has given gifts of lands. By making gifts of earth a king can always enjoy flowers of transcendent and intoxicating redolence and untold quantities of heaven's gold. Possessed of all kinds of wealth, the commands of such a king can never be flaunted anywhere, and cries of 'Jaya'–hail him wheresoever he may go.

The rewards that attach to gifts of earth consist of dwelling in swarga, O Purandara, and gold, and unimaginable flowers, and plants and herbs of great medicinal virtue, and mineral wealth and verdant, sacred kusa grass. By making a gift of land a man acquires in his next life nectar-yielding earth.

There is no gift that is equal to a gift of land. There is no elder worthy of greater respect than the mother. There is no duty higher than truth. There is no wealth more precious than that which is given away."

Bhishma continues, 'Hearing these words from Brihaspati, the son of Angiras, Vasava made a gift to him of the whole earth with all her jewels, gemstones and gold and all her wealth of diverse kinds. If these verses declaring the merit attaching to gifts of earth be recited on the occasion of a sraddha, neither Rakshasas nor Asuras can appropriate even the least share of the offerings made. Without doubt, the offerings one makes to the Pitris at such a sraddha become inexhaustible. Hence, during sraddhas, the man of learning should recite these verses on the subject of the punya that attaches to gifts of land, in the presence and hearing of the invited Brahmanas even while they are engaged in eating.

And so, O king of the Bharatas, I have told you at length about that gift which is the foremost of all gifts. What else do you wish to hear?'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'When a king grows desirous of making gifts in this world, what are the gifts which he should make, O best of the Bharatas, to such Brahmanas as possess superior virtue and accomplishments? What gift is that by which Brahmanas become immediately gratified? What rewards do they bestow in return? O Mahabaho, tell me about the lofty rewards attained through the punya arising from dakshina. What gifts yield rich fruit both here and hereafter? I wish to hear all this from you. I beg you, discourse to me upon it all in detail.'

Bhishma says, 'Once I asked the divine Narada these same questions. Listen to me and I will tell you what that Devarishi said to me in reply.

Narada said, "The Devas and all the Rishis laud annrita, food, greatly. The course of the world and the intellectual faculties have all been established on food. There has never been, nor will there be any gift that is equal to the gifts of anna. Hence, men always particularly want to make annadana, gifts of food. In this world, food is the cause of energy and strength. The life-breaths are founded on food. It is food that upholds the wide universe, O mighty one. All classes of men, householders and mendicants and ascetics, exist depending upon food. The pranas depend upon food. There is no doubt about all this.

Depriving, if need be, his own family, a man who wishes for his own prosperity should make annadana to a Mahatman Brahmana or a sannyasi. That man who gives food to an accomplished Brahmana who solicits it, secures for himself in the world to come wealth of untold value. The grihasta who wishes his own prosperity should receive with reverence a deserving old man who is spent with toil while wayfaring far from home, when such a man honours the householder's home with his presence. That man who, casting off wrath that overleaps every bound, and becoming righteous in disposition and freed from malice, makes dana of food, is sure to attain to happiness, O king, both here and hereafter.

The householder should never ignore a man that comes to his home, nor should he insult him by sending him away. A gift of food made to even a Chandala or a dog is never lost or in vain. That man who makes a gift of clean food to a person on a yatra, who is toil-worn and unknown to the giver, is sure to acquire great punya. The man who gratifies with annadana the Pitris, the Devas, the Rishis, the Brahmanas and Atithis arrived at his home, gains immeasurable merit.

That man, who having committed even a heinous sin, makes a gift of food to one that solicits, or to a Brahmana, is never struck down by that sin. Annadana made to a Brahmana becomes well-nigh inexhaustible. That made to a Sudra becomes productive of great punya. Even this is the difference between the merits that attach to gifts of food made to Brahmanas and Sudras. Solicited by a Brahmana, one should not enquire about his vamsa, gotra, conduct or Vedic lore. Asked for food, one should give food to him that asks. There is no doubt, O king, that he who gives food obtains both here and hereafter many wonderful kalpa vrikshas that yield rare fruit and every other object of desire.

Like tillers expecting auspicious showers of rain, the Pitris always expect that their sons and grandsons will make offerings of food to them in sraddhas. The true Brahmana is a great being. When he comes into one's home and asks, saying, 'Give me', the owner of the abode, whether influenced or not by the wish to acquire merit, is sure to win great punya by giving in response to that solicitation. The Brahmana is the guest of all creatures in the universe. He is entitled to the first portion of every meal and offering of food. That house swells in prosperity to which Brahmanas come for alms and from which they return honoured by their desires being amply fulfilled. The owner of such a house takes birth in his next life in a family, O Bhaarata, which can command all the comforts and luxuries of life.

By making gifts of food in this world, a man is sure to attain to an exalted place in the hereafter. He who makes gifts of sweets and indeed any food that is sweet, attains to a residence in swarga where he is honoured by all the Devas and the others. Food constitutes the prana, the life-breath, of men. Everything is founded upon food. He who makes gifts of food gains many animals, many children, considerable wealth, and an abundance of all things of comfort, luxury and enjoyment.

The giver of food is said to be the giver of life. Indeed, he is said to be the giver of everything. Hence, O king, such a man acquires both strength and beauty of form in this world. If food be duly given to a Brahmana arrived at the giver's house as a guest, the giver attains to great happiness, and is adored by the very Devas. The true Brahmana, O Yudhishtira, is a great being. He is also a fertile field. Whatever seed is sown in that field yields an abundant crop of punya.

A gift of food visibly and immediately produces happiness for both the giver and the receiver. All other gifts produce fruits that remain unseen. Food is the origin of all creatures. From food comes satisfaction and delight. O Bhaarata, know that dharma and artha both flow from food. The cure of disease or the enjoyment of health also flow from food.

In an olden Kalpa, Prajapati, the Lord of all creatures, said that food is amrita, the very source of immortality. Food is Bhumi, food is Swarga, and food is Akasa. Everything is established in food. In the absence of food, the five elements that constitute the physical organism cease to exist in a state of union. Without food, the strength of even the strongest man fails. Invitations and marriages and sacrifices all cease in the absence of food. The very Vedas disappear when there is no food. Whatever mobile and immobile creatures, chala and achala, exist in the universe are dependent on food. Religion and wealth, dharma and artha, in the three worlds are entirely dependent on food. Hence the wise should make gifts of food. The strength, energy, fame and achievements of the man who makes gifts of food constantly increase in the three worlds, O king. Prananatha, the Lord of prana, the life-breaths, Vayu Deva, takes the water evaporated by the sun up above the clouds. The water thus borne to the clouds, Sakra causes to be poured upon the earth as rain, O Bhaarata. The sun, through his rays, sucks up the moisture of the earth. The deity of wind causes the moisture to fall down from the sun.

When water falls down from the clouds upon the earth as rain, Bhumidevi, the goddess of earth, becomes moist. Then do people sow diverse kinds of crops upon whose harvest the universe of living creatures depends. It is in the food, the annrita, thus created that the flesh, fat, bones and the vital seed of all beings have their origin. From the vital seed, the retas, spring diverse kinds of living creatures. Agni and Soma, the two agents living within the body, create and maintain the vital seed. Thus from annrita, food, the sun and the wind god, and the vital seed spring and act.

All these are said to constitute one element or quantity, and it is from these that all creatures come. That man who gives food to one who comes into his house and solicits it, is said to give both life and energy to living creatures."

Having been told this by Narada, O king, I have always made gifts of food. Do you also, therefore, freed from malice and with a cheerful heart, make gifts of annrita. By giving food to deserving Brahmanas with the proper rites, you can be sure, O mighty one, of attaining swarga.

Hear me, O Rajan, as I tell you of the realms that await those that make gifts of food. In swarga, the mansions of those Mahatmans shine with resplendence. Bright as the stars in the firmament, and supported upon many columns, white as the disc of the moon, and adorned with many tinkling bells, and roseate like the newly risen sun, those palatial edifices are fixed and also move as they will. Those palaces are filled with hundreds upon hundreds of creatures that live on land and as many as live in water.

Some of them are endowed with the deep effulgence of lapis lazuli and some are possessed of the splendour of the sun. Some of them are made of silver and some of gold. Within those mansions are many kalpa vrikshas which yield every desire of those that dwell in them. Innumerable tanks and roads and halls and wells and lakes are to be found all around. Thousands of grand, colourful and exotic carriages with horses and other animals harnessed, and with wheels whose clatter is always loud, you will see. Mountains of food and all things of enjoyment and pleasure, and heaps of rich, unworldly cloths and ornaments you will find in plenitude.

Rivers that run milk, and hills of long, peerless rice and other delicacies past describing, will you come upon. Many palatial dwellings there are in Swargaloka, which seem like great white clouds; opulent golden bedsteads and other furnishings and artefacts past anything you can dream of in this world will you come upon in the heavenly mansions of men who have given food to the deserving in this world.

Therefore, become a giver of food. For, verily, such are the realms that are kept for those high-souled and righteous ones that give food generously in this world.

And so I say to you again, men should always give dana and dakshina of annrita in this Bhumi.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'I have listened carefully, Pitamaha, about the law with regard to the giving of food. Can you discourse to me now about the conjunction of the planets and the stars in relation to the making of gifts?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to this ancient tale of the discourse between Devaki and Narada, that foremost of Rishis. Once upon a time, when Narada of god-like features and knower of every dharma, arrived in Dwaraka, Devaki asked him this same question. To her that had asked him, the Devarishi Narada replied as follows. Do you listen to what he said.

Narada said, "'By gratifying, O blessed devi, deserving Brahmanas with payasa mixed with ghrita under the constellation Krittika one attains to regions of great felicity. Under the nakshatra Rohini, to free oneself from the debt one owes to the Brahmanas, one should give to them many cuts of venison along with rice and ghee and milk, and other kinds of foods and drink. One giving away a cow with a calf under the constellation called Somadaivata, or Mrigasiras, goes straight from this world of humans to a realm of great felicity in swarga.

One keeping a fast and giving away krisara mixed with sesame, transcends all obstacles in the next world, including the mountains with rocks sharp as razors. By giving gifts, O beautiful one, of auspicious rice cakes and other foods under the constellation Punarvasu one becomes possessed of personal beauty and great fame and takes birth in one's next life in a family in which there is abundance of food. Making a gift of wrought or unworked gold, under the nakshatra Pushya, one shines in effulgence like Soma himself in zones of surrounding gloom. He who makes a gift under the asterism of Aslesha of silver, of a bull, is freed from every fear and attains to great affluence and prosperity. By making a gift under the star of Magha of earthen dishes filled with sesame, one becomes possessed of children and animals in this world and attains to every felicity in the next.

For making gifts to Brahmanas under the constellation called Purva-Phalguni of food mixed with phanita, the giver observing a fast the while, the reward is great prosperity both here and hereafter. By making a gift under the nakshatra Uttara-Phalguni, of ghee and milk with rice called shashthika, one attains to great honour in heaven. Whatever gifts are made by men under the asterism of Uttara-Phalguni yield great punya, which, again, is inexhaustible. This is certain.

Observing a fast, the person who makes, under the star Hasta, a gift of a ratha with four elephants, attains to regions of untold grace that bestow the fruition of every wish. By making a gift, under Chitra, of a bull and of fine perfumes, one sports in bliss in regions of Apsaras even like the Devas sporting in the woods of Nandana. By making gifts of wealth under Swati, one attains to such transcendent worlds as one desires and also wins great fame. By making gifts under the Visakha nakshatra of a bull, and a cow that yields copious milk, a cart full of paddy, with a prasanga covering it, and also clothes for wearing, a man gratifies the Pitris and the Devas, and attains to endless merit in the other world. Such a man never meets with any calamity and gratifies the Pitris and the Devas and attains to inexhaustible punya in the hereafter. Such a one certainly finds swarga.

By making gifts to deserving Brahmanas of whatever they solicit, one attains to whatever means of life one desires, and is saved from hell and every disaster that visits a sinner after death. This is the certain conclusion of the scriptures.

By giving gifts under the constellation Anuradha of embroidered cloth and other vestments and of food, observing a fast the while, one is honoured in swarga for a hundred yugas. By giving dana under Jyeshta of the herb called kalasaka with its roots, one attains to great prosperity in the next world, to whatever end he desires. By giving to Brahmanas under the Mula nakshatra, fruits and roots, with a restrained soul, one gratifies the Pitris and attains to whatever he might wish for. By making under the star Purvashadha gifts to a Brahmana conversant with the Vedas and of good family and conduct, of cups filled with curd, while one observes a fast, one is born in one's next life into a family possessed of abundant kine.

One obtains the fruition of every wish by giving dana under the asterism Uttarashadha, of jars full of barley-water, with ghee and the juice of sugar cane in abundance. By making a gift under Abhijit, of milk with honey and ghee to men of wisdom, a righteous man attains to heaven and becomes an object of attention and honour there. By giving under Sravana a gift of blankets or other cloth of thick texture, one roves freely through every realm of bliss, riding a white chariot of pristine resplendence. By making with a restrained soul, under Dhanishtha, a gift of a carriage with bulls yoked, or generous cloths and wealth, one goes directly into swargaloka in one's next life.

By making gifts under Satabhisha of perfumes with holy water and sandalwood, one attains in the next world to the companionship of Apsaras, as also eternal perfumes of diverse kinds. By making gifts under Purva-Bhadrapada—or Rajamasha—the giver attains to great happiness in the next life and an abundant store of every kind of food and fruit. He who makes, under Uttara, a gift of mutton, gratifies the Parees and attains to endless merit in the next world. To one who makes a gift, under the nakshatra Revati, of a cow with a vessel of white copper for milking her, the cow so given away comes to him in the next world, ready to grant the fruition of his every wish.

By giving dana during the day of Aswini, a ratha with steeds yoked, one is born in one's next life into a family that owns many elephants and horses and chariots, and he becomes endowed with great tejas. By making, under Bharani, a gift to Brahmanas of kine and sesame, one acquires in one's next life great fame and an abundance of kine."

Even thus did Narada speak to Devaki upon the subject of what gifts should be made under what nakshatras. Devaki, having listened to the sage, told it to her daughters-in-law, the wives of Krishna.'"

"Bhishma says, 'The illustrious Atri, the son of the Grandsire Brahma, said, "They who make gifts of gold are said to make gifts of everything in the world." King Harischandra said that the gift of gold is sin-cleansing, leads to long life, and yields inexhaustible merit to the Pitris. Manu has said that a gift of drink is the best of all gifts; therefore, should a man cause wells and tanks and lakes to be created. A well full of water and from which diverse folk take water, is said to remove half the sins of the man who excavated it. The whole vamsa of a person is rescued from hell and sin in whose well or tank or lake, kine and Brahmanas and righteous people constantly quench their thirst. That man transcends every kind of calamity from whose well or tank everyone draws water without restraint during the parched summer.

Ghee is said to gratify the illustrious Brihaspati, Pushan, Bhaga, the twin Aswins, and Agni Hutasana. Ghrita is possessed of high medicinal virtues. It is a most sacred requisite for every sacrifice. It is the best of all oblations. The merit that a gift of ghee creates is superior indeed. The man who wishes for happiness in the next world, who wishes for fame and prosperity, should, with purified body and soul, with his own hands make gifts of ghrita to good and great Brahmanas.

Upon that man who makes gifts of ghee to Brahmanas in the month of Aswina, the twin Aswins, gratified, confer personal beauty. Rakshasas never invade the home of that man who gives payasa mixed with ghrita to deserving Brahmanas. That man never dies of thirst who makes gifts to Brahmanas of jars filled with pure and holy water. Such a man obtains every necessity of life, in abundance, and has never to undergo any misfortune or distress.

That man who, with deep devotion and restrained senses, makes gifts to the best Brahmanas, is said to take a sixth part of the punya won by those Brahmanas through their tapasya. The man who gives gifts to Brahmanas of firewood with which to cook and also to keep the cold at bay, finds all his purposes and all his actions crowned with success. Such a one is seen to shine with great splendour and prevail over all his enemies. The illustrious deity of fire becomes pleased with such a man. As another reward, he is never robbed of his cows, and he is sure to achieve victory in battles.

The man who makes a gift of a goodly chatra gains children and great prosperity. Such a one is never affected by any weakness of sight, and the punya of performing a sacrifice becomes his. That man who makes a gift of a fine umbrella during summer or the rains, has never to meet with any sorrow on any account. Such a man quickly succeeds in freeing himself from every difficulty and impediment.

The most blessed and illustrious Rishi Sandilya has said that, of all gifts, the gift of a chariot, O king, is the best.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'I want to hear, Pitamaha, what punya accrues to him who makes the gift of a pair of sandals to a Brahmana whose feet are burnt by hot earth or sand, while he is walking.'

Bhishma says, 'The man that gives to Brahmanas sandals, padukas to protect their feet, succeeds in crushing all thorns along the journey of life and overcomes every kind of difficulty. Such a man, O Yudhishtira, remains above the heads of all his enemies. Carriages of pure splendour, made of silver and gold, with mules harnessed, approach him. He who makes a gift of padukas is said to earn the merit of making the gift of a chariot with well-broken steeds yoked.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me in detail once more, O Grandsire, of the punya that attaches to gifts of sesame and land and kine and food.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O son of Kunti, to what merits attach to tiladana, the gift of sesame, and having heard me, do you, then, O best of the Kurus, make gifts of sesame according to the law. Sesame seeds were created by the Self-born Brahma as the best food for the Pitris. Hence, gifts of sesame seeds always gladden the Pitris greatly. The man who makes gifts of sesame seeds in the month of Magha to Brahmanas has never to enter naraka, which abounds with all manner of terrible creatures. He who adores the Pitris with offerings of sesame seeds is regarded as worshipping the Devas at all the known sacrifices. One should never perform a sraddha without offerings of sesame seeds or without cherishing some purpose.

Sesame seeds sprang from the limbs of the great Rishi Kasyapa. Hence, in the matter of gifts, they have come to be regarded as possessing great virtue. Sesame seeds bestow both prosperity and personal beauty and wash the giver of all his sins. For this the gift of sesame seeds is distinguished above the gift of everything else. Apastamva of great intelligence, and Kankha and Likhita, and the great Rishi Gautama all ascended into swarga by making gifts of sesame seeds.

Brahmanas that perform homa with offerings of sesame, who abstain from sexual intercourse, and observe the dharma or karma of vyavahara, are regarded as equal in purity and power to ghrita, the havi of the cow. The gift of sesame seeds is distinguished above all gifts. Amongst all gifts, the gift of sesame is regarded as yielding inexhaustible merit. In ancient times, when once the Rishi Kusika could not find havi, O Parantapa, he made offerings of sesame seeds to his three sacrificial fires and succeeded in gaining whatever he wished for.

This, O Lord of the Kurus, is what I have learnt about the excellent offering of sesame seeds, and this is why that offering has come to be regarded as being imbued with the most superior punya.

Now listen to what I would tell you next. Once upon a time, the Devas, desirous of making a sacrifice, repaired to the presence of the Self-born Brahma. Wanting to perform their yagna on Bhumi, they begged him for a piece of auspicious earth, saying, "We want it for our sacrifice."

The Devas said, "O illustrious one, you are the Lord of all the earth as also of all the gods. With your leave, O most blessed one, we want to perform a yagna. They who have not acquired lawful means, the earth upon which to erect their vedi, their sacrificial altar, do not earn the merit of the sacrifice they perform. You are the Lord of all the universe of all mobile and unmoving beings, and it behoves you to grant us a piece of earth for the sacrifice we wish to perform."

Brahma said, "You best of gods, I will give you a piece of earth whereon, O sons of Kasyapa, you shall perform your sacrifice."

The Devas said, 'Our desires, O Holy One, have been crowned with fruition. We shall perform our sacrifice even here with lavish dakshina. Let, however, the Munis always adore this piece of earth. Then there came to that place Agastya and Kanwa and Bhrigu and Atri and Vrishakapi, and Asita and Devala. The great gods, O you of unfading glory, performed their sacrifice. Those foremost of Devas concluded their yagna in due time. Having completed that sacrifice of theirs on the breast of that foremost of mountains, Himavat, upon the land given them by Brahma Pitamaha, the Devas attached to the very gift of earth a sixth part of the punya arising from their sacrifice. The man who makes a gift of even a small span of earth with reverence and faith, has never to languish from any difficulty and neither to meet with any calamity.

By making the gift of a house that keeps out cold, wind and sun, and that stands upon a piece of clean land, the giver attains to Devaloka and does not fall from there even when his punya is exhausted. By making a gift of a dwelling, the giver, possessed of wisdom, lives, O king, in joy in the company of Sakra. Such a one receives great honour in swarga. That man in whose house a Brahmana of restrained senses, well versed in the Vedas, and belonging by birth to a family of preceptors, dwells in contentment, succeeds in attaining to and enjoying a world of the highest bliss. In the same manner, by giving away a goodly shelter for kine, a substantial construction that keeps out cold and rain, the giver redeems seven generations of his race from hell.

By giving away a piece of arable land, the giver attains to excellent prosperity. By giving a piece of earth containing mineral wealth, the giver aggrandises his family and race. One should never give away any earth that is barren or that is burnt or otherwise arid; nor should one give away any earth that is in close vicinity to a smasana, a cremation ground, or that has been owned and enjoyed before by a sinner.

When a man performs a sraddha in honour of the Pitris on land belonging to another, the Manes render both the gift of that land and the sraddha itself futile. Hence, a man of wisdom should buy even a small piece of earth and make a gift of it. The pinda that is offered to one's ancestors on earth that has been properly purchased becomes inexhaustible.

Forests, and mountains, and rivers, and tirthas are regarded as having no owners. No earth need be purchased in these for performing sraddhas.

Even this is what has been said, O king, on the subject of the merits of making gifts of earth. Now, Anagha, I will speak to you on the subject of Godana, the gift of kine. Cows are regarded as superior to all the Rishis. And since it is so, the divine Mahadeva for that reason performed his tapasya in their company. Cows, O Bhaarata, dwell in Brahmaloka, in the company of Soma. That being the highest end, evolved Rishis crowned with ascetic success strive to attain to that very world.

Cows benefit humans with their milk, ghee, curds, dung, skin, bones, horns and hair, O Bhaarata. Cows do not feel cold or heat. The monsoons do not affect them at all. And since kine attain to the highest end, Brahmaloka in the company of Brahmanas, even so do the wise say that sacred cows and Brahmanas are equal.

In days of yore, King Rantideva performed a grand sacrifice in which an immense number of kine were offered up and slaughtered. From the juice that was secreted by the skins of the slaughtered animals, a river formed that came to be called the Charmanwati, after flowing from their skin. After that, kine were no longer animals fit for sacrifice. They are now animals fit for dana. That king who makes gifts of kine to the best of Brahmanas is sure to overcome any calamity that he might fall into. The man who makes a gift of a thousand kine has never to go into hell. Such a man, O ruler of men, gains victory everywhere.

The king of the Devas has said that the milk of cows is amrita. For this reason, one who makes a gift of a cow is regarded as making a gift of nectar. Those who know the Vedas have declared that ghrita, the ghee made from cows' milk, is the very best of all oblations poured into the sacrificial fire. For this reason, the man who makes a gift of a cow is regarded as making a gift of a libation for sacrifice.

A fine bull is the very embodiment of heaven. He who makes the gift of a bull to an accomplished Brahmana receives great honour in swarga. Kine, O Lord of the Bharata vamsa, are said to be the prana of living creatures. Hence, the man who makes the gift of a cow is said to make the gift of life-breath. Men who know the Vedas have said that kine constitute the great refuge of living creatures. Hence, the man who makes the gift of a cow is regarded as making the gift of sanctuary for all creatures.

The cow should never be given away for slaughter to one who will kill her; nor should the cow be given to a tiller of the soil; nor should the cow be given to a godless unbeliever, an atheist. The cow should not also, O chief of the Bharatas, be given to one whose occupation is the keeping of kine for profit. The wise have said that a person who gives away the cow to any of such sinful persons has to sink into hell.

One should never give to a Brahmana a cow that is lean, or that births calves that do not live, or that is barren, or that is diseased, or that is defective of limb, or that is worn out with toil. The man that gives away ten thousand cows attains to heaven and sports in bliss in the company of Indra. The man who makes gifts of a hundred thousand cows acquires many regions of untold and inexhaustible felicity.

Thus have I recited to you the punya attaching to the gift of sesame and of kine, as also to the gift of earth. Listen to me now and I will tell you of annadana, the gift of food, O Bhaarata. The gift of food, O son of Kunti, is regarded as a superior gift. King Rantideva, in days of yore, ascended into heaven from having made gifts of food. That king who makes a gift of food to one that is toil-worn and hungry, attains to Brahmaloka region of supreme felicity which is the Self-born's own.

Men fail to attain with gifts of gold and fine robes and other excellent things to that punya to which givers of food attain, O you of great puissance. Food is, indeed, the first among all created things. Food is the highest prosperity. It is from food that life springs, as also energy and prowess and strength. He who always makes gifts of food, with attention, to the righteous, never falls into any distress. Even this has been said by the great Parasara.

Having worshipped the Devas duly, food should be first dedicated to them. It has been told, O king, that the kind of food that is eaten by good men is also consumed by the gods that those men worship.

The man who makes a gift of food during the bright fortnight of the month of Kartika, succeeds in overcoming every difficulty here, and attains to unending bliss in the hereafter. The man who makes a gift of food to a hungry guest arrived at his home attains to all those worlds that are kept for those who know the Brahman. The man who makes gifts of food is sure to overcome every obstacle and distress. Such a one rids himself of every sin and cleanses himself of every evil deed.

And so I have told you about the merits of making gifts of food, of sesame, of earth and of kine.'"

CANTO 67

"Yudhishtira says, 'I have heard, O sire, of the merits of the different kinds of gift upon which you have dwelt. I understand, O Bhaarata, that the gift of food is particularly superior and laudable. What, however, is the great punya attached to making gifts of drink? I want to hear of this in detail, Pitamaha.'

Bhishma says, 'I shall, O Bharatakulapati, tell you about this; listen to me carefully, O you of unbaffled prowess. Anagha, I will tell you about charity, dana, beginning with that of drink. The punya that a man acquires by making gifts of food and drink is such that the like of it, I think, cannot be acquired through any other gift. There is no dana that is superior to that of either food or drink.

I say to you again that it is by food that all living creatures are able to exist. For this reason, food is regarded as a superior thing in all the worlds. From food the strength and energy of living creatures constantly increases. Hence, the Lord of all creatures has himself said that the gift of food is a most high one.

You have surely heard, O son of Kunti, the auspicious words of Savitri herself about food or annrita. You know for what reason she said those words, what those words were, and how they were said during the chanting of sacred mantras, O Mahabuddhi. By making a gift of food, a man really makes a gift of life itself. There is no gift in this world that is superior to the gift of life. You are not unacquainted with this saying of Lomasa, O you of mighty arms. The end that King Sibi attained of old in consequence of his having granted life to the pigeon is acquired by him, O Yudhishtira, who makes a gift of food to a Brahmana. Hence have I heard that they that give life in this world attain to very lofty regions of bliss in the after-life.

Yet, food, anna, O Kurusattama, may or may not be superior to drink. Nothing can exist without the help of what springs from water. The very Lord of all the planets, the illustrious Soma, once came forth from jala, water. Amrita and sudha and swadha and kshira, milk, as indeed every kind of food, the herbs, O king, and creepers and vines, medicinal and of other virtues, all come from water. From these, the life-breath of all living creatures flows. The Devas have amrita for their food. The Nagas have sudha. The Pitris have Swadha for theirs. The animals have herbs and plants for their food. The wise have said that anna, rice and grain, and the rest, is the food of the Manavas, humans.

All these spring from water. Hence, there is nothing superior to the gift of water. If a man wishes to secure prosperity for himself, he should always make gifts of water. The gift of water is regarded as being truly praiseworthy. It leads to great fame and bestows a long life on the giver. The giver of water, O son of Kunti, always remains above the heads of his enemies. Such a man obtains the fruition of all his wishes and earns everlasting fame as well. The giver of water, O Lord of men, is washed clean of every sin and gains unending felicity hereafter as he goes forth into heaven, O you of great splendour. Manu himself has said that such a one earns realms of immortal bliss in the other world.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Ah, Pitamaha, tell me again of the punya attaching to gifts of sesame and of lamps for lighting darkness, as also of food and clothes.'

'Bhishma says, 'Listen, O Yudhishtira, to the narrative of the discourse that took place in ancient times between a Brahmana and Yama. In the country lying between the rivers Ganga and Yamuna, at the foot of the hills called Yamuna, there was a large town inhabited by Brahmanas. The town was celebrated by the name of Parnasala and was delightful in appearance, O king. A large number of learned Brahmanas lived in it.

One day, Yama, the ruler of the dead, commanded a messenger of his, a Yamaduta clad in black, with blood-red eyes and hair standing erect, and possessed of black feet, eyes and a nose, all of which resembled those of a crow, saying, "Go to the town inhabited by Brahmanas and fetch hither the man known by the name of Sarmin who belongs by birth to the race of Agastya. He is intent on mental tranquillity and possessed of learning. He is a preceptor engaged in teaching the Vedas and his tapasya is famed. Do not bring me another man who also belongs to the same vamsa and lives in the same neighbourhood. This other man is equal to him that I want, in virtues, study and birth. In his children and conduct, this other resembles the intelligent Sarmin, but bring the individual I have in view. He should be worshipped with respect and not dragged here with irreverence."

Arriving in the town, the messenger did the very opposite of what he had been bidden. Setting roughly upon the wrong man, he brought him who had been forbidden by Yama to be brought. Possessed of great energy,

Yama rose up at the sight of the Brahmana and worshipped him duly. The king of the dead then commanded his messenger, saying, "Let this one be taken back, and let the other one be brought to me."

When the great judge of the dead said these words, that Brahmana addressed him and said, "I have completed my study of the Vedas and am no longer attached to the world. Whatever term might yet remain of my mortal existence, I wish to pass, dwelling even here, O you of unfading glory!"

Yama said, "I cannot ascertain betimes the exact period, ordained by Kaala, of anyone's life, and since Time has not urged me in your case I cannot allow you to live here. I take note of the deeds of dharma, or otherwise, that a man does in the world. Do you, O learned Brahmana of great splendour, return immediately to your home. Also, tell me what is in your heart and what I can do for you, O you of unfading glory."

The Brahmana said, "You must tell me what those deeds are by which one may earn great punya. O best of all beings, you are the foremost authority on the subject, why, in the three worlds."

Yama said, "Listen, O Dvija, to the laws regarding gifts. The gift of sesame seeds is a very superior one. It produces everlasting merit. Dvijottama, one should make gifts of as much sesame as one can. By making gifts of sesame every day, one is sure to attain the fruition of one's every wish. The gift of sesame at sraddhas is lauded. Verily, the gift of sesame is a most superior one. Do you give dana of sesame to Brahmanas according to the rites ordained in the shastras.

On the day of the full moon of the month of Vaisakha, you should give sesame to Brahmanas. They should also be made to eat and to touch sesame on every occasion that you can afford. They that wish to achieve what is beneficial to them should, with all their souls, do this in their homes. Without doubt, men should also make gifts of water and create shelters of rest where drinking water is given to wayfarers. One should have tanks, lakes and wells to be excavated. Such deeds are rare in the world. Do you always make gifts of water, for such dana is fraught with great punya.

O goodly Brahmana, you must also build wayside shelters where water is given to tired yatris. After a man has eaten, the gift he wishes most for is that of pure water to drink."

When Yama had said these words to him, the Yamaduta who had carried the Brahmana from his home conveyed him back. The Brahmana, on his return, obeyed the instructions he had received. Having thus returned him to his dwelling, Yama's messenger fetched Sarmin, the one whom Yama had actually sought. Taking Sarmin to the Lord of death's halls, he informed his master that he had accomplished his task.

Possessed of terrible tejas, the judge of the dead worshipped that righteous Brahmana and, having conversed with him awhile, dismissed him to be returned to his home. To him also Yama gave the same advice and instructions. Sarmin, too, coming back into the world of men, did all that Yama had said.

Like the gift of water, Yama, from a desire of doing good to the Pitris, lauds the gift of lamps to light dark places. Hence, the giver of a lamp for lighting a dark place is regarded as benefiting the Pitris. So, indeed, one should always give lamps to light dark places. The giving of lamps enhances the vision of the Devas, the Pitris, and one's own self.

It has been told, that the gift of gemstones is a superior gift. The Brahmana, who, having accepted a gift of gems, sells them to perform a sacrifice, incurs no fault. The Brahmana, who having accepted a gift of gems makes a gift of them to Brahmanas, acquires inexhaustible merit himself and confers inexhaustible merit upon him from whom he originally received the gems. Conversant with all dharma, Manu himself has said that he, who, observing proper restraint, earns and makes a gift of gems to a Brahmana, also observant of shastraic injunctions, earns inexhaustible punya himself and confers inexhaustible merit upon the recipient.

The man who is content with his own wife and who makes a gift of clothes, gains an excellent complexion and fine vestments for himself. I have told you, O best of men, what the merits are that attach to gifts of kine, of gold, and the sesame in accord with the precepts of the Vedas and the shastras. One should marry, and beget and raise progeny from one's wives. Of all acquisitions, O son of Kuru's race, that of a male child is regarded as the highest.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Do you, O Kurusattama, expatiate to me once again the noble law regarding gifts, with especial reference, O you of great wisdom, to bhudana, the gift of land, earth. A Kshatriya should make gifts of earth to a Brahmana of righteous deeds. Such a Brahmana should accept the gift with due rites. None else, however, than a Kshatriya is competent to make gifts of earth. It befits you now to tell me what persons of all the classes are free to bestow if moved by the desire to earn punya. Also tell me what has been said in the Vedas on this subject.'

Bhishma says, 'There are three gifts that go by the same name and that yield equal rewards. Indeed, these three confer the fruition of every wish. The three are kine, earth and knowledge. The man who speaks to his disciple words of righteous import drawn from the Vedas acquires punya equal to that won by giving earth and kine. Similarly are cows praised as objects of gifts. There is no dana higher than they, for cows confer merit immediately. They are also, O Yudhishtira, such that a gift of them cannot but lead to great punya. Cows are the mothers of all creatures. They bestow every kind of happiness.

The man that desires his own prosperity should always make gifts of cows. No one should ever kick cows or walk brashly through their midst. Cows are goddesses and homes of auspiciousness; they always deserve worship. Formerly, while tilling the earth whereon they performed a great sacrifice, the Devas used a goad to strike the bullocks yoked to the plough. Hence, while tilling the earth for a yagna, one may, without incurring censure or sin, apply the goad to bullocks. Otherwise, however, bullocks should never be struck with a goad or a whip. When kine are grazing or lying down no one should annoy them in any way. When the cows are thirsty and they do not get water, because someone obstructs their access to a pool or tank or river, they can destroy him with all his relatives by merely looking at such a one.

What creatures can be more sacred than cows when with their very dung, cleansed and sanctified, altars are made, on which sraddhas are performed in honour of the Pitris, or those on which the Devas are worshipped? That man who, before eating, himself gives every day, for a year, only a handful of grass to a cow belonging to another, is regarded as keeping a vrata which bestows the fruition of every wish. Such a man gains children, fame, wealth and prosperity, and dispels all evils and nightmares.'

'Yudhishtira says, 'What should be the signs of cows that can be given as dana? Which are those cows that should be passed over in the matter of gifts? What should be the character of those to whom kine should be given? Who, again, are those to whom cows should not be given?'

Bhishma says, 'A cow should never be given to one that is not righteous in conduct, or to a sinful man, or one that is covetous or one who is untruthful, or a man that does not make offerings to the Pitris and Devas. By giving a gift of ten cows to a Brahmana learned and rich in the Vedas, poor in earthly wealth, possessed of many children, and owning a home, one attains to numerous regions of great felicity.

When a man performs any deed that is fraught with merit, helped by what he has got in gift from another, a portion of the punya attaching to that karma becomes his forever, with whose wealth the karma has been accomplished. He that begets a child, he who saves another from danger, and he that gives the means of sustenance to another are regarded as the three sires. Services dutifully rendered to the guru destroys sin. But pride destroys even great fame. Having three children destroys the blame of being childless, and the possession of ten cows dispels the reproach of being impoverished.

To one who is devoted to the Vedanta, who is imbued with great learning, who has been filled with wisdom, who has complete control over his senses, who keeps vratas laid down in the scriptures, who has withdrawn himself from all worldly attachments, to him that speaks pleasantly to all creatures, to him that would never do an evil thing even when impelled by hunger, to one that is mild and possessed of a peaceful disposition, to one that is hospitable to all guests—verily to such a Brahmana should a man, possessed of similar conduct and blessed with children and wives, give the means of sustenance.

The measure of punya that attaches to the gift of kine to a deserving person is exactly the measure of the sin that attaches to the act of robbing a Brahmana of what belongs to him. Under all circumstances you must avoid despoiling what belongs to a Brahmana, and keep his wives at a distance from yourself.'"

Bhishma says, 'In this matter, O perpetuator of Kuru's race, the Rishis narrate the great calamity that overtook King Nriga because of his despoiling what belonged to a Brahmana. Some years by, some young men of Yadu's race, while looking for water, came upon a large well covered with grass and creepers. Wanting to draw water from it, they laboured to remove the creepers that covered its mouth. After the mouth had been uncovered and cleaned, they saw within the well a very large lizard that lived there. The young men made strong and repeated efforts to rescue the lizard. Like a very hill in size was that lizard and they sought to free it with ropes and leather thongs. Not succeeding, the young men then went to Krishna, and said, "Covering the entire hollow of a great well, we saw a great lizard. Despite all our efforts we could not set it free."

Hearing this, Krishna went with them to the well, easily fetched the lizard out from it, and asked it who it was. The lizard replied that it was the soul of the great King Nriga who had flourished in days of old and performed countless sacrifices.

Krishna said to the lizard, "You did indeed perform many deeds of dharma, and no sin did you ever commit. Why then, O king, have you come to such a distressing end? Explain to us what this strange fate is and why it has befallen you. I have heard that you repeatedly gave dana to Brahmanas—why, of hundreds upon hundreds of thousands, and once again eight times hundreds upon hundreds of ten thousands of kine. Why, then, has this sorry plight overtaken you?"

Nriga replied to Krishna, "Once a cow belonging to a Brahmana who regularly worshipped his home fire, escaped from the owner's dwelling while he was away from home and entered my herd. The keepers of my cattle included that cow in their count of a thousand. In time, I gave away that cow to another Brahmana, with the wish of acquiring punya that would take me into swarga, and grant me joy there. Returning home, the true owner of that cow found her missing and set out in search of her. He found her in the yard of another Brahmana, the one to whom I had made a gift of her.

Finding her, her real owner said, 'This cow is mine!' The other Brahmana contested his claim, till both, disputing and excited with wrath, came to me. Addressing me, one of them said, 'You have been the giver of this cow!'

The other one cried, 'You have robbed me of this cow; she is mine!'

I then asked the Brahmana to whom I had given the cow to return the gift in exchange for thousands of other cows.

Without acceding to my earnest solicitation, he said to me. 'The cow I have got is well suited to time and place. She yields a copious measure of milk, besides being quiet and fond of us. The milk she yields is very sweet. She is regarded as worthy of every praise in my house. She is nourishing, besides, a weak child of mine that has just been weaned. I cannot give her away.'

Saying this, the Brahmana left. I then solicited the other Brahmana offering him an exchange, 'Will you take a hundred thousand kine for this one cow.'

The Brahmana, however, replied, 'I do not accept gifts from Kshatriyas. I am able to manage without your help. So, lose no time but give me that very cow which was mine.'

Even thus, O Krishna, did that Brahmana speak to me. I offered him gifts of gold and silver, and horses and chariots. That best of Brahmanas refused to accept any of these and he also went away. Meanwhile, urged by time's irresistible influence, I had to leave this world. Finding my way to Pitriloka, I was taken into the presence of the king of the dead.

Worshipping me duly, Yama addressed me, 'The end cannot be calculated, O king, of your deeds, so great has your life been. There is, however, a small sin which you unknowingly committed. Suffer the punishment for that sin now or later, as it pleases you. When you ascended your throne, you swore that you would protect all your people in the enjoyment of what belonged to them. You did not, however, blemishlessly keep that oath. Besides, you took what belonged to a Brahmana. This was a two-fold sin you have committed.'

I answered Yama, saying, 'I will first endure the distress of punishment, and when that is over, I shall enjoy the happiness that is in store for me, O Lord.'

After I said those words to the king of the dead, I fell down to the earth. Though fallen, I could still hear some other words that Yama said to me ringing loudly in my mind. Those words were: 'Krishna, the son of Vasudeva, will rescue you. Upon the completion of a full thousand years, when your sin will have been exhausted, you shall attain to the many realms of inexhaustible bliss that you have acquired through your great deeds of dharma.'

Falling down into this world, I found myself, head downwards, in this well, transformed into a creature of an intermediate order—this great lizard that I am. My memory, however, did not leave me. And today I have been rescued by you, gracious Lord! What else can I attribute this to than the puissance of your tapasya? Give me your leave, O Krishna—let me rise into swarga!"

Then through Krishna's grace and with his leave, King Nriga bowed his head to him and mounting a celestial vimana flew up into swarga. After Nriga had gone, Krishna spoke this sloka: No one should knowingly appropriate anything that belongs to a Brahmana. The property of a Brahmana, if taken, destroys the taker even as the Brahmana's cow destroyed King Nriga!

I tell you, again, O Kaunteya, that a meeting with the good never proves fruitless. King Nriga was rescued from hell through meeting with one that was indeed good, the best of all men. As giving dana yields punya even so does taking from a Brahmana lead to sin and punishment. So, also, Yudhishtira, one should avoid doing any injury to kine.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Sinless one, tell me in more detail about the merits attainable by making gifts of kine. Mahabaho, I am never satiated with listening to you.'

Bhishma says, 'In this regard the old story of the discourse between Rishi Uddalaki and his son Nachiketa is often told. Once on a time, Rishi Uddalaki of great intelligence approached his son Nachiketa, and said to him, "Do you wait upon and serve me."

Upon the completion of the vow he had undertaken, the great Rishi once more said to his son, "Engaged in performing my ablutions and deeply absorbed by my Vedic study, I have forgotten to bring firewood with me, as also the kusa grasses, the flowers, the water jar and the herbs I had gathered. Bring me these things from the riverside."

The son went to the place which his father described but saw that all those things had been washed away by the current. Coming back to his father, he said, "I do not see the things you left."

Roiled as he then was with hunger, thirst and fatigue, Rishi Uddalaki of great punya, cursed him in sudden wrath, "Do you meet with Yama today!"

Struck by his sire with the thunder of his curse, the son, with joined palms, said, "Be appeased with me."

Soon, however, he fell down on the ground, lifeless. Seeing Nachiketa prostrated upon the earth, his father became unhinged with grief. Crying, "Alas, what have I done!" he also fell to the ground. Stricken by grief, as he indulged in lamentations for his son, the rest of that day passed and night came. Then Nachiketa, O son of Kuru's race, drenched by the tears of his father, gave signs of returning to life as he lay on a mat of kusa grass. His being restored to life by the tears of his father resembled the sprouting forth of seeds when drenched with auspicious showers. The son just restored to consciousness was still weak. His body was smeared with fragrant liniments and he looked like one waking from a deep slumber.

The Rishi asked him, "Have you, O son, acquired auspicious realms through your own karma? By good fortune, you have been restored to me. But your body does not seem to be human!"

Nachiketa made the following reply in the midst of all the gathered Rishis, "In obedience to your command I journeyed to the vast world of Yama which is possessed of a charming effulgence. There I beheld a palatial mansion which extended for thousands of yojanas and emanated a golden splendour from its every part. As soon as Yama saw me approach with my face towards him, he commanded his attendants, saying, 'Give him a fine seat.'

Verily, for your sake, the Lord of the dead worshipped me with the arghya. Thus worshipped by Yama and seated in the midst of his counsellors, I said mildly, 'I have come to your abode, O judge of the dead. Do you assign to me those realms which I deserve for my actions.'

Yama answered me, 'You are not dead, O amiable one. Endowed with tapasya, your father said to you, "Do you meet with Yama today!" The tejas of your father is like a blazing fire. I could not possibly make what he said false. You have met me now, child, do you go hence. For the author of your body indulges in heartbroken lamentations for you. You are my dear guest today. What wish that you cherish in your heart shall I grant you? Ask me for the fruition of whatever desire you may have.'

I replied to the king of the dead, saying, 'I have arrived in your dominions from which no traveller ever returns. If I truly deserve your kindness, I wish, O Lord of the dead, to see the regions of high felicity and happiness that are earned by the doers of righteous deeds.'

Immediately, Yama made me mount a chariot of splendour, effulgent as the sun, and to which were harnessed many unworldly steeds. Bearing me on that ratha, he showed me himself, O Dvijottama, all those realms of bliss and fascination that are kept for the righteous. I saw in those worlds many mansions of great resplendence intended for Mahatmans.

Those palaces are of diverse forms and are adorned with every kind of gemstone of heaven. Bright as the disc of the moon, they are adorned with rows of tinkling bells. Hundreds among them are of many storeys. Within their precincts are enchanting groves and woods, with transparent pools and lakes. Possessed of the lustre of lapis lazuli and the sun, and made of silver and gold, their complexion resembles the colour of the dawn. Some of them are immovable and some go anywhere.

Within them are extravagant mounds of unearthly food and drink, other things of enjoyment, and rich robes and soft beds in abundance. Within them are so many trees, kalpa vrikshas that grant every wish. There are also many rivers and roads and spacious halls, and lakes and large tanks. Thousands of chariots with rattling wheels can be seen there, with excellent steeds harnessed. Many rivers that flow milk, many hillocks of heaven's ghrita, and sparkling pools of lucid water are seen all around.

Verily, I beheld many such realms, which I never saw before, wondrous worlds of happiness and joy, all given by the king of the dead. Seeing all these, I addressed that ancient and powerful judge of the dead, saying, 'For whose use and enjoyment have these rivers with eternal currents of kshira and ghrita been ordained?'

Yama answered me saying, 'These streams of milk and ghee, know you, are for the enjoyment of those righteous ones that make gifts in the world of men. Other eternal worlds there are which are filled with such mansions of light free from sorrow of every kind. These are kept for those that make gifts of kine. The mere gift of kine is not worthy of praise. There are other considerations about the person to whom kine should be given, the time for making those gifts, the kind of cows that should be given, and the rites that should be observed in making the gifts. Godana, the gift of kine, should be made after ascertaining the character and excellence of both the Brahmanas who are to receive them and the kine themselves which are to be given.

Cows should not be given to one in whose dwelling they are likely to suffer from fire or the sun. That Brahmana who is possessed of Vedic lore, who is of austere penances, and who performs sacrifices, is regarded as worthy of receiving kine in dana. Cows that have been rescued from distress, or that have been given by poor householders from want of sufficient means to feed and cherish them, are reckoned as being of great value.

Abstaining from all food and living upon water alone for three nights and sleeping the while on the bare earth, one should, having properly fed the cows one intends to give away, bestow them on deserving Brahmanas after having gratified the holy men with other gifts as well. The cows given away should be accompanied by their calves. They should, again, be such as will bring forth good calves in the proper seasons. They should be accompanied with other accoutrements. Having completed the dakshina, the giver should live for three days on only milk and forbear from food of every other kind. He who gives a cow that is gentle and not vicious, that brings forth good calves at proper intervals, and that does not run away from the owner's house, and accompanies such a gift with a vessel of white brass for milking her, enjoys the bliss of heaven for as many years as are measured by the number of hairs on the animal's body.

He, who gives a Brahmana a bull well-broken and able to bear fair burdens, strong and young in years, disinclined to any mischief, big and energetic, enjoys the regions that are reserved for givers of kine. He is regarded as a proper person for receiving a cow in gift who is known to be mild towards kine, who takes cows for his refuge, who is grateful, and who has no means of subsistence. When an old man falls ill, or when a Brahmana intends to perform a sacrifice, or when one wishes to till the earth for farming, or when one has a son through the efficacy of a homa performed, or for the use of one's guru, or for the nurture of a child born naturally, one should give away a beloved cow.

Even these are the considerations that are lauded in the matter of making gifts of cows, in respect of place and time. The cows that deserve to be given away are those that yield copious measures of milk, or those that are well known for their docility and other virtues; or those that have been purchased for a price, or those that have been acquired through the giver's learning, or those that have been obtained in exchange for other living creatures such as sheep and goats, or those that have been won by prowess of arms, or those that have been gained as a marriage-dower from fathers-in-law and other relatives of the giver's wife.'"

Nachiketa continued, "Hearing these words of Vaivaswata, I once more addressed him, saying, 'What are those things by giving which, when kine are not available, givers may yet go to regions reserved for men making gifts of kine?'

The wise Yama answered, explaining further what the end is that is attainable by making gifts of cows. He said, 'In the absence of kine, by making gifts of what has been regarded as the substitute for cows, a man wins the punya of making gifts of the sacred creatures. If, in the absence of kine, one makes a gift of a cow made of ghee, observing a vrata the while, one gets for one's use these rivers of ghee, all of which approach one like an affectionate mother approaching her beloved child. If, in the absence of even a cow made of ghee, one makes a gift of a cow made of sesame seeds, observing a vow the while, one succeeds with the help of that cow to overcome all calamities in this world and to enjoy great happiness hereafter from these rivers of milk that you see before you. If in the absence of a cow made of sesame seeds, one makes a gift of a cow made of water, one succeeds in coming to these happy realms and enjoying this river of cool and transparent water, which is, besides, capable of granting the fruition of every wish.'

The king of the dead explained to me all this while I was his guest, and, O you of unfading glory, great was the joy that I felt at sight of all the wonders he showed me. I shall now tell you what will certainly be agreeable to you. I have now found a great sacrifice whose performance does not require much wealth. That sacrifice of the dakshina of cows may be said to flow from me, O my sire. Others will obtain it also. It is in consonance with the laws of the Vedas.

The curse that you pronounced upon me was no curse but in reality a blessing, since it enabled me to see the great Lord Yama of the dead. In his world I have seen the rewards that attach to giving dakshina. I shall, henceforth, O Mahatman, practise the dharma of giving dana without any doubt lurking in my mind about its rewards. And, O great Rishi, the righteous Yama, filled with joy, repeatedly told me, 'One, who, by making frequent gifts, has succeeded in acquiring purity of mind should then especially make gifts of kine. This subject of giving dakshina is fraught with sanctity. Do you never disregard the dharma of giving. Gifts, again, should be made to deserving persons, when time and place are both suitable. Do you, therefore, always make gifts of kine. Never entertain any doubts in this respect.

Devoted to the path of giving, many Mahatmans in days of yore would make gifts of kine. Fearing to practise austere tapasya, they made gifts according to the extent of their means. In time, they cast off all sentiments of pride and vanity, and purified their souls. Engaged in performing sraddhas in honour of the Pitris and in all acts of dharma, they would make, according to the extent of their ability, gifts of cows, and as the reward of those gifts they have attained to swarga and they shine in effulgence for their righteousness.

O the eighth day of the moon known as Kamyashtami, make gifts of kine, properly won, to Brahmanas after ascertaining the eligibility of the recipients. After making the gift, you should then subsist for ten days upon only the milk of cows, their dung and their urine, while abstaining from all other food.

The punya that one acquires by making a gift of a bull is equal to that which attaches to the Daiva vrata. By making a gift of a bull and cows one acquires, as the reward thereof, a spontaneous mastery of the Vedas. By making a gift of chariots and carriages with bulls yoked, one acquires the merit of baths in sacred waters, the holy tirthas. By making a gift of a cow of the Kapila species, one is purified of all one's sins. Verily, by giving away even a single Kapila cow that has been acquired by legitimate means, one is cleansed of all the sins one may have ever committed.

There is nothing higher in taste than the milk yielded by cows. The gift of a cow, godana, is regarded as the most superior gift. By yielding their precious milk, cows save all the worlds from every calamity. It is cows, again, that produce the food upon which all creatures live. He, who, knowing the extent of the service that cows render, does not entertain in his heart love for cows, is a sinner who is certain to fall into hell.

If one gives a thousand or a hundred or ten or five kine, verily, if one gives to a righteous Brahmana even a single cow which brings forth good calves at proper intervals, one is sure to see that cow approach one in heaven in the form of a river of sacred water which grants every wish. In respect of the prosperity and the growth that cows confer, in the matter also of the protection that kine grant to all creatures of the earth, cows are equal to the very rays of the sun that fall on the earth.

The word that signifies the cow, Aditi, stands also for the rays of the sun. The giver of a cow becomes the progenitor of a great vamsa that extends over a large tract of the earth. Hence, he that gives a cow shines like a second sun in splendour. The disciple should, in the matter of godana, carefully choose his preceptor. Such a disciple is sure to find swarga for himself. The choosing of a guru for the performance of pious deeds is regarded as a sacred duty by those who know the shastras. This is, indeed, the first law; all others depend upon it.

Choosing, after examination, an eligible Brahmana, one should give him the dakshina of a cow that has been acquired by legitimate means, and having made the gift cause him to accept it. The gods and men and we, also, in wishing each other well, say, 'Let the punya of dana be yours in consequence of your dharma!'"

Even thus did the Lord of the dead speak to me, O Dvija. I then bowed my head to the righteous Yama. With his leave, I left his dominions and have now returned to worship at your feet.'"'

CANTO 72

Yudhishtira says, ‘You have, Pitamaha, spoken of godana in speaking of Rishi Nachiketa. You have also implicitly discoursed, O mighty one, on the efficacy and pre-eminence of that act. You have also told me, O Grandsire of great intelligence, of the terrible fate that overtook the Mahatman King Nriga because of a single fault. He had to spend a long time in Dwaravati in the form of a mighty lizard until Krishna saved him from that plight. I have, however, one question. It is on the subject of Goloka, the higher realm of cows. I wish to hear, in detail, about those regions which are kept for those that make gifts of kine.’

Bhishma says, ‘Listen, then, to the old tale of the discourse between him who sprang from the primeval lotus and him who performed a hundred sacrifices.

Sakra once said, “I see, O Pitamaha, that those who are dwellers in Goloka surpass in both their resplendence and their prosperity the denizens of Swargaloka and pass them by as beings of inferior station. And this has raised a query in my mind. Of what kind, O Holy One, are the worlds of kine? Tell me all about them, O sinless one. Verily, what is the nature of those realms that are inhabited by givers of cows? I wish to know of what kind they are. What fruits do they bring? What is the highest objective there which the denizens of Goloka succeed in winning? What are its virtues?

How also do men, freed from every kind of anxiety, succeed in going to those sacred realms? For what period does the giver of a cow enjoy the fruits that are borne by his gift? How may they make gifts of many kine and how gifts of a few cows? What are the merits attaching to gifts of many kine and what those that attach to gifts of a few only?

How also do some become givers of kine without actually giving any kine? Do you tell me all this, O Brahma. How does one making gifts of even many kine, O most mighty Lord, become the equal of one that has made gift of only a few kine? How also does one who make gifts of only a few kine succeed in becoming the equal of one who has made gifts of many kine? What kind of dakshina is regarded as distinguished for pre-eminence in the matter of godana? It behoves you, O holy Grandsire of worlds, to discourse to me on all this agreeably to truth."

The Grandsire said, “The questions you have asked me about kine, beginning with their gift, are such that there is none else in the three worlds, O you of a hundred sacrifices, who could have asked. There are many kinds of worlds, O Sakra, which are invisible to even you. I see those realms, O Indra, as do women that are chaste and have been attached to only one husband. Rishis observant of stern vows, through their deeds of righteousness and piety, and Brahmanas of righteous souls, succeed in repairing to them even in their bodily forms. Men that observe the loftiest vows behold those regions which resemble the bright creations of dreams, for they are helped by their cleansed minds and by that temporary mukti which succeeds the loss of one’s consciousness of body.

Listen, O you of a thousand eyes, and I will tell you what the attributes are with which those regions are endowed. There the very course of Time is suspended. Decrepitude is not there, nor fire which is omnipresent in the universe. There the slightest evil does not come, nor disease, nor weakness of any kind. The sacred kine that live there, O Vasava, obtain the fruition of every desire which they cherish in their hearts. I have direct experience of what I say to you. Able to go everywhere at will and actually journeying from place to place with ease, they enjoy the fruition of wish after wish even as these arise in their minds.

Lakes and tanks and rivers and forests of diverse kinds, and mansions and hills and all kinds of wonderful objects, delightful to all creatures, are found there. There is no world of felicity that is superior to any of these of which I speak. All those best of men, O Sakra, who are forgiving to all creatures, who endure everything, who are full of affection for all things, who render dutiful obedience to their gurus, and who are free from pride and vanity, attain to those realms of supreme bliss.

He who abstains from every kind of flesh, who is possessed of a purified heart, who is blessed with righteousness; who worships his parents with reverence, who is truthful in speech and demeanour, who attends with obedience upon Brahmanas, who is faultless in conduct, who never behaves with anger towards cows and towards Brahmanas; who is devoted to the accomplishment of every duty, who serves his preceptors with reverence, who is devoted for his whole life to truth and to giving, and who is always forgiving towards all transgressions against himself; who is mild and self-restrained, who is full of reverence for the deities, who is hospitable to all guests, who is endued with the utmost compassion—verily, he who is adorned with these attributes succeeds in attaining to Goloka, the eternal and immutable world of kine.

He who is stained with adultery never sees such a world; nor he who is a slayer of his guru; nor he who speaks falsely or indulges in idle boasts; nor he who always disputes with others; nor he who behaves with hostility towards Brahmanas. Indeed, that evil one who is stained with such faults fails to attain even a glimpse of these regions of felicity; also he that injures his friends; also he that is full of guile; also he that is ungrateful; also he that is a cheat; also he that is crooked in his ways; also he that is a disregarder of dharma; also he that is a killer of Brahmanas. Such men cannot behold in even imagination Goloka that is the abode of only the righteous of deeds.

I have told you everything about the world of kine, O Lord of the Devas. Hear now, O you of a hundred sacrifices, the merit that is theirs who are engaged in making gifts of kine. He who make gifts of kine, after purchasing them with wealth obtained through inheritance or acquired lawfully by him, attains, as the fruit of such an act to many realms of inexhaustible felicity. He who makes a gift of a cow, having acquired it with wealth won at dice, enjoys felicity, O Sakra, for ten thousand years of the Devas. He who acquires a cow as his share of ancestral wealth is said to acquire her legitimately. Such a cow may be given away. They that make gifts of kine so acquired attain to many eternal regions of inexhaustible bliss.

That man who, having acquired a cow in gift, makes a gift of her with a pure heart, attains without doubt, O Lord of Sachi, eternal regions of beatitude. He who, with restrained senses, speaks the truth from his birth to the time of his death, and who endures everything at the hands of his guru and of Brahmanas, and who practises forgiveness, attains to an end that is equal to that of holy kine. Speech that is harsh or vulgar, O Indra, should never be addressed to a Brahmana. One should not, in even one's mind, do any injury to a cow. One should, in one's conduct, imitate the cow in mildness and gentleness, and show compassion towards the cow.

Hear, O Sakra, what the fruits are that become his who is devoted to the dharma of truth. If such a one gives away a single cow, that one cow becomes equal to a thousand. If a Kshatriya possessed of such qualities makes a gift of a single cow, his merit becomes equal to that of a Brahmana's. That single cow, Sakra, which such a Kshatriya gives away becomes the source of as much punya as the single cow that a Brahmana gives away under similar circumstances. Even this is the certain conclusion of the shastras.

If a Vaisya of similar accomplishments were to make the gift of a single cow, that cow would be equal to five hundred kine in the merit she would produce. If a Sudra blessed with humility were to make the gift of a cow, such a cow would be equal to a hundred and twenty-five kine in punya. Devoted to penances and truth, proficient in the scriptures and all good karma through dutiful service rendered to his guru, blessed with forgiveness of disposition, engaged in the worship of the gods, possessed of a tranquil soul, pure in body and mind, enlightened, observant of all dharma, and freed from every kind of egotism, the man who makes a gift of a cow to a Brahmana, certainly attains to great punya through that dakshina of his—the gift, according to proper rites, of a cow yielding copious milk. Hence, with singleness of devotion, observant of truth and humbly serving one's preceptor, one should always make gifts of kine.

Hear, O Sakra, what the punya is of that man who, duly studying the Vedas, shows reverence for kine, who always grows glad at the sight of cows, and who, since his birth has always bowed his head to kine. The punya that becomes one's by performing the Rajasuya yagna, the punya that becomes one's by making gifts of piles of gold—that lofty merit is acquired by him who shows such reverence for kine. Righteous Rishis and other Mahatmans, crowned with true success, have said so. Devoted to truth, possessed of a tranquil soul, free from greed, always truthful in speech, and behaving with reverence towards kine with the steadiness of a vow, the man who, for a whole year before himself taking any food, regularly feeds cows, wins the punya of making a gift of a thousand kine.

That man who eats only one meal a day and who gives away the entire quantity of his other meal to kine—verily, the man who thus reverences cows with the steadfastness of a vrata and shows such compassion towards them, enjoys ten years of limitless felicity. That man who confines himself to one meal a day and with the other meal saved over some time, buys a cow and makes a gift of it, earns, through that gift, O you of a hundred sacrifices, the eternal punya that attaches to the gift of as many kine as there are hairs on the body of that single cow he gives. These are immutable declarations in respect of the merit that Brahmanas acquire by making gifts of kine.

Listen now to the punya that Kshatriyas may win. It has been said that a Kshatriya, by buying a cow in this manner and making a gift of it to a Brahmana, acquires uninterrupted felicity for five years. A Vaisya, by such conduct, acquires only half the merit of a Kshatriya, and a Sudra earns half the punya that a Vaisya does. That man, who sells himself and with the proceeds thereof purchases kine and gives them away to Brahmanas, enjoy bliss in heaven for as long as cows seen on earth. It has been said, O most blessed one, that in every hair of such cows as are bought with the proceeds gained by selling oneself, there is a whole world of inexhaustible felicity.

The man who having acquired kine by battle makes gifts of them to Brahmanas, acquires as much merit as he who makes gifts of kine after having bought them by selling himself. The man who, in the absence of kine, makes a gift of a cow made of sesame seeds, restraining his senses the while, is saved by such a cow from every kind of danger or distress. Such a man sports in great felicity.

The mere godana is not laden with merit. The considerations of deserving recipients, of time, of the kind of kine, and of the ritual to be observed while giving, must be attended to. One should ascertain the proper time for making a gift of kine. One should also ascertain the distinctive merits of both the Brahmanas who are to receive them and of kine which are to be given away. Cows should not be given to one in whose abode they are likely to suffer from fire or the sun. One, who is rich in Vedic lore, who is of pure lineage, who is endowed with a tranquil soul, who is devoted to the performance of sacrifices, who fears the commission of sin, who is possessed of varied knowledge, who is compassionate towards cows, who is mild in behaviour, who accords protection to all that seek it of him, and who has no means of sustenance assigned to him, is regarded as a proper person to receive a gift of cows.

To a Brahmana who has no means of sustenance, to him while he is afflicted for want of food—for instance, in a time of famine—for farming, for a child born as a result of homa, for the purposes of his guru, for the nurture of a child born naturally and lawfully, a cow should be given. Verily, the gift should be made at a proper time and in a proper place.

Those kine, O Sakra, whose gentle and auspicious dispositions are well known, which have been acquired as a reward for knowledge, or which have been bought in exchange for other animals such as goats and sheep, or which have been won by prowess of arms, or obtained as marriage-dower; or which have been acquired by being rescued from danger, or which, unable to be maintained by their impoverished owner have been made over for careful keep to another, are regarded as appropriate gifts. Such kine that are strong of body, which have good dispositions, and which emit an agreeable fragrance, are lauded as gifts. As Ganga is the foremost of all rivers, even so is a Kapila cow the foremost of all bovines.

Abstaining from all food and living only upon water for three nights, and sleeping for the same period on bare earth, one should make gifts of kine to Brahmanas after having gratified them with other offerings. Such kine, free from every fault, should be accompanied by healthy calves that have not been weaned. Having made the gift, the giver should live for the next three days on food consisting only of the produce of the cow.

By giving away a cow that is of a good disposition, that quietly suffers herself to be milked, that always brings forth living and healthy calves, and that does not run away from her owner's home, the giver enjoys prosperity in the next world for as many years as there are hairs on her body. Similarly, by giving to a Brahmana a bull that can bear heavy burden, that is young and strong and docile, that quietly bears the yoke of the plough, and that is possessed of such energy as he can endure great labour, one attains to such regions as are his who gives away ten cows.

That man who rescues kine and Brahmanas from danger in the wilderness is himself rescued from every kind of peril and calamity. Hear what his punya is. The merit such a man acquires is equal to the eternal punya of a horse sacrifice. Such a one attains to whatever end he wishes for at the hour of his death. Many a region of felicity—in fact, whatever happiness he covets in his heart—becomes his through what he has done. Verily, such a man, blessed by kine, lives honoured in every realm of heaven.

That man, who follows his herd every day in the forest, himself subsisting the while on grass and cow dung and leaves of trees, his heart freed from desire of reward, his senses restrained from every improper object and his mind purified of all dross—that man, O you of a hundred sacrifices, lives in joy and freed from the dominion of desire in my world, Brahmaloka, or in any other realm of bliss that he wishes, in the company of the Devas.'"

'Indra said, "I wish to know, O Grandsire, what end he attains who steals a cow or who sells one from motives of greed."

The Grandsire said, "Hear what consequences overtake those that steal a cow for killing her for food, or selling her for wealth, or making a gift of her to a Brahmana. He who, without being checked by the restraints of the scriptures, sells a cow, or kills one, or eats the flesh of a cow, or they, who, for the sake of wealth, suffer a person to kill kine—all these, he that kills, he that eats, and he that permits the slaughter, rot in hell for as many years as there are hairs on the body of the cow that is slain.

O you of great puissance, all those sins that attach to one that obstructs a Brahmana's sacrifice attach to the sale and the theft of kine. That man who having stolen a cow makes a gift of her to a Brahmana, enjoys felicity in heaven as the reward of the gift but suffers misery in hell for the sin of theft, for as long a period.

Gold has been said to constitute the dakshina, O you of great splendour, in godana, the gifts of kine. Indeed, gold has been said to be the best dakshina in all sacrifices. By making a gift of kine one is said to redeem one's ancestors to the seventh generation as well as one's descendants, also to the seventh. By giving away kine with a dakshina of gold one saves one's ancestors and descendants of twice that number. The gift of gold, suvarnadana, is the best of gifts. Gold is, again, the best dakshina. Gold is a great cleanser, O Sakra, and is, indeed, the best of all purifying agents. O you of a hundred sacrifices, gold has been said to be the sanctifier of the entire race of him who gives it away. I have thus, O you of great splendour, told you in brief about dakshina.'" Bhishma says, 'Even this is what the Pitamaha Brahma said to Indra, O king of the Bharatas. Indra imparted this to Dasaratha, and Dasaratha in his turn to his son Rama; Rama of Raghu's vamsa imparted it to his dear brother Lakshmana of great fame. While dwelling in the forest, Lakshmana taught it to the Rishis. It has then come down from generation to generation, for the Rishis of rigid vows held it amongst themselves as also the righteous kings of the earth. My guru, Bhargava, O Yudhishtira, taught it to me. That Brahmana, who recites it every day in assemblies of Brahmanas, at sacrifices or during godanas, or when two pure men meet, acquires hereafter many regions of inexhaustible bliss where he always dwells with the gods as his companions. The holy Brahma, the Supreme Lord, said so to Indra on the subject of kine, and godana.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'I have been greatly assured, O mighty one, by you thus discoursing to me on dharma. I must, however, give expression to the doubts and questions that I still have. Do you clear them for me, Pitamaha. What are the fruits, declared in the scriptures, of the vows that men observe? Of what nature are the fruits, O you of great splendour, of observances of other kinds? What, again, are the fruits, of one's studying the Vedas thoroughly? What are the fruits of gifts, and what those of holding the Vedas in one's memory? What are the fruits that attach to the teaching of the Vedas? I want to know all this.

What, O Grandsire, are the merits that attach to not accepting dana in this world? What fruits are seen to attach to him who gives gifts of knowledge? What is the punya acquired by persons that observe their svadharma, as also by Kshatriyas that do not flee from battle? What are the fruits that have been declared to attach to the observance of purity and to the practice of brahmacharya? What are the merits that attach to the service of one's father and mother? What also are the merits of serving gurus and acharyas, and what are the merits of compassion and kindness?

I want to know all these, Pitamaha, truly and in detail, O you that know all the shastras. Great is the curiosity that I feel.'

Bhishma says, 'Eternal regions of rapture become his, who, having properly commenced a vrata, a vow, completes its observance according to the scriptures, without a break. The fruits of niyamas, O king, are visible even in this world. These rewards that you have won are those of niyamas and yagnas. The fruits that attach to the study of the Vedas are seen both here and hereafter. The one who is devoted to the study of the Vedas is seen to live in joy both in this world and in the world of Brahma.

Listen now to me, O king, as I tell you in detail what the fruits are of yama or niyati or self-restraint. They that are self-restrained are happy everywhere. They that are self-restrained are always in the enjoyment of that bliss which attaches to the absence or the subjugation of desire. They that are self-restrained are able to go everywhere at will. They that are self-restrained can destroy every enemy. Without doubt, they that are self-restrained succeed in obtaining everything they seek.

They that are self-restrained, O son of Pandu, have their every wish fulfilled. The happiness that men enjoy in swarga, through tapasya and prowess at arms, through dana, and through diverse sacrifices, also becomes theirs that are self-restrained and forgiving. Self-restraint is more meritorious than a gift. A giver, after making a gift to Brahmanas, may still yield to the influence of anger. A self-restrained man, however, never yields to wrath. Hence, self-restraint is superior in punya to charity. The man who makes gifts without yielding to anger, succeeds in attaining to eternal regions of bliss. Anger destroys the merit of a gift. Hence, is yama superior to dana.

There are countless invisible realms, O king, numbering millions, in swarga. They are spread across the face of heaven, and these worlds belong to the Rishis. Men leave this world, attain to them and become transformed into deities. Rajan, the great Rishis go to them, taken only by their self-restraint, and as the end of their efforts to attain to a world of superior happiness. Hence, self-restraint is indeed superior in spiritual efficacy to giving charity and gifts.

The Brahmana, who becomes an acharya who teaches the Vedas, and who duly worships the holy fire, leaves all his sorrows and afflictions in this world, and goes to enjoy inexhaustible ecstasy in the world of Brahma. That Brahmana who, having himself studied the Vedas, imparts a knowledge of them to righteous disciples, and who praises his own guru, attains to great honour in swarga.

The Kshatriya, who takes to the study of the Vedas, to the performance of yagnas, to the giving of dana, and who saves the lives of others in battle, similarly attains to great honour in heaven. The Vaisya, who, observing his svadharma, makes gifts, reaps as the fruit of those gifts a crowning reward. The Sudra, who duly observes the dharma of his varna, which consists of service rendered to the three other orders, wins swarga as the reward of such service.

Diverse kinds of heroes have been spoken of in the scriptures. Listen to me as I tell you what the rewards are that they attain to. The rewards are fixed of a hero belonging to a heroic vamsa. There are heroes of sacrifice, heroes of self-restraint, heroes of truth, and others equally entitled to the name of vira. There are heroes of battle, and shuras of gift and of liberality among men. There are many who may be called the heroes of the Sankhya faith as, indeed, there are many others that are called nayakas of Yoga.

There are others that are regarded as heroes in vanaprastha, of grihasta, and of renunciation, sannyasa. Similarly, there are others that are called viras of the intellect, and also heroes of forgiveness. There are other men, who live in tranquillity and who are regarded as nayakas of dharma, righteousness. There are many other kinds of heroes that practise diverse other kinds of vows and observances. There are masters devoted to the study of the Vedas and heroes devoted to the teaching of the Vedas. There are, again, men that come to be regarded as viras for the devotion with which they wait upon and serve their preceptors, as indeed, shuras in respect of the reverence they show to their sires.

There are heroes of obedience to their mothers, and heroes for the life of mendicancy they lead. There are heroes in the matter of hospitality to guests, while living as grihastas. All these great men attain to transcendent regions of joy which, of course, they acquire as the rewards of their own karma. Holding all the Vedas in memory, or ablutions performed in all the tirthas, the sacred waters, may or may not be equal to telling the Truth every day of one's life. A thousand Aswamedha yagnas and Truth were once weighed in a balance. It was seen that Truth weighed heavier than a thousand horse sacrifices.

It is by Truth that the sun gives heat and light, it is by Truth that fire burns, it is by Truth that the winds blow; verily, everything rests upon Truth. It is Truth, Satya, that gratifies the Devas, the Pitris and the Brahmanas. Truth has been said to be the highest dharma. Therefore, no one should ever transgress Truth. The Munis are all devoted to Truth. Their prowess depends upon Satya. They also swear by Truth. Hence, Satya is pre-eminent. All truthful men, O Lord of the Bharatas, succeed by their truthfulness in attaining swarga and sporting there in bliss.

Niyati, self-restraint, is the attainment of the reward that attaches to Truth. I have discoursed on it with my whole heart. The man of humble heart who is possessed of self-restraint, beyond doubt attains to great honour in heaven.

Listen now to me, O Bhumipala, as I expound to you the merits of brahmacharya, celibacy. That man, who practises the vow of brahmacharya from his birth to the time of his death—know, O king, that for such a man nothing is unattainable. Millions of Rishis dwell in the world of Brahma. All of them, while here, were devoted to Truth, and self-restrained, had their vital seed drawn up. The vow of brahmacharya, O king, duly observed by a Brahmana, is sure to consume all his sins. The Brahmana is said to be a blazing fire. In those Brahmanas that are devoted to tapasya, the god of fire becomes plainly visible. If a Brahmacharin yields to wrath from being slighted in any way, the king of the Devas himself trembles in fear. Even this is the visible fruit of the vow of Brahmacharya that is observed by the Rishis.

Listen to me, O Yudhishtira, what the punya is that attaches to the worship of one's father and mother. He who dutifully serves his father without ever crossing him in anything, or similarly serves his mother or elder brother or other elder or preceptor, know, earns a place in heaven. The man of purified soul, because of such service rendered to his elders, has never to even catch a glimpse of the hell that is naraka.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'I desire, O king, to hear you discourse in detail upon those high laws which regulate godana, for it is by making gifts of kine according to those laws that one attains to innumerable regions of eternal prosperity and joy.'

Bhishma says, 'There is no dana, O Lord of earth, which is higher in merit than the godana. A righteously acquired cow, if given away, immediately redeems the entire vamsa of the giver. That ritual which first came to be for the benefit of the righteous, was subsequently declared to be for the weal of all creatures. That ritual has come down from primeval time. Why, it existed even before it was revealed. Verily, O Rajan, listen to me and I will tell you about the ritual which affects the gift of kine.

In days of yore, when a number of kine intended to be given away were brought before him, King Mandhatri, filled with doubt about the ritual with which he should give them away, questioned the Devaguru Brihaspati to clear his doubt.

Brihaspati said, "Duly observing self-restraint all the while, the giver of kine should, on the previous day, properly honour Brahmanas and appoint the actual time of dana. As regards the kine to be given away, they should be of the kind called Rohini. The cows should be addressed with the words Samange and Bahule. Entering the fold where the kine are kept, the following Srutis should be uttered—The cow is my mother. The bull is my sire. Give me heaven and earthly prosperity. The cow is my refuge!

Entering the fold and saying these words, the giver should pass the night there. He should again utter the same chant when actually giving away the kine. Thus staying with the kine in the fold without doing anything to restrain their freedom, and lying down on the bare earth, without driving away the gnats and other insects that annoy him as they annoy the cows, the giver is immediately purified of all his sins through reducing himself to a state of perfect similitude with the kine.

When the sun rises in the morning, you should give away the chosen Rohini cow, along with her calf and a bull. As the reward for such a gift, you will surely become worthy of attaining swarga. The blessings that are declared by the holy mantras will also be yours.

The mantras speak thus of kine: Cows are endued with strength and energy. Kine have in them wisdom. They are the source of that immortality which sacrifice achieves. They are the refuge of all tejas. They are the steps by which earthly prosperity is won. They constitute the eternal course of the universe. They lead to the extension of one's race. Let the kine that I give away destroy my sins. They have that in them which partakes in the nature of both Surya and Soma. Let them help me attain heaven. Let them betake themselves to me as a mother to her child. Let all other blessings also be mine that have not been named in the mantras I have uttered!

In the alleviation or cure of phthisis and other wasting sicknesses, and in the matter of achieving freedom from the body, if a person takes the help of the five precious things that the cow yields, kine become inclined to confer blessings upon the giver even like the Saraswati river. O sacred cows, you are always bestowers of all kinds of punya. Gratified with me, do you appoint a desirable end for me. I have today become what you are. By giving you away, I give myself away.

After these words have been uttered by giver, the receiver should say, You are no longer owned by him who gives you away. You have now become mine. Possessed of the nature of both Surya and Soma, do you cause both the giver and the receiver to blaze forth with all kinds of prosperity!

Thus the giver should utter the first part of the above verse. The twice-born receiver, who knows the ritual that regulates godana, utters the words occurring in the latter half of the mantra.

The man who, instead of a cow, gives away cloths or gold of the same value as a cow, comes to be regarded as the giver of a cow; the giver, when giving away the value of a cow in other form should say—This cow with face upturned is being given away. Do you accept her.

The man who gives away cloths in the place of a cow should say—Bhavitavya! meaning that the gift should be regarded as representing a cow. The man who gives away gold in place of a cow should utter the word Vaishnavi! meaning this gold that I give is of the form and nature of a cow. These are the words that should be uttered for the particular dana.

The reward reaped by making such vicarious gifts of kine is a term in swarga for six and thirty thousand years, eight thousand years, and twenty-thousand years, respectively. These are the merits of gifts of things that are given in the stead of kine. As regards him who gives an actual cow, all the punya that attaches to vicarious gifts of cows become his at the eighth step homewards of the recipient.

He that gives an actual cow is endowed with righteous conduct in this world. He that gives the value of a cow is freed from every kind of fear. He that gives a cow or a gift of like value never meets with sorrow. All the three, as also they that regularly go through their ablutions and other kriyas at dawn, and he that knows the Mahabharata well, all attain to the worlds of Vishnu and Soma.

Having given away a cow, the giver should for three nights keep a vrata and pass one night with kine. Beginning again from that lunation, on the eight tithi, which is known as kamya, he should pass three nights, supporting himself entirely on the milk, urine and dung of the cow. By giving away a bull, one attains to the punya that attaches to the divine vow of brahmacharya. By giving away two kine, a bull and a cow, one acquires mastery of the Vedas.

The man who performs a sacrifice and makes gifts of kine agreeably to the ritual laid down, attains to many regions of a superior character. These, however, are not attainable by one who does not know or perform that ritual and who, therefore, gives godana without observing the scriptural declarations. That man who gives away even a single cow that yields a copious measure of milk, acquires the merit of giving away all the desirable things on earth collected together. What need, therefore, be said of the gift of many such kine as yield havya and kavya for their teats being full?

The merit that attaches to the gift of superior oxen is greater than that which attaches to the gift of kine. One should not, by imparting a knowledge of this ritual, benefit a person that is not one's disciple or who does not observe vratas, or that is bereft of faith or possessed of a crooked understanding. Truly, this dharma is a mystery, unknown to most. One that knows it should not speak of it in every place. There are, in the world, many men that are without faith. There are among men many persons that are mean and that resemble Rakshasas. This religion, if imparted to them, would lead to evil. Indeed, it would produce equal evil if imparted to such sinful men as have taken shelter in godlessness.

Listen to me, O king, and I will recite to you the names of those great kings of dharma that attained to regions of great felicity as the reward of the godana which they gave agreeable to the dictates of Brihaspati: Usinara, Viswagaswa, Nriga, Bhagiratha, the celebrated Mandhatri, son of Yuvanaswa, King Muchukunda, Bhagiratha, Naishadha, Somaka, Pururavas, Bharata of imperial sway to whose vamsa all the Bharatas belong, the heroic Rama, son of Dasaratha, and many other celebrated kings of great achievements, and also King Dilipa of widely known deeds, all, because of their gifts of kine agreeable to the ritual, attained to swarga.

King Mandhatri was always observant of yagnas, dakshina, tapasya, rajadharma and godana. Therefore, O son of Pritha, do you also bear in mind those behests of Brihaspati which I have recited to you regarding godana.

Having acquired the kingdom of the Kurus, do you, with a cheerful heart, make gifts of the finest kine to the foremost of Brahmanas!'

Thus addressed by Bhishma on the proper way to make gifts of kine, King Yudhishtira did all that Bhishma wished. Verily, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja bore in his heart the whole of that dharma which the Devaguru Brihaspati imparted to the royal Mandhatri. Yudhishtira, from that time, began to give godana and to support himself on grains of barley and on cow dung and the urine of kine, as both his food and drink. The king also began to sleep from that day on the bare earth, and with restrained soul and resembling a bull in strength and conduct, he became the greatest of monarchs.

From that day, the Kuru king became most attentive to cows and always worshipped them, hymning their praises. From that day, the king gave up the practice of yoking bullocks to his carriages. Wheresoever he had occasion to go, he went on chariots drawn by horses of mettle.'" Vaisampayana said, "King Yudhishtira, endowed with humility, yet again questioned the royal son of Santanu on the subject of godana, in further detail.'

The king said, 'Do you, O Bhaarata, once more discourse to me in depth on the merits of giving away cows. Verily, O Kshatriya, I am not satiated with listening to your amrita-like words.'

Thus addressed by Yudhishtira the just, Santanu's son Bhishma begins to discourse to him again on the punya attached to godana. Bhishma says, 'By giving to a Brahmana a cow possessed of a calf, endued with docility and other virtues, young in years, and wrapped round with a piece of cloth, one is cleansed of all one's sins. There are many regions in naraka which are sunless, lightless. One who makes the gift of a cow has never to go to such hells. That man, however, who gives to a Brahmana a cow that cannot drink or eat, who has not milk for her teats have run dry, whose body and senses are enfeebled, who is diseased and decrepit, and which may be likened to a tank whose water has dried up—indeed, the man who gives such a cow to a Brahmana and thereby inflicts only pain and disappointment upon him, has certainly to enter into the darkest hell.

That cow that is ill-tempered and vicious, or sickly or weak, or which has been bought without the price agreed upon having been paid, or which would only afflict the Dvija with distress and frustration, should never be given. The realms of grace such a giver may otherwise acquire as rewards of other deeds of dharma he has performed would all fail to bring him any happiness or impart to him any tejas. Only such kine as are strong, docile, young in years, and possessed of fragrance, are praised by all for being given in godana. And truly, as Ganga is the foremost of all rivers, even so is a Kapila cow the best of all kine.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Why, O Grandsire, do the righteous especially laud the gift of a Kapila cow, when all good kine that are given away should be regarded as equal? O mighty one, I wish to hear what the distinction is that attaches to a Kapila cow. You are, for certain, competent to discourse to me on this matter.'

Bhishma says, 'I have, O son, heard old men recite this history regarding the circumstances under which the Kapila cow was created. I shall recite that old tale to you. In days of yore, the Self-born Brahma commanded Rishi Daksha, "Do you create living creatures!"

From the desire of doing good to living creatures, Daksha first created annrita, food. Even as the Devas exist, depending upon amrita, all living creatures live depending upon the sustenance of food assigned by Daksha. Among all creatures chala and achala, mobile and unmoving, the mobile are superior. Among mobile creatures Brahmanas are the most superior, for the yagnas are all established upon them, and it is through sacrifice that Soma rasa is obtained.

Sacrifice has been established upon kine. The gods become gratified through sacrifices. As regards creation, then, the means of support came first, and the creatures came next. As soon as creatures were born, they began to cry aloud for food. All of them then approached their Creator to feed them like children going to their father or mother.

Knowing what his creatures craved, Daksha Prajapati, the holy Lord of all the living creatures, himself drank a quantity of amrita, for the sake of the beings he had created. He became gratified with the nectar he quaffed and thereupon an eructation came from him, exuding a most divine fragrance all around. And from that wondrous and ambrosial belching, there arose the original and divine cow, which Daksha named Surabhi.

This Surabhi was thus a daughter of his that sprang forth from his mouth. The cow called Surabhi brought forth a number of daughters who came to be regarded as the mothers of the world. Their complexion was that of gold, and they were all Kapilas. They were the means of sustenance for all creatures. As those kine, whose complexion resembled that of amrita, began to pour forth milk, the froth of that milk rose up and began to spread on every side, even as when the waves of a river dash against one another, copious froth is created that spreads on every side.

Some of that froth fell from the mouths of the calves that were suckling upon the head of Mahadeva who was seated upon the earth. Thereupon, the puissant Mahadeva, filled with wrath, cast his eyes upon those kine. With the third eye which adorns his forehead, he seemed to burn those kine as he looked at them. Like the sun tingeing cloud masses with colours, the energy that issued from the third eye of Mahadeva produced, O monarch, diverse complexions on those kine. Those among then which escaped from the glare of Siva by fleeing into Somaloka, remained the same colour as they were born—pristine white.

Seeing that the Lord Siva was incensed, Daksha Prajapati said to him, "You have, O Mahadeva, been drenched with amrita. The milk or the froth that escapes from the mouths of calves sucking at their dams is never impure. Chandramas drinks the rasa and pours it forth once more; but it is not regarded as being unclean. Even so, the milk that these kine yield, being born of amrita, is not considered impure even though the calves have touched the cows' teats with their mouths.

The wind can never become unclean. Fire can never become unclean. Gold can never become unclean. The ocean can never become unclean. Amrita, even when drunk by the Devas, can never become impure. And the milk of a cow, even when her udders are sucked by her calf, can never become impure. These kine will support all these worlds with the milk they will yield and the ghrita that will be made from it.

All creatures want to enjoy the sacred and ambrosial wealth that cows possess and yield."

Saying this to Siva, Daksha made a gift of a bull and some cows to Mahadeva. Daksha gratified the heart of Rudra, O Bhaarata, with that dakshina and, gratified, Siva made that bull his mount. And it was after the form of that great bull, Nandin, that Mahadeva adorned the standard on his battle-chariot; and so did Siva become known as Vrishabdhvaja or the Bull-bannered One.

It was on that occasion also that the celestials, uniting together, made Mahadeva the Pasupati, the Lord of animals. Indeed, the great Rudra became the master of kine and is called the Bull-signed God.

Hence, O king, in the matter of giving away kine, the gift of Kapila cows is regarded as being the best of all, for they are endowed with great tejas and retain their original white hue. Thus are kine the foremost of all creatures in the world. It is from them that the means have flowed for the sustenance of all the worlds. They have Rudra for their master. They yield Soma rasa in the form of milk. They are auspicious and sacred, and granters of every wish and givers of life. By making a gift of a cow a man comes to be regarded as making a gift of every desirable thing that men enjoy. That man who wishes to attain to prosperity reads, with a pure heart and body, these slokas on the origin of kine, and is cleansed of all his sins and indeed attains to prosperity and children and wealth and animals.

He who makes a gift of a cow, O king, always succeeds in acquiring the punya that attaches to gifts of havya and kavya, to the offer of tarpana, oblations of water to the Pitris, to other religious kriyas whose performance brings peace and happiness, to the gift of chariots and carriages and fine cloths, and to cherishing children and the old.'

Hearing these words of his Grandsire, Pritha's son, the royal Yudhishtira of Ajamida's race, with his brothers, began to make gifts of both bulls and cows of different colours to the best Brahmanas. Verily, in order to conquer realms of grace in the next world, and of winning great fame, Yudhishtira performed many sacrifices and, as sacrificial dakshina, gave away hundreds of thousands of kine to such Brahmanas.'

CANTO 78

Bhishma says, ‘In days of yore, King Saudasa born of Ikshvaku’s race, foremost of eloquent men, once went to his kulaguru, his family priest Vasishta, that greatest of Rishis, crowned with ascetic success, who could range through all the worlds at will, Vasishta the receptacle of Brahman, and blessed with eternal life, and put him the following question.

Saudasa said, “O holy, sinless one, what is that in the three worlds, which is sacred and by reciting which at all times a man may acquire the highest punya?”

To King Saudasa who stood before him with head bent in reverence, the learned Vasishta, having first bowed to sacred kine and purified himself in body and mind, discoursed upon the rahasya relating to cows, a subject fraught with rewards most beneficial to all.

Vasishta said, “Kine are always fragrant with the auspicious redolence of amrita that their bodies exude. Cows are the great refuge of all creatures. Cows constitute the great source of blessing to all. Kine are the past and the future. Kine are the source of eternal growth. Kine are the root of prosperity. Anything given to kine is never lost. Kine constitute the highest food. They are the best havi for the Devas. The mantras called Swaha and Vashat are forever established in kine. Cows are the fruit of sacrifices. Sacrifices are established in kine. Kine are the future and the past, and sacrifice rests upon them. Morning and evening, cows yield havis to Rishis for use in homa, O you of great effulgence.

They who make a gift of kine succeed in transcending all their sins and avoiding every kind of calamity into which they may fall. The man who owns ten cows and makes a gift of one cow, he that owns a hundred kine and makes a gift of ten, and he who has a thousand cows and makes a gift of a hundred, all earn the same measure of merit.

The man who, though he owns hundred cows, does not establish a domestic fire for daily worship; the man who, though he owns a thousand kine, does not perform sacrifices; and that man who owns wealth but is a miser who gives no gifts and never discharges the dharma of hospitality, are all three not worthy of any respect.

Those men who make gifts of Kapila cows with their calves and with vessels of white brass for milking them—cows that are gentle and not vicious and which, while given away, are richly caparisoned—conquer both this and the other world. Men who make a gift of a bull that is still in his prime of youth, strong, and the best bull in hundreds of herds, who has big horns adorned with ornaments of gold or silver, to a Brahmana possessed of Vedic knowledge, succeed, O scorcher of your foes, in attaining to great prosperity and affluence every time they are born into the world.

One should never go to bed without reciting the names of one's cows; neither should one rise from bed in the morning without a similar recitation. Morning and evening one should bend one's head in reverence to kine. With this, one is sure to attain to great prosperity of every kind.

One should never feel the least repugnance for the urine and the dung of the cow. One should never eat the flesh of cows. If a man lives in this law, he is sure to attain to great felicity. Indeed, one should always take the names of cows, and never show the slightest disregard for kine in any manner. If evil dreams visit a man's sleep, he should chant the names of holy cows. One should smear oneself with cow dung while bathing. One should sit on dried cow dung. One should never urinate or excrete or let other bodily secretions fall on cow dung.

One should never obstruct kine in any way. One should eat, sitting on a cowhide purified by dipping it in water, and then cast one's eyes towards the west. Sitting with restrained speech, one should eat ghee, using the bare earth as one's dish. Through this, a man reaps that prosperity of which kine are the source. One should pour libations on the fire, using ghrita. One should cause Brahmanas to utter blessings upon oneself, with gifts of ghee. One should make other gifts of ghrita. One should also eat ghee. As a reward for all this, one is sure to attain to that prosperity which kine confer.

That man who inspires an idol made of sesame seeds by uttering the Vedic mantras known by the name of Gomati, and then adorns that form with every kind of gem and makes a gift of it, has never to suffer any grief on account of all his sins of omission and commission.

Let cows that yield copious measures of milk and that have horns adorned with gold—cows that are Surabhis or the daughters of Surabhis—come to me even as rivers flow to the ocean. I always gaze at cows. Let cows always look gently at me. Cows are ours. We are theirs. We are there where cows are!

Even thus, at night or day, in happiness or sorrow, surely, in times of even great fear, should a man exclaim. By uttering these words he is certain to be freed from every fear."'

'Vasishta said, "The kine that were created in a bygone yuga practised the austerest tapasyas for a hundred thousand years with the desire to attain to a position of great pre-eminence. O Parantapa, they said to themselves, We shall, in this world, become the best of all kinds of dakshina in sacrifices, and we shall not be liable to be stained by any sin. By bathing in water mixed with our dung, the people shall be sanctified. The gods and men shall use our dung to purify all creatures, mobile and unmoving. They also that give us away shall attain to those regions of bliss which will be ours.

The all mighty Brahma appeared to them at the conclusion of their tapasya, and gave them the boons they sought, saying, It shall be as you wish. Do you save all the worlds!

Crowned with the fruition of their wishes, they all rose up, those mothers of both the past and the future. Every morning, men and women should bow with reverence to the sacred cows, and they will surely win every prosperity. At the conclusion of their penances, O king, cows became the refuge of the world. It is for this that kine are said to be the most blessed, sacred, and the foremost of all creations. It is for this that cows are said to stay at the very head of all other creatures.

By giving away a Kapila cow with a calf resembling herself, yielding a copious measure of milk, free from any viciousness, and covered with a fine cloth, the giver attains to great honour in Brahmaloka. By giving away a red cow, with a calf like herself, and milk-yielding and free from every vice, and covered with an auspicious cloth, one attains to great honour in Suryaloka.

By giving away a cow of mottled, variegated hue, with a calf like herself, and yielding milk, free from every fault, and covered with a cloth, one attains to great honour in the world of Soma.

By giving away a white cow, gentle and yielding copious milk, along with a calf like herself, and caparisoned, one attains to great honour in Indraloka. By giving away a dark cow, milk-yielding and gentle, with a calf like her, and covered with a piece of cloth, one attains to great honour in the world of Agni.

By giving away a cow of the hue of smoke, mild and milk-yielding, with a calf similar to herself, and covered with a rich cloth, one attains to great honour in Yamaloka.

By giving away a cow of the complexion of the foam of water, with a calf and a vessel of white brass for milking her, and covered with a piece of cloth, one attains to the world of Varuna. By giving away a cow whose complexion is like that of the dust blown by the wind, with a calf, and a vessel of white brass for milking her, and covered with a piece of cloth, one attains to great honour in the world of Vayu, the wind god. By giving a cow of golden hue, having tawny eyes, with a calf and a vessel of white brass for milking her and covered with a piece of cloth, one enjoys the felicity of the realm of Kubera.

By giving away a cow of the complexion of the smoke of burning straw, with a calf and a vessel of white brass for milking her, and covered with a piece of cloth, one attains to great honour in Pitriloka, realm of the Manes. By giving away a plump cow with the flesh of its throat hanging down and accompanied by her calf, one attains with ease to the lofty realm of the Viswedevas. By giving away a Gouri cow, with a calf similar to her, yielding milk, free from every viciousness, and covered with a piece of cloth, one attains to the region of the Vasus.

By giving away a cow of the complexion of a soft white blanket, with a calf and a vessel of white brass, and covered with a piece of cloth, one attains to the realm of the Sadhyas.

By giving away a bull with a high hump and adorned with every jewel, the giver, O king, attains to the world of the Maruts. By giving away a bull of blue complexion, that is full-grown in respect of years and adorned with every ornament, the giver attains to the regions of the Gandharvas and the Apsaras. By giving away a cow with the flesh of her throat hanging down, and adorned with every ornament, the giver, freed from every grief, attains to those regions that belong to Prajapati himself.

That man, O king, who habitually makes gifts of cows, travels piercing the clouds on a chariot of solar lustre to swarga and shines there in splendour. That man who habitually makes gifts of kine comes to be regarded as the foremost of his species. When thus entering into heaven, he is received by a thousand Apsaras of beautiful hips wearing celestial raiment and ornaments. These girls wait upon him there and minister to his delight. He sleeps there in peace and is awakened by the musical laughter of those gazelle-eyed women, the sweet notes of their vinas, the soft strains of their vallakis, and the melodious tinkle of their nupuras. The man who makes gifts of cows dwells in swarga and is honoured there for as many years as there are hairs on the bodies of all the kine he gives away. Falling away from heaven upon the exhaustion of his punya, such a man takes birth in the order of Manushyas and into a superior family among men."'

'Vasishta said, "Kine are yielders of ghee and milk. They are the sources of ghrita and they have sprung from ghrita. They are rivers of ghrita, and eddies of ghrita. Let cows ever be in my house. Ghee is always my heart. Ghee is established in my navel. Ghee is in every limb of mine. Ghee dwells in my mind. Cows are always before me. Cows are always behind me. Cows are always all around me on every side of my person. I live in the midst of kine.

Having purified oneself by touching water, one should, morning and evening, recite these mantras every day. By this, one is sure to be cleansed of all the sins one may commit during the course of the day. They who make gifts of a thousand kine, departing from this world, journey to the regions of the Gandharvas and the Apsaras where there are numberless palatial mansions made of gold and where the Akasa Ganga runs, river of heaven, called the current of Vasu.

Givers of a thousand cows go to where many rivers run, having milk for their water, and cheese for their mire, and curds for their floating moss. That man who makes gifts of hundreds of thousands of kine in accord with the ritual laid down in the scriptures, attains to high prosperity in this world and untold honours in the next. Such a man causes both his paternal and maternal ancestors to the tenth generation to attain to regions of great felicity, and sanctifies his whole race. Kine are sacred. They are the foremost of all things in the world. They are verily the refuge of the universe. They are the mothers of the very gods. They are incomparable.

They should be dedicated in sacrifices. While making journeys, one should travel on their right, keeping them to one's left.

After ascertaining the proper time, they should be given away to deserving persons. By giving away a Kapila cow with large horns, accompanied by a calf and a vessel of white brass for milking her, and covered with a piece of cloth, one succeeds in entering, freed from fear, the palace of Yama that is so difficult to enter.

One should always recite this sacred mantra: Cows are of beautiful form. Cows are of diverse forms. They are of universal form. They are the mothers of the universe. O, let kine always approach me.

There is no gift more sacred than godana, the gift of kine. There is no gift that produces more blessed merit. There has been nothing equal to the cow, nor will there be anything that will equal her. With her skin, her hair, her horns, the hair of her tail, her milk, and her fat, and with all these together, the cow upholds yagna. What is there that is more useful than the cow? Bending my head to her with reverence, I adore the cow who is the mother of both the past and the future, and by whom the entire universe of mobile and unmoving creatures is covered.

O Purushottama, I have related to you only a portion of the high punya of cows. There is no gift in this world that is superior to the gift of kine. There is also no refuge in this world that is higher than kine."' Bhishma continues, 'That high-souled Bhudani, King Saudasa, accepted these words of the Rishi Vasishta to be of the greatest import, and made gifts of a very large number of kine to good Brahmanas, restraining his senses the while; and as the consequence of those gifts, the monarch succeeded in attaining to many regions of ineffable felicity in the next world.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, Pitamaha, what is the most sacred of all sacred things in the world, other than what you have already spoken of, and which is the highest of all sanctifying objects.'

Bhishma says, 'Cows are the foremost of all things. They are the most sacred and they save men from all kinds of sin and distress. With their milk and with the havi made therefrom, cows uphold all creatures in the universe. O best of the Bharatas, there is nothing that is more sacred than kine. The foremost of all things in the three worlds, kine are themselves sacred and can purify and make others holy as well.

Kine dwell in Goloka, a world higher than Devaloka. When given away, they bestow salvation upon their givers. Men of wisdom succeed in attaining swarga by making gifts of kine. Yuvanaswa's son Mandhatri, Yayati, and his sire Nahusha would always give away cows in thousands. As the reward of those gifts, they have attained to such realms as are unattainable by the very Devas. There is, in this connection, O Anagha, a discourse delivered of old. I will relate it to you.

Once on a time, the most intelligent Suka, having finished his morning rites, approached, with a restrained mind, his sire, that foremost of Rishis, the island-born Krishna Vyasa, who knows keenly the distinction between that which is superior and that which is inferior, and saluting him, said:

"What is the sacrifice which appears to you as the best of all sacrifices? What is that karma by doing which men of wisdom succeed in attaining to the highest world? What is that sacred deed by which the Devas enjoy the bliss of heaven? What constitutes the character of sacrifice as yagna? What is that upon which yagna rests? What is regarded as the best by the gods? What is that sacrifice which transcends the sacrifices of this world? Do you also tell me, O my father, what is the most sacred of all things."

Having heard these words of his son, O king of the Bharata vamsa, Vyasa, the foremost of all knowers of dharma, discoursed to him as follows.

Vyasa said, "Kine constitute the stay of all creatures. Kine are the refuge of all creatures. Kine are the embodiment of punya. Kine are sacred, and kine are sanctifiers of all. Formerly, cows were hornless as I have heard. To have horns they worshipped the eternal and mighty Brahma. Brahma, seeing the kine sitting in praya and paying their adorations to him, granted to each of them what each desired. Thereafter their horns grew and each got what each desired.

Of diverse colours, and endowed with horns, they began to shine forth in beauty, O son. Favoured by Brahma himself with boons, cows are auspicious and yielders of havya and kavya. They are the embodiments of punya. They are sacred and blessed. They are possessed of excellent form and attributes. Cows constitute lofty and most exalted tejas. The gift of kine is very highly praised. Those good men who, freed from pride, make gifts of kine, are regarded as doers of righteous deeds and, indeed, as givers of all things.

Such men, O sinless one, attain to Goloka, the most sacred and blissful world of cows. The trees there produce ambrosial fruits. Indeed, those trees are always adorned with the most exquisite flowers and incomparable fruit. Those flowers, O Dvija, exude divine fragrance.

The soil of that world is entirely made of gems. The sands there are all gold. The climate there is such that the excellences of every season are perennial. There is no dirt, no dust. Ah, all the realm is, indeed, indescribably auspicious. The rivers that run there shine in resplendence for the red lotuses blooming upon their waters, and for the jewels and gems and gold on their banks, all of which have the radiance of the morning sun. Many are the shimmering lakes in that realm upon whose breasts are countless ethereal lotuses, their very petals made of living jewels, and their filaments adorned with a complexion like that of gold.

They are also adorned with flowering forests of unearthly trees, all of enchanting celestial fragrance, with thousands of beautiful creepers twining round them, as also with forests of Santanakas bearing their joyous flowery burdens. There are rivers whose banks are strewn with numberless lambent pearls and other splendid gemstones and shining gold. Parts of those realms are forested with trees that are decked with supernal jewels of every kind. Some of them are made of gold and some display the splendour of fire.

There tower many mountains, also of gold, and many hills and other eminences made solidly of deeply lustrous jewels and glittering gemstones. These glow and sparkle in untold beauty for their lofty summits are made of all manner of jewels.

The trees that adorn those worlds always put forth flowers and fruits, and are covered with lush foliage. The flowers always exude a divine fragrance and the fruits are exceedingly sweet, Lord of the Bharata vamsa.

Men of dharma, of righteous deeds, O Yudhishtira, can be found there always sporting in bliss. Freed from grief and wrath, they pass their time there, crowned with the fruition of their every wish. Righteous souls, possessed of fame, dally there in undiluted happiness, moving from place to place as they will, O Bhaarata, in charmed vimanas of great beauty. Bands of Apsaras constantly amuse them, with music and dance and lovemaking.

Indeed, O Yudhishtira, a man goes to such worlds as the reward of his making gifts of kine. Those regions, which have for their Lords Pushan and the Maruts of great puissance, are attained to by givers of kine. In affluence the royal Varuna is regarded as pre-eminent. The giver of cows attains to affluence like that of Varuna himself. One should, with the steadfastness of a vrata, daily recite the mantras declared by Prajapati himself in respect of kine, Viswarupa and Yugandharah, Surupah, Bahurupah and Matara.

He who serves cows with reverence and who follows them with humility, succeeds in obtaining many invaluable boons from the cows who become gratified with him. One should never, in even one's heart, do an injury to cows. One should, indeed, always confer happiness on them. One should always reverence cows and worship them, bowing one's head. He who does this, restraining his senses the while and filled with joy, succeeds in attaining to that peace which is enjoyed by kine and which cows alone can confer.

One should for three days drink the hot urine of the cow. For the next three days one should drink the hot milk of the cow. One should next drink hot ghee for three days. One should subsist for the next three days on air only. That sacred thing through which the Devas enjoy worlds of felicity, that which indeed is the most sacred of all sacred things, ghrita, should then be borne on one's head.

With ghee one should pour libations on the sacred fire. By making gifts of ghee, one should cause Brahmanas to utter blessings upon oneself. One should eat ghee and make gifts of ghee. As the reward for this, one attains to that prosperity which belongs to holy kine.

That man who, for a month, subsists upon the gruel of barley picked out every day from cow dung is cleansed of sins as grave as the slaying of a Brahmana. After their defeat at the hands of the Daityas, the Devas practised this expiation, and through it regained their position as gods. Verily, it was through this that they regained their strength and were crowned with success.

Kine are sacred. They are embodiments of punya. They are great and the most efficacious purifiers of all. By making gifts of kine to Brahmanas, one attains to swarga. Living in a pure state, in the midst of kine, one should after touching pure water mentally recite those sacred mantras that are known by the name of Gomati. By doing this, one is purified of all sins. Brahmanas of righteous deeds, who have been cleansed by knowledge, a study of the Vedas, and observance of vows, should, only in the midst of sacred fires or cows or assemblies of Brahmanas, impart to their disciples a knowledge of the Gomati mantras, which are in every way like a Mahayagna for the merit they create.

One should observe a fast for three nights in order to receive the boon constituted by a knowledge of the import of the Gomati mantras. The man who is desirous of obtaining a son will have one by adoring these mantras. He who wishes to possess wealth shall have his desire gratified by worshipping these mantras. The girl who wishes for a good husband will have her wish fulfilled by them. In fact, one can acquire the fruition of every wish one may cherish, by worshipping these most sacred mantras.

When kine are gratified with the service one renders them, they can, without doubt, grant every wish. Even so, are kine so highly blessed. They are the essential requisite for sacrifices. They are the granters of every wish. Know that there is nothing superior to sacred cows."

Bhishma continues, 'Thus addressed by his high-souled sire, Suka, of great energy, began to worship kine every day. Do you also, O son, do the same.'"

CANTO 82

"Yudhishtira says, 'I have heard that the dung of the cow is imbued with the Devi Sri. I want to hear how this was brought about. I have doubts, O Pitamaha, which you must dispel.'

Bhishma says, 'In this connection the old story is told, O king, of the conversation between cows and Sri, O best of the Bharatas. Once upon a time, the Goddess Sri, assuming a very beautiful form, entered a herd of cows. Seeing her wealth of beauty, the cows were filled with wonder.

The kine said, "Who are you, O devi? How have you become unrivalled on earth for beauty? O most blessed goddess, we are filled with wonder at your wealth of beauty. We want to know who you are. Ah, who, indeed, are you? Where will you go? O you of peerless splendour and complexion, tell us all that we wish to know."

Sri said, "Blessed be you, I am dear to all creatures. Indeed, I am known by the name Sri. Forsaken by me, the Daityas have been lost for ever. The Devas—Indra, Vivaswat, Soma, Vishnu, Varuna and Agni—having found me, sport in joy and will do so for ever. Verily, only when they are invested with me, the Devas and the Rishis have success. You kine, those beings meet with destruction into whom I do not enter. Dharma, artha and kama become sources of happiness only when I am in them. O cows, who are givers of happiness, know that I am possessed of even such tejas.

I wish to always dwell in every one of you. Coming into your presence, I solicit you. Be all of you blessed and endowed with Sri."

The kine said, "You are fickle and restless. You suffer yourself to be enjoyed by many. We do not wish to have you. Blessed be you, go wherever you please. As for ourselves, all of us are of good forms. What need have we with you? Go wherever you like. You have already gratified us by answering our questions."

Sri said, "Is it proper, you kine, that you do not welcome me? I am difficult of being attained. Why then do you not accept me? It seems, you creatures of excellent vows, that the old adage is true: That it is certain that when one come to another of one's own accord and without being sought, one meets with disregard.

The Devas, the Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Pisachas, the Uragas, the Rakshasas and Manavas succeed in obtaining me only after undergoing the severest austerities. You who have such energy, do you take me. Amiable, gentle ones, I am never disregarded by anyone in the three worlds of mobile and immobile creatures."

The kine said, "We do not disregard you, O devi. We do not show you any slight. You are fickle and of a very restless heart. It is only for this that we take our leave of you. What need of much talk? Do you go wheresoever you choose. All of us are blessed with excellent forms. What need have we with you, O sinless one?"

Sri said, "You givers of honours, cast off by you in this way, I shall certainly become an object of disregard with all the world. Do you show me grace. You are all highly blessed. You are always ready to grant protection to those that seek it. I have come to you soliciting your sanctuary. I have no fault. Do you save me from this predicament. Know that I shall always be devoted to you.

I wish to dwell in any part, however odious, of your bodies. Indeed, I would dwell in even your rectum. Sinless ones, I do not see that you have any part in your bodies that may be regarded as repulsive, for you are sacred, and sanctifying, and so highly blessed. Do you grant my prayer. Tell me in which part of your bodies I may dwell."

'Thus addressed by Sri, the cows, always auspicious and inclined to kindness to all who are devoted to them, took counsel with one another, and then said to the Devi Sri, "O you of great fame, it is surely desirable that we should honour you. Do you live in our urine and dung. Both these are sacred, O auspicious goddess!"

Sri said, "It is my good fortune that you have shown me such grace and your wish to favour me. Let it be even as you say. Blessed be you all, for you have truly honoured me, O givers of happiness."

Having, O Bhaarata, made this compact with the kine, the devi, in the very sight of those cows, rendered herself invisible. I have thus told you, O son, the glory of the dung of kine. I shall once again tell you further about the glory of cows. Do you listen to me.' "

"Bhishma says, 'They who make gifts of kine, and who subsist upon the remnants of libations offered on the sacred fire, are regarded, O Yudhishtira, as always performing sacrifices of every kind. No sacrifice can be performed without the help of curds and ghee. The very character as yagna which sacrifices have, depends upon ghrita. Hence are ghee, and the cow from which it is comes, regarded as the very root of sacrifice.

Of all kinds of dana, godana, the gift of kine, is praised as the highest. Kine are the foremost of all things. Themselves sacred, they are the best of purifiers and sanctifiers. All should cherish kine in order to gain prosperity and even peace. The milk, curds and ghee that cows yield can cleanse one from every kind of sin. Cows are said to represent the highest tejas both in this world and the world that is above. There is nothing that is more sacred or sanctifying than the cow, O Lord of Bharata vamsa.

In this connection, an ancient tale is told, O Yudhishtira, of the discourse between Brahma, the Grandsire, and Indra, king of the Devas.

After the Daityas had been defeated and Sakra became the Lord of the three worlds, all creatures grew in prosperity and became devoted to the true dharma. Then, once, the Rishis, the Gandharvas, the Kinnaras, the Uragas, the Rakshasas, the Devas, the Asuras, the Avians and the Prajapatis, all came together and worshipped the Grandsire. There were Narada and Parvata and Viswavasu and Haha-Huhu, who sang in divine strains to adore that mighty Lord of all creatures. Vayu bore the fragrance of celestial flowers thence. The seasons also, the ritus in their embodied forms, bore the perfumes of flowers peculiar to each, to that conclave of celestial ones, that gathering of all creatures of the universe, where Apsaras danced and sang to unearthly music.

In the midst of that assembly, Indra, folding his hands to the Lord of all the gods and bowing his head to him with reverence, asked him: "I wish, Pitamaha, to know why Goloka, the world of sacred kine is higher, O Holy One, than Devaloka, world of the Devas themselves, who are the lords of all the worlds. What austerities, what brahmacharya, O Lord, did kine perform because of which they dwell in bliss in a realm that is beyond even that of the gods?"

Thus questioned by Indra, Brahma said to the slayer of Bala, "You have always, O Indra, disregarded kine. Hence, you know nothing of their glorious pre-eminence. Listen now to me, mighty one, as I explain to you the transcendent energy and splendour of kine, O Devaraja!

Cows have been said to be the limbs of sacrifice. They represent sacrifice itself, Vasava. Without them, there can be no yagna. With their milk and the havi made therefrom, they nurture all creatures. Their male calves are engaged in tillage and thereby produce many kinds of paddy and other seeds. From them flow sacrifices and havya and kavya, and milk and curds and ghrita. Hence, O Devaraja, are cows sacred.

Even while afflicted by hunger and thirst, they bear heavy and diverse burdens. Kine support the Munis. They uphold all creatures in a myriad of ways, O Vasava, and cows are guileless in their conduct. Because of their gentleness and the varied and great services they render, they will always dwell in worlds that are above even ours. This, O you of a hundred sacrifices, is why cows dwell in a realm that is high above that of the Devas.

Vasava, cows gained many excellent boons, and are themselves givers of boons to others. They are called Surabhis. Of sacred deeds and imbued with many auspicious signs, they are most sanctifying. Listen also, O Indra, to why cows, the offspring of Surabhi, have come down to the earth. In day, of yore, O son, when in the Devayuga, the Mahatman Danavas became Lords of the three worlds, Aditi performed the severest tapasya and conceived Vishnu in her womb as her reward. She stood on one leg for many long years in order to have a son.

Seeing the great Devi Aditi thus performing the sternest tapasya, the daughter of Daksha, the illustrious Surabhi, herself devoted to dharma, also undertook the most trying penance upon the breast of the magnificent and enchanting mountains of Kailasa that are the resort of both the Devas and the Gandharvas. Established in the highest yoga she also stood upon one leg for eleven thousand years. The Devas with the Rishis and the great Nagas were all scorched by the ferocity of her tapasya. Going then with me to that holy mountain, all of them began to adore that auspicious goddess.

I then said to that devi adorned with tapa, 'O faultless devi, for what purpose do you perform such severe austerities? Most blessed one, I am gratified with your tapasya, O beautiful one! Do you, O goddess, ask for whatever boon you desire, and I will grant what you ask.'

Even these were my words to her, Purandara. Surabhi answered me, 'I have no need, O Pitamaha, of boons. Even this, O Anagha, is a great boon to me that you are pleased with me.'

I replied to the illustrious Surabhi, 'Devi, I am more gratified than I can tell both by your tapasya and by your freedom from greed, O you of the beautiful face. And so I grant you the boon of immortality. Through my grace you shall dwell in a world that is higher than all the Trilokas. That world shall be known to all by the name of Goloka.

Your daughters, who are ever engaged in doing good karma, will live in the world of men. All kinds of enjoyment, divine and mundane, which you merely think of, will immediately be yours. Whatever bliss exists in swarga, will also be yours, O most blessed one.'

The realms, O you of a hundred eyes, that are Surabhi's instantly gratify every wish and desire no sooner than they appear in the heart. Not death, decay, or fire can touch its denizens. No ill luck, O Vasava, exists in Goloka. Many forests of fascination and enchantment, and wondrous ornaments and other things of great beauty embellish that realm. There you will see, O Vasava of the eyes like lotus petals, so many indescribable chariots, all plentifully equipped, and which move at the will of the rider. It is only through brahmacharya, by tapasya, with truth, self-restraint, by gifts, by diverse kinds of righteous deeds, through pilgrimages to sacred tirthas, in fact, by the most severe austerities and righteous deeds well-performed, that one can attain to Goloka.

O Sakra, I have answered what you asked me in full. O slayer of Asuras, you should never disregard sacred kine."'

Bhishma continues, 'Having heard these words of the self-born Brahma, O Yudhishtira, Sakra of a thousand eyes began from that time to worship kine every day and to show them the greatest reverence. I have told you everything about the sanctifying character of cows, O you of great splendour, explaining the sacred nature, the glory and the lofty pre-eminence of kine, which can exorcise every sin. That man who, with senses withdrawn, recites this account to good Brahmanas, on occasions when havya and kavya are offered, or at yagnas, or while adoring the Pitris at sraddhas, succeeds in conferring upon his ancestors an inexhaustible felicity fraught with the fruition of every wish.

The man who is devoted to kine obtains the fruition of his every wish. Indeed, even women that are devoted to cows succeed in fulfilling every wish of theirs. He that wishes for sons obtains them. He that desires daughters obtains those. He that wishes for wealth succeeds in aquiring it and he that wants punya wins that as well. He that wants gyana gains it and he that desires kama enjoys every pleasure. Indeed, O Bhaarata, there is nothing unattainable to one that is devoted to sacred kine.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have, O Pitamaha, discoursed to me on godana, which is fraught with great punya. In the case of kings who observe their svadharma, the gift of cows is especially meritorious. Kingship is always painful; it is a burden that can never be borne by men of impure souls. Thus, generally, kings fail to attain to auspicious ends. By constantly making bhumidana, gifts of earth, they succeed in purifying themselves of all their sins.

You have, O prince of Kuru's race, discoursed to me on many duties. You have spoken to me about the godana made by King Nriga in days of old. Rishi Nachiketa, in ancient times, discoursed on the punya of this dana. The Vedas and the Upanishads, also, have declared that in all sacrifices, in fact, in all kinds of religious karmas and kriyas, the dakshina should be of earth, kine or gold.

The Srutis, however, declare that in all dakshinas, gold is superior and is, indeed, the best. I want to hear about this from you. What is gold? How did it come to be? When did it come? What is its essence? Who is its presiding deity? What are its fruits? Why is it regarded as the foremost of all things? For what reason do men of wisdom laud suvarnadana, the gift of gold? For what reason is gold regarded as the best dakshina in all sacrifices? Why is gold regarded as a purifier superior to earth and kine? Why is it regarded so superior as a dakshina?

Do you, O Pitamaha, discourse to me on all this!'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O king, with concentrated attention to me as I tell you in detail of the origin of gold, as I understand it.

When my father Santanu of great tejas left this world, I went to Gangadwara to perform his sraddha. Arrived there, I commenced the sraddha of my father. Coming there, my mother Jahnavi rendered me great help. Inviting many Rishis, crowned with spiritual success, and having them sit before me, I began the preliminary rites of gifts of water and other auspicious things. Having performed all the preliminary rituals, as prescribed in the shastras, with a concentrated mind, I set myself to offer the pinda, the obsequial cake. I then saw, O king, that a handsome arm, adorned with angadas and other ornaments, rose up, piercing the ground, through the blades of kusa grass which I had spread. Beholding this arm rise from the ground, I became filled with wonder. Indeed, O king of the Bharata vamsa, I thought that my father had come himself to accept the pinda I was about to offer.

I grew thoughtful and, by the light of the scriptures, the conviction soon came upon me, and indeed seized my mind, that the law does occur in the Vedas that the obsequial cake should never be given into the actual hand of him whose sraddha is being performed. The Pitris do not come in their visible forms to take the pinda. On the other hand, the scripture does provide that the offering should be made on blades of kusa grass spread on the earth.

Ignoring that hand which seem to constitute an indication of my father's presence, and remembering the true law which is declared in the shastras, I offered the entire pinda upon those blades of kusa grass that were spread before me. Know, O Kshatriya, that what I did was perfectly consistent with scriptural law. When I made my offering, the arm of my father vanished in our very sight.

That night, as I slept, the Pitris appeared to me in a dream. Gratified with me they said, "We are pleased with you for your adherence today to the law of the shastras. We are gratified to see that you did not swerve from the injunctions of the scriptures. Having been followed by you, O king, the scriptural law has become more authoritative. With your conduct, you have honoured and maintained the authority of yourself, the shastras, the auditions of the Vedas, the Pitris and the Rishis, the Pitamaha Brahma himself, and the Prajapatis.

Adherence to the scriptures has been strengthened. You have today, O Bhaarata, conducted yourself honourably and rightly. You have made gifts of earth and kine. Do you now make gifts of gold. The gift of gold is most purifying. O you who know dharma well, know that through such a gift, both we and our forefathers will all be washed clean of our every sin. Such dakshina saves both the ancestors and descendants to the tenth generation of the one who makes it."

Even these were the words that my ancestors, appearing in my dream, spoke. I then awoke, O king, and was full of wonder. I set my heart upon making gifts of gold.

Listen now, monarch, to this old itihasa. It is praiseworthy and it lengthens the span of his life who listens to it. It was first recited to Rama, the son of Jamadagni.

In former days Jamadagni's son Rama, filled with great wrath, wiped the Kshatriyas from the face of the earth, twenty-one times. Having subjugated the entire world, the heroic Rama of eyes like lotus-petals began to make preparations for performing an Aswamedha yagna, which is praised by all Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, and which can grant the fruition of every wish. That sacrifice purifies all creatures and enhances the energy and splendour of those who succeed in performing it. Rama of untold tejas was purified of the awesome violence he committed, by the performance of that sacrifice.

Yet, even after performing that greatest of sacrifices, the Mahatman Rama failed to attain to perfect lightness of heart. Going to Rishis who knew every branch of learning as also to the Devas, Rama of Bhrigu's race questioned them. Filled with repentance and compassion, he addressed them, saying, "You most highly blessed ones, do you declare to me that which is more purifying still for men engaged in fierce and savage deeds."

Those great Rishis, profound knowers of the Vedas and the other shastras, answered him, saying, "O Rama, guided by the authority of the Vedas, do you honour all learned Brahmanas. After doing this for some time do you once more ask the regenerate Rishis what you should do to rid yourself of your sins. Follow the advice that those sages of great wisdom give you."

Going then to Vasishta and Agastya and Kasyapa, that delighter of the Bhrigus asked them, "You foremost of Brahmanas, this is the wish that has arisen in my heart. How can I purify myself and be rid of my sins? By what karmas and kriyas can I achieve this? Or, if by dana, what shall I give away that I am washed of my sins of violence sins and have peace again? You greatest of the righteous and the wise, if your hearts be inclined to favour me, then tell me this, you who are endowed with the inestimable wealth of tapasya—what is my way to wash my sins from me?"

The Rishis said, "O Bhrigunandana, as we have heard, the mortal that has sinned purifies himself by making gifts of kine, of earth, and of wealth. There is another dakshina that is regarded as a great cleanser. Listen to us, O great Dvija, as we tell you of it.

That thing of which we speak is most excellent and imbued with wonderful aspect and is, besides, the progeny of fire.

In days of yore, the god Agni burnt all the world. From his seed sprang gold of bright complexion. It came to be celebrated as Suvarna or golden-complexioned. By making gifts of gold you are certain to have your wish crowned with fruition."

Then the illustrious Vasishta, in especial, he of rigid vows, said, "Hear, O Rama, how gold, which has the splendour of fire sprang into existence. That gold will confer merit on you. In matters of dakshina, gold is highly lauded. I will also tell you what gold is, whence it has come, and how it has come to be invested with superior attributes. Listen to me, O Mahabaho, with attention.

Know this as certain that gold is of the essence of Agni and Soma. The goat is Agni for if given it leads to the region of the deity of fire; the sheep is Varuna for it leads to the realm of Varuna lord of waters; the horse is Surya, for if given it leads to Suryaloka; elephants are Nagas, for they lead to Nagaloka; buffaloes are Asuras for they lead to the world of Asuras; cocks and boars are Rakshasas, for they lead to the regions of the Rakshasas, O Bhrigunandana. Earth is sacrifice; kine, water and Soma, for it leads to the merits of sacrifice, and to the region of kine, that of the lord of waters, and of Soma. Even these are the declarations of the Smritis.

Churning the entire universe, a mass of blinding tejas was found. That energy is gold. Hence, O regenerate Rishi, compared to all these things which I have named above, gold is the most superior. It is a precious thing, exalted and excellent.

It is for this that the Devas and Gandharvas and Uragas and Rakshasas and Manavas and Pisachas hold it with care. All these beings, O son of Bhrigu's race, shine in splendour with the help of gold, after converting it into crowns and armlets and diverse kinds of ornaments. It is also for this reason that gold is regarded as the most cleansing of all cleansing things like earth and kine and all other kinds of wealth, O prince of men.

Suvarnadana, the gift of gold, O powerful king, is the highest gift. It is distinguished above the gifts of earth, of kine, and of all other things, O you that have the effulgence of an immortal, gold is an eternal purifier. Do you make gifts of it to the foremost of Brahmanas as it is the best of things that purify. Of all kinds of dakshina, gold is the best. They who make gifts of gold are said to be givers of all things. Indeed, they who make gifts of gold come to be regarded as givers of deities. Agni is all the gods in one, and gold has Agni for its essence. Hence it is that the person who makes gifts of gold gives away all the gods. Thus, O Lord of men, there is no gift higher than the gift of gold."

Vasishta continued, "Listen once more, O twice-born Rishi, as I speak about the pre-eminence of gold, O foremost of all wielders of weapons. I heard this formerly in the Purana, O Bhriguputra. What I say to you is the speech of Prajapati himself.

After the wedding was over of the illustrious and high-souled Rudra, armed with the trident, with the goddess who became his wife, upon the breast of that greatest of mountains, Himavat, Mahadeva Siva wished to unite himself with the goddess. Thereupon, all the gods, pierced by anxiety, approached Rudra. Bending their heads with reverence and gratifying Mahadeva and his boon-giving wife Uma, both of whom were seated together, they addressed Rudra, saying, 'This union, O illustrious and sinless one, of yours with the devi, is a union of one endowed with penances with another of tapasya as severe. Verily, it is the union, O Lord, of one possessed of infinite energy with another whose tejas is scarcely less.

You, most illustrious, are of tejas that is irresistible. The devi Uma, also, is possessed of urjas that is equally inexorable. The offspring from a union like this, will, without doubt be endowed with untold might. Verily, O puissant Lord, that child will consume all things in the three worlds without leaving any remnant. Do you then, Lord of all the universe, O you of large eyes, grant to these Devas prostrated before you, a boon for the weal of the three worlds. Do you, mightiest one, restrain your terrible hiranyaretas, your golden seed, which might otherwise become the seed of your progeny. Verily, that retas is the essence of all forces in the three worlds.

Besides, you two, by an act of coition, are sure to scorch the universe. The son born to you will certainly be powerful enough to cower and afflict the Devas. Neither Bhumidevi, Akasa, or swarga, O omnipotent one, nor all of them together, will be able to bear your awesome seed. The entire universe is certain to burn through the force of your hiranyaretas. It befits you, O mighty one, to show us favour, O illustrious Lord. That favour consists in your not begetting a son, O Mahadeva, upon the devi Uma. Do you, with patience, restrain your fiery seed.'

To the Devas that said this, the most holy Mahadeva, having the bull for his sign, replied, 'Tathaastu, so be it!' Having said so, Vrishavaha, he who rides the great bull, drew up his vital seed. From that time he came to be called by the name of Urdhvaretas, one that has drawn up his seed.

However, at this endeavour of the gods to stop procreation, Rudra's wife, the devi Uma grew incensed. Being a woman, and endowed with small control over her temper, she used harsh words. 'Since you have stopped my Lord from begetting a child upon me when he wanted to do so, you Deva shall all become sonless. Since you have stood in the way of my having children, you shall all be childless yourselves!'

When Uma pronounced her curse, O Bhargava, Agni was not there. It is in consequence of the curse of the goddess that the Devas have become childless. Implored by them, Rudra held his seed within himself, his retas of incomparable power. A small quantity, however, that came out of his lingam fell onto the earth. Instantly, that golden seed ignited into a blazing fire and began to grow prodigiously in size and power. Coming in contact with Agni's energy of great might, Rudra's seed became one with it.

Meanwhile, all the Devas, led by Sakra, were tormented intolerably by the terrible Asura Taraka. The Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the Maruts, the Aswins and the Sadhyas were all afflicted by the tameless prowess of that son of Diti. All the realms of the Devas, their beautiful chariots, and their palatial mansions, and the asramas of the Rishis, the Asuras took for themselves at will. The Devas and the Rishis, with sombre, dejected hearts, sought the protection of Brahma of unfading glory."

CANTO 85

"The deities said, 'The Asura Taraka, who has boons from you, O almighty one, torments the Devas and the Rishis. Let his death be ordained by you. O Grandsire, great has been our fear from him. O illustrious one, do you save us. We have no other refuge than you.'

Brahma said, 'I am equal in my disposition towards all creatures. Yet, I cannot condone adharma. Let Taraka, enemy of the Devas and Rishis, be quickly destroyed. The Vedas and the sanatana Dharma shall not perish, you best of gods. I have ordained what is right and just. Let the fever of your hearts be dispelled.'

The Devas said, "Because of your having granted him boons, that son of Diti has been proud of his might. We Devas cannot kill him. How then will he die? The boon which, O Pitamaha, he has obtained from you is that he cannot be killed by Devas or Asuras or Rakshasas. We Devas have also been cursed by the devi Uma, when we stopped Siva from begetting a son in her. She cursed us that none of us will ever have any children.'

Brahma said, 'You foremost of Devas, Agni was not there when the goddess pronounced her curse. Even he will beget a son for the destruction of your enemies. Transcending all the Devas and Danavas and Rakshasas and Manavas and Gandharvas and Nagas and Garudas, the son of Agni, with his spear, which in his hands will be a weapon that cannot be baffled if once cast, will destroy Taraka from whom your fear has arisen. Verily, he will kill all your other enemies as well.

Will is eternal. That will is known by the name of kama and is identical with Rudra's seed, a portion of which fell into the blazing form of Agni.

That mighty retas, which is like a second Agni, will be cast by Agni into the Ganga to create a child who will destroy the enemies of the Devas. Agni was not affected by Uma's curse. The consumer of havis was elsewhere when the devi cursed the rest of you.

So seek out the god of fire and set him to this task. Sinless ones, I have told you the means by which you can kill Taraka. The curses of those that are of tejas do not affect them who are themselves of great energy. Any force, when it meets a greater force, grows weak. They that are endowed with tapasya can destroy the very boon-giving Devas who are immortal. Will, or love, or desire, which is Agni, sprang up of old and is the most eternal of all creatures.

Agni is the Lord of the universe. He is cannot be fathomed or described. He goes everywhere and exists in all things; he is the Creator of all beings. He lives in the hearts of all creatures. Endued with great puissance, he is older than Rudra himself. Let that eater of havis, who is a mass of pure tejas, be sought out. That illustrious one will accomplish what your hearts desire.'

Hearing what Brahma said, the Devas went forth, with hope kindled in their hearts, to seek out the god of fire. The Devas and the Rishis, all endowed with tapasya, all possessed of prosperity, all crowned with ascetic success, all famed across the three worlds, scoured every part of the three worlds, their minds fixed on just Agni and beside themselves to discover him. O best of Bhargavas, they failed to find he that feeds on the havis of sacrifice, for he had hidden himself by withdrawing his atman into his Atman.

At this time, a frog living in water appeared on the surface from the nethermost Patalas, for he had been scalded by the fierce heat of Agni. The little creature addressed the Devas who were stricken by fear and anxious to find the god of fire. The frog said, 'You Devas, Agni now dwells in the nethermost underworld. Scorched by the heat of that god have I come here. The lustrous bearer of havis, O Devas, is under the deepest waters of Patala. He has created a great water mass within which he is hidden. All of us have been seared by his fierce heat. If, Devas, you wish to see him or have any business with him, go to him thence. Yes, take yourselves there. As for me, I will flee this place now for I am in fear of terrible Agni.'

Having said this much, the frog dived into the water. Agni, who devours the havis of every yagna learnt of the treachery of the frog. Coming to that creature he cursed its entire species, 'You shall all cease to have taste in your mouths!' Having cursed the frog, Agni swiftly left that place to find another sanctuary. The most powerful god did not show himself at all. Seeing the plight to which the frogs were reduced for having done them a service, the Devas, O best of the Bhrigus, showed favour to those creatures. I will tell you about it, listen to me, O Mahabaho.

The Devas said, 'Though deprived of their tongues through the curse of Agni, and bereft of the sense of taste, you will be able to utter diverse kinds of speech. Living within holes, deprived of food, without consciousness, wasted, dried up and more dead than alive, all of you will yet be succoured by the earth herself. You shall also be able to range where you will at night when the world is cloaked in darkness.'

Having said this to the frogs, the Devas once more combed every part of the earth to find the god of blazing flames. Despite all their efforts, they failed to find him. Then, O perpetuator of Bhrigu's race, an elephant, as large and mighty as Airavata, the elephant of Sakra, spoke to the gods, saying, 'Agni now lives within this Aswattha tree!'

Incensed with wrath, Agni cursed all the elephants, O Bhargava, 'Your tongues will be bent backwards!' Having cursed the elephants, Agni swiftly flew into a Sami tree in which he had for some time wished to dwell. Listen now, O hero, to what favour was shown to the elephants by the Devas, who were pleased by the service that one of them had rendered.

The Devas said, 'Even with your tongues bent inwards you shall be able to eat all things, and with even those tongues you shall be able to utter cries as you will, though they will be indistinct.'

Having blessed the elephants in this way, the denizens of heaven once more resumed their search for Agni, who, having flared out of the Aswattha tree, had entered the heart of the Sami. A parrot divulged Agni's new abode to the Devas, who at once went to that tree. Enraged with the parrot, the fire god cursed the species of parrots, 'From this day you shall no more have the power to speak!' Indeed, the devourer of havis curled the tongues of all parrots upwards.

Seeing Agni in the place pointed out by the parrot, and witnessing the curse that fell upon the bright bird, the Devas were moved to compassion for the poor creature, and blessed him, saying, 'You will not entirely lose your power to speak. Though your tongue has been turned backwards, yet speech you shall have, but confined to the sound of Ka. Like that of a child or an old man, your speech shall be sweet and indistinct and wonderful.'

Having said this to the parrot, and seeing Agni within the heart of the Sami, the gods made Sami wood a sacred fuel fit for kindling in all religious rites. It was from that time that fire is seen to dwell in the heart of the Sami. Men came to regard the Sami as an auspicious wood to light fires for sacrifices.

The waters that occur in the deepest Patalas had been touched by Agni Deva. Those heated waters, Bhargava, are spewed forth by mountain springs. Meanwhile, seeing the Devas, Agni became aggrieved. He asked them, 'What is the reason for your coming here?'

The Devas and the Maharishis said, 'We wish to set you to a great task, which you must accomplish. When you have done so, it will add greatly to your credit.'

Agni said, 'Tell me what your business is. I shall, O Devas, accomplish it. I am always willing to be set by you to any task you wish. Do not hesitate to command me.'

The Devas said, 'There is an Asura of the name Taraka who has been filled with hubris because of the boon he has from Brahma. Through his great prowess he opposes and discomfits us as he likes. Do you ordain his destruction. O Sire, rescue these Devas, these Prajapatis, and these Rishis, O most blessed Pavaka. Mighty one, beget a heroic son possessed of your own terrific tejas, who will dispel, O bearer of the havis, our fear of that Asura. We have been cursed by the great Goddess Uma. There is nothing other than your energy which can now be our refuge. Do you, O powerful one, save us all!'

Thus addressed, the illustrious and irresistible bearer of sacrificial libations answered, saying, 'Be it so', and he then went away towards Ganga, who is also called Bhagirathi. He united himself in congress with her and caused her to conceive. In the womb of Ganga, the seed of Agni began to grow even as Agni himself blazes up when fed with fuel and fanned by the wind. Ganga became direly agitated at heart with the wild energy of the fire god. She suffered such distress that she could not bear it. When the deity of blazing flames cast his fulgurous seed into the womb of Ganga, a certain Asura, for purposes of his own, uttered a dreadful roar. Ganga was terrified by that roar which was in no way meant for her; her eyes rolled in fear and she fainted. She could no longer bear Agni's terrific seed within her, and Jahnu's daughter trembled violently as if with a seizure.

Overwhelmed by the fulminant tejas of the fiery seed in her womb, Brahmana, she cried to Agni, 'Illustrious one, I cannot bear your seed within me for another moment! Ah, your seed makes me weak and I feel worn and ill. Terrible anxiety and agitation have their way with me, O Agni, and my heart seems dead within me, sinless one.

O greatest of all that are blessed with tapasya, no, I cannot bear your flaming seed inside me for a moment longer. By no whim, but by the agony that compels me I must cast it out of me.

There has been no fleshly contact between us, O you of blazing flames. The cause for our union is the distress that has come upon the Devas, O splendid one. Whatever punya, or otherwise, there may be in this thing that I am meant to do, let it all belong only to you, O Agni. Truly, I believe the dharma or adharma of this deed must be just yours.'

To her the god of fire said, 'Do you bear the seed. Do, indeed, bear the foetus imbued with my tejas. It will lead to great rewards. You, verily, can bear all the earth. You will gain nothing by casting my child out from your womb.'

But that greatest of rivers, though thus pressed by Agni, as also the other Devas, cast the flaming seed out from her womb onto the breast of Meru, first of all mountains. She who might have contained that burning seed was roiled by the tejas of Rudra—for Agni and Rudra are one—succumbed to its ferocity and cast it from her with a scream.

Agni saw her, and asked, 'Is all well with the embryo that you have expelled from yourself? Of what complexion is it, O devi? Of what form is it? With what energy does it seem to be endowed? Do you tell me all about that child!'

Ganga said, 'The child has the complexion of molten gold. In tejas it is even like you, O Anagha. Perfectly stainless, and blazing with splendour, it illuminates the entire mountain. O greatest of tapasvins, its fragrance is that of the highest, rarest lakes adorned with lotuses, mingled with the scent of the kadamba. Everything around it seemed to be transformed into gold with the splendour of that child even as all things on mountain and plain seem turned into gold by the rays of the sun. The resplendence of that embryo, spreading far, falls upon mountains and rivers and springs. Why, it seems that the three worlds, with all their mobile and immobile creatures, are lit up by your child. Even thus is your son, O Agni, bearer of havis. Brilliant like Surya or your blazing self, in beauty he is even like a second Soma.'

Having said these words, the devi Ganga disappeared. Pavaka, also, having accomplished the work of the Devas went where he wished, O Bhrigunandana. It was because of what happened then that the Rishis and the Devas gave Agni the name Hiranyaretas, he of the golden seed. And because the earth held that seed, after Ganga had cast it upon her, she also came to be called Vasumati.

Meanwhile, that foetus, which had sprung from Pavaka and been held for a time by Ganga, having fallen into a forest of reeds, began to grow and at last assumed a most wonderful form. The six goddesses of the constellation Krittika beheld that form resembling the rising sun, and she began to rear that child as their son, nurturing him at their breasts. For this, that child of pre-eminent splendour came to be called Kartikeya. And because he grew from seed that fell out of Rudra's body, he was called Skanda. Having been born in the solitude of a forest of reeds, hidden from the view of all, he was called Guha.

It was in this way that gold came into existence as the son of Agni, god of flames. And so was it that gold came to be looked upon as the best of all things and the ornament of the very gods; and so also gold was called Jatarupam. It is the foremost of all dear things, and among ornaments, also, it is the first. The greatest of all purifying things, it is the most auspicious of all that is auspicious.

Gold is truly the illustrious Agni, the Lord of all things, and the first of all Prajapatis. The most sacred of all sacred things is gold, O Dvijottama. Verily, gold is said to have for its essence both Agni and Soma."'

'Vasishta continued, "This other history, also, O Rama, called Brahmadarsana, I heard in the eldest days, about the achievement of the Grandsire Brahma, who is verily the Paramatman, the Supreme Soul. To a sacrifice performed in the most ancient days, by Mahadeva, Lord Rudra, who on that occasion had assumed the form of Varuna, there came the Munis and all the Devas with Agni at their head. To that sacrifice also came all the sacrificial Angas in their embodied forms, and the mantra called Vashat; also embodied. All the Samans also and all the Yajuses, in their thousands and in their embodied forms, as well, came there. The Rig Veda came there, adorned with the laws of diction and prosody. The Lakshanas, the Suras, the Niruktas, the Swaras arranged in rows, and the syllable AUM, as also Nigraha and Pragraha, all came there and took their places under the eye of Mahadeva.

The Vedas with the Upanishads, Vidya and Savitri, as also, Bhutakaala the past, Vartamanakaala the present, and Bhavishyakaala the future, all came there and were held by the illuminous Siva. The puissant Lord of all then poured libations himself into his own self. Indeed, the wielder of Pinaka caused that sacrifice of multifarious form to appear and be ineffably beautiful. He is Swarga, Akasa, Bhumi and Vayu. He is called the Lord of the earth. He is the Lord whose sway removes all obstacles. He is endowed with Sri and he is identical with Agni of all flames.

That lustrous deity is called by many names. Even he is Brahma and Siva and Rudra and Varuna and Agni and Prajapati. He is the auspicious Pasupati, Lord of all creatures, yagna and tapa, and all the rites of yoga, and Goddess Diksha blazing with vratas, the several points of the horizon with the deities that preside over them, the consorts of all the deities, their daughters, and the Matrikas, the celestial mothers, all came together in a body to Pasupati, O you of Bhrigu's race. Verily, beholding that sacrifice of the Mahatman Mahadeva who had assumed the form of Varuna, all of them were full of joy. Seeing the Apsaras of exquisite beauty there, the seed of Brahma, excited, fell out upon the earth. For the seed having fallen on the earth, Pushan—Surya—took up that earth mingled with Brahma's seed in his hands and cast it into the sacrificial fire.

Meanwhile, the yagna with the sacred fire ablaze had begun and was underway. Brahma, as the hotri, was pouring libations on the fire. It was while so engaged that the Pitamaha became excited with desire and ejaculated on the earth. As soon as his seed spurted out, he took it up with the sruva, the sacrificial ladle, and poured it as a libation of ghrita, with the apposite mantras, into the blazing fire.

From that seed of his, Brahma of great tejas caused the four orders of creatures to spring into existence. That seed of the Grandsire was imbued with the three gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas. From the part of it which was of Rajas, sprang all mobile creatures infused with the principle of pravritti or action. From the part which was of tamas, sprang all inert creatures. The principle of sattva, however, which dwelt in that seed, entered both kinds of existences, the animate and the still.

The sattva guna is of the nature of tejas or light, and is identical with buddhi, understanding. It is eternal and of it is Akasa, unending space. In all creatures the attribute of sattva is present and is identical with the light which shows what is right and what is wrong. When the seed of Brahma was poured as havis on that sacrificial fire, there sprang from it, O mighty one, three beings. They were three male persons, with bodies that partook of the characters of the circumstances from which they respectively sprang.

One arose first from the flames of the fire that are called bhrig, and hence he came to be known by the name Bhrigu. A second came from the burning coals called angara, and he came to be known as Angiras. The third sprang from a heap of extinguished coals, kavya, and he came to be called by the name Kavi. The first came out with flames spewing from his body and he was called Bhrigu. From the rays of the sacrificial fire sprang another called Marichi. From Marichi, later, came Kasyapa. From the burning coals sprang Angiras. The diminutive Rishis called Balakhilyas sprang from the blades of kusa grass spread out in that sacrifice. From the same blades of kusa grass, O you of great puissance, also sprang Atri. From the ashes of the fire sprang all those that are numbered among the illumined Rishis—the Vaikhanasas—endowed with tapasya and devoted to Vedic lore and every noble and excellent accomplishment.

From the eyes of Agni sprang the twin Aswins blessed with great beauty of person. At last, from his ears, sprang all the Prajapatis. The Rishis emerged from the pores of Agni's body. From his sweat sprang Chchandas, and from his strength sprang Manas, mind. For this has Agni been said to be all the Devas in his individual self, by Rishis who know the Vedas deeply, and guided by their authority.

The logs of wood that keep alive the flames of Agni are regarded as the masas, the months. The juices that the fuel yields constitute the Fortnights. The liver of Agni is the day and the night, and his fierce light are the muhurtas. The blood of Agni is regarded as the source of the Rudras. From his blood sprang also the gold-complexioned deities called the Maitradevatas. From his smoke sprang the Vasus. From his flames sprang the Rudras as also the twelve Adityas of great refulgence. The navagrahas and the nakshatras, and the other stars that have been set in their respective places in the firmament, are regarded as the burning coals of Agni. The first Creator of the universe declared Agni to be the Supreme Brahman and eternal, and the granter of all wishes. And this is truly a mystery.

After all these births, Mahadeva, who had assumed the form of Varuna for his sacrifice, and who had Pavana for his soul, said, 'This excellent sacrifice is mine. I am the grahapati in it. The three beings that first sprang from the sacrificial fire are mine. Without doubt, they should be regarded as my sons. Know this, you gods who range through the skies: they are the fruits of this sacrifice.'

Agni said, 'These children have sprung from my limbs. They all have me as the cause of their life. They must be regarded as my children. Mahadeva, in his form of Varuna, is mistaken about this.'

After this, the master of all the worlds, the Grandsire of all creatures, Brahma, said, 'These children are mine. The seed was mine that I poured upon the sacrificial fire. I am the Yajaman of this sacrifice. It was I who poured on the sacrificial fire the seed that came out of myself. The fruit is always his who has planted the seed. The cause of these births is the seed that is mine.'

The Devas then went into the presence of the Grandsire and, bowing their heads to him, joined their hands in reverence, and they said to him, 'All of us, O illustrious one, and the entire universe of mobile and immobile creatures, are your children. O sire, let Agni of blazing flames, and the powerful Mahadeva, who has, for this sacrifice, assumed the form of Varuna, both have their wish.'

At these words, although born of Brahman, the mighty Mahadeva in the form of Varuna, the ruler of all aquatic creatures, received the firstborn one Bhrigu with the lustre of the sun, as his own child. Brahma then made Angiras the son of Agni. Conversant with the truth of everything, the Pitamaha then took Kavi as his own son. Engaged in procreating creatures to people the earth, Bhrigu who is a Prajapati, then came to be known as Varuna's son. Blessed with every prosperity, Angiras came to be called the son of Agni, and the celebrated Kavi came to be known as the child of Brahma himself.

Bhrigu and Angiras, who had sprung from the flames and the coals of Agni, became the progenitors of vast races and tribes of the world. Verily, these three, Bhrigu and Angiras and Kavi, regarded as Prajapatis, are the progenitors of races and tribes beyond count. All are the children of these three. Know this, great hero. Bhrigu begot seven sons, all of whom became equal to him in merits and accomplishments. Their names are Chyavana, Vajrasirsha, Suchi, Urva and Sukra, that giver of boons, Vibhu, and Savana. These are the seven sons of Bhrigu and are hence Bhargavas. They are also called Varunas because of their ancestor Bhrigu having been adopted by Mahadeva in the form of Varuna. You, O Rama, belong to the race of Bhrigu.

Angiras begot eight sons. They also are known as Varunas. Their names are Brihaspati, Utathya, Payasya, Santi, Dhira, Virupa, Samvarta and Sudhan was the eighth. These eight are regarded also as the sons of Agni. Free from every evil, they are devoted only to knowledge. The sons of Kavi, who was taken by Brahma himself, are also known as Varunas. Numbering eight, all of them became progenitors of teeming races and tribes. Auspicious by nature, they are all knowers of the Brahman. The names of the eight sons of Kavi are Kavi, Kavya, Dhrishnu, Usanas endued with great intelligence, Bhrigu, Viraja, Kasi and Ugra conversant with every dharma.

These are the eight sons of Kavi. By them has the whole world been peopled. They are all Prajapatis, and by them have been begotten countless progeny. Thus, O greatest Bhargava, has the whole world been peopled with the progeny of Angiras and Kavi and Bhrigu. The supreme Lord Mahadeva, in the form of Varuna which he assumed for his sacrifice, had first, O learned Brahmana, adopted both Kavi and Angiras. Hence, these two are regarded as being of Varuna.

After that the consumer of sacrificial libations, deity of blazing flames, adopted Angiras. Hence, all the progeny of Angiras are known as belonging to the race of Agni. The Grandsire Brahma was, in the most antique days, gratified by all the Devas, who said to him, 'Let these Lords of the universe, Bhrigu, Angiras and Kavi, and their descendants, save us all. Let all of them become progenitors of varied races and tribes to people the earth. Let all of them become endowed with tapasya. Through your grace, let all these save the world from becoming an uninhabited wilderness.

Let them become procreators and extenders of races and tribes and let them increase your glory and tejas. Let all of them become thorough masters of the Vedas and let them be achievers of great deeds. Let all of them be friends to the cause of the Devas. Indeed, let all of them be blessed with auspiciousness. Let them become founders of teeming races and tribes and let them be great Maharishis. Let all of them be blessed with lofty tapasya and let all of them be devoted to brahmacharya. All of us, as also all these, are your progeny, O you of great puissance.

You, Pitamaha, are the Creator of both the Devas and the Brahmanas. Marichi is your first son. All these also that are called Bhargavas are your progeny. We also are so. Looking at this, O Grandsire, we shall all help and support one another. All these shall, in this way, multiply their progeny and establish you at the commencement of each prakriya, every creation after each universal pralaya.'

Thus addressed by them, Brahma, the Grandsire of all the worlds, said, 'Tathaastu, So be it. I am gratified with you all!'

Having said so to the Devas, he returned to where he had come from. Even this is what happened in days of old at that Mahayagna of the Mahatman Mahadeva, that greatest of all the gods, in the beginning of creation, when he assumed the form of Varuna to perform his sacrifice.

Agni is Brahma. He is Pasupati. He is Sarva. He is Rudra. He is Prajapati. It is well-known that Suvarna, gold, is the child of Agni. When fire is not available for a sacrifice, gold is used as a substitute. Guided by the indications afforded by the Veda, the sacrificer who knows the scriptural law, and who knows the identity of gold with fire, places a piece of gold on some blades of kusa grass spread out on the ground, and pours libations over it.

Upon also the pores of an anthill, upon the right ear of a goat, upon a piece of level earth, upon the waters of a tirtha, or into the hand of a Brahmana, if libations are poured, the great Agni Deva is gratified and regards such havis as a source of his own aggrandisement as also that of the Devas through him. Hence it is that we have heard that all the Devas regard Agni as their refuge and are devoted to him. Agni sprang from Brahma, and from Agni sprang gold. Hence, men of dharma who make gifts of gold, suvarnadana, are regarded as giving away all the Devas. The man who makes gifts of gold attains to a very high end. Realms of splendorous radiance are his. Verily, O Bhargava, he is installed as a king of kings in swarga.

He who, at sunrise, makes a gift of gold according to the shastra with proper mantras, succeeds in warding off the evil consequences foreshadowed by ominous dreams. The man who, as soon as the sun has risen, makes a gift of gold is cleansed of all his sins. He who makes a gift of gold at midday destroys all his future sins. He who with restrained soul, makes a gift of gold at the second sandhya succeeds in attaining to an abode with Brahma and Vayu and Agni and Soma in their various lokas.

Such a man attains to auspicious fame in realms of great felicity that belong to Indra himself. Attaining to resounding fame in this world also, and washed clean of all his sins, he sports in bliss. Verily, such a man attains to many other realms of joy and becomes unequalled for his glory and fame. His course perfectly unobstructed, he succeeds in going everywhere at will. He has never to fall from the transcendent realms to which he attains and the glory he acquires is vast indeed.

Truly, by making gifts of gold one attains to numberless regions of felicity all of which the giver enjoys for eternity. That man who, having lit a fire at sunrise, makes gifts of gold while observing a particular vrata, succeeds in attaining the fruition of all his wishes. It has been said that gold is identical with Agni. The gift of gold, therefore, yields untold prosperity. Suvarnadana leads to the possession of all those merits and accomplishments that are desired, and cleanses the heart.

I have told you, O sinless one, of the origin of gold. Listen now to how Kartikeya grew up. After a long time did Kartikeya grow to young maturity. He was then, O Bhargava, chosen by all the Devas with Indra at their head as the senapati of the celestial forces. He slew the Daitya Taraka as also many other Asuras, at the command of Indra and also actuated by the desire to benefit all the worlds.

I have, O you of great might, discoursed to you on the merits of making gifts of gold. Do you, therefore, O best of all the eloquent, make gifts of gold."'

Bhishma continues, 'Thus addressed by Vasishta, Jamadagni's son of great prowess then made gifts of gold to Brahmanas and was washed of his sins. I have told you everything about the merits of suvarnadana and about its origin, Yudhishtira. Do you also, therefore, make abundant gifts of gold to Brahmanas. Verily, by giving such dakshina, you will surely be purified of all your sins.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have, Pitamaha, discoursed to me, in detail, on the merits that attach to the gift of gold according to the laws laid down in the scriptures as indicated in the auditions of the Vedas. You have also described the origin of gold. Tell me now how Taraka met with destruction. You have said that the Asura had become impervious to the gods. Tell me in detail how his death was brought about. O perpetuator of Kuru's race, I wish to hear in detail from you of how Taraka was killed. Indeed, I am agog to listen to this tale.'

Bhishma says, 'The Devas and the Rishis, O monarch, reduced to great distress by Taraka's prowess and by Ganga casting off Agni's flaming seed, urged the six Krittikas to rear that child. Amongst the celestial Devis there were none, save these, that could bear the fierce seed of Agni in their wombs. The god of fire was exceedingly gratified with those goddesses for being prepared, even eager, to nurture the child born from his seed, the child endowed with his own tremendous energy. When the retas of Agni was divided into six portions and placed within their yonis, the six Krittikas began to nourish the portion that each held in her womb.

As the high-souled Kumara grew within their wombs, they were sorely afflicted by his terrific tejas, and had no peace anywhere. At last, the time came for them to deliver their awesome child. All of them delivered at the same time. Though held in six different wombs, yet all the portions as they came out united into one. The earth goddess held the child, taking it up from a heap of gold, and he of handsome and immaculate form blazed with splendour even like Agni himself.

Incomparably handsome, he began to grow in a delightful forest of sara reeds. The six Krittikas saw that child of theirs like the morning sun in splendour and, filled with consuming love, began to feed him at their breasts. As I have told you, because he was born of the Krittikas and raised by them, he came to be known throughout the three worlds as Kartikeya. Having sprung from the seed which had fallen from Rudra, he was named Skanda, and because of his birth in the solitude of a forest of reeds he came to be called by the name of Guha: the secretly born.

The thirty-three Devas, the cardinal points of the horizon in their embodied forms, together with the deities that rule over them, and Rudra and Dhatri and Vishnu and Yama and Pushan and Aryaman and Bhaga, and the Angas and Mitra and the Sadhyas and Vasava and the Vasus and the Aswins and the waters and the wind and the firmament and Chandramas and all the constellations and the planets and Surya, and all the Riks and Samans and Yajuses in their embodied forms, came there to behold that wonderful child who was the son of Agni, Lord of flames.

The Rishis uttered hymns of praise and the Gandharvas sang in honour of that child called Kumara of six heads, twice six eyes, and absolutely devoted to Brahmanas. His shoulders were broad, and he had a dozen arms, and the splendour of his person resembled that of Agni and Aditya. As he lay on a bed of heath, the Devas with the Rishis looked at him and were filled with wonder they had never known before; they regarded the great Asura Taraka as already slain. The gods began to bring him diverse kinds of toys and other things that could amuse him. As he played like any child, every kind of plaything, birds and small creatures among them, were given to him.

Garuda of splendid feathers gave Kartikeya a child of his—a peacock with brilliant plumes of many hues. The Rakshasas gave him a boar and a buffalo. Aruna, the sun's legless sarathy, gave him a cockerel of fiery splendour. Chandramas gave him a sheep, and Aditya bestowed upon him some of his dazzling rays. The mother of all cows, Surabhi, gave him hundreds of thousands of cows.

His sire Agni gave him a goat possessed of many extraordinary qualities. Ila gave him an abundant quantity of flowers and fruit. Sudhanwan gave him a chariot and a vimana of Kubera. Varuna gave him many most auspicious and beautiful treasures of the ocean, along with some great elephants. Indra, king of the Devas, gave Kartikeya lions and tigers and leopards, and diverse kinds of birds of the air, and many other terrible beasts of prey and many chatras, royal parasols, also of diverse kinds.

Rakshasas and Asuras, in large bands, began to walk in the train of that mighty child. Beholding the son of Agni grow up, Taraka sought, by various means, to effect his death, but he failed to do anything to that mighty young god. In time, the Devas invested Agni's son Guha, born in the solitude of a forest of reeds, with the command of their armies. And they told him of the oppressions visited upon them by the Asura Taraka.

The senapati of the celestial forces grew up and became possessed of untold energy and might. In time, Guha slew Taraka with his irresistible spear of flames. Verily, Kumara slew the Asura as easily as if in sport. Having killed Taraka he re-established Indra to his sovereignty of the three worlds. Of unmatched prowess, the celestial senapati blazed with beauty and splendour. The great Skanda became the protector of the Devas and did what was agreeable to Sankara, his sire. The illustrious son of Agni had a golden form.

Verily, Kumara is always the leader of the hosts of heaven. Gold is the potent energy of the god of fire and was born with Kartikeya from the same seed. Hence is gold so auspicious and imbued with inexhaustible punya. Even thus, O son of the Kurus, did Vasishta speak to Rama of Bhrigu's race in days of old. Do you, therefore, O king of men, try to make gifts of gold. By making gifts of gold, Rama became cleansed of all his sins, and finally attained to a high place in heaven that is unattainable by other men.'" Vaisampayana continued, "Yudhishtira says, 'You have told me, O Mahatman, about the duties of the four varnas. Do you now, after the same manner, O king, discourse to me on all the laws regarding the sraddha for departed ancestors.'

Thus addressed by Yudhishtira, the son of Santanu sets himself to declare to him the following ritual, consistent with the law of the sraddha.

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O king, with close attention, and I will tell you about the ritual of the sraddha. That ritual is auspicious, worthy of praise, productive of fame and progeny, and is regarded as a sacrifice, O scorcher of your foes, in honour of the Pitris. Devas or Asuras or Manavas, Gandharvas or Uragas or Rakshasas, Pisachas or Kinnaras—all of them should always worship the Pitris. It is seen that man worship the Pitris first, and gratify the Devas next by offering them their adorations. One should always worship the Pitris with every care.

It is told, O king, that the sraddha performed in honour of the Pitris may be performed later. But this general rule is restrained by a special one, which deems that the sraddha in honour of the Pitris should be performed on the afternoon of the day of Amavasya, the new moon. The departed Grandsires become gratified with the sraddha that is performed on any day. I shall, however, tell you now what the merits and demerits are of the respective lunar days in view of the performance of the sraddha. I will tell you, O sinless one, what fruits are attained on what days by performing the sraddha for the Pitris. Listen to me with close attention.

By adoring the Pitris on the first day of the lighted fortnight, a man obtains in his home beautiful wives all able to give him many children, all of them noble and accomplished. By performing the sraddha on the second day of the lighted fortnight one gets many daughters. By performing it on the third day, one acquires many horses. By performing it on the fourth day, one receives a large herd of smaller animals like goats and sheep. They, O king, who perform the sraddha on the fifth day have many sons. Those who perform the sraddha on the sixth day acquire great personal radiance. By performing it on the seventh day, one acquires great fame.

By performing it on the eighth day, one makes great profits in trade. By performing it on the ninth day one acquires many animals of uncloven hoofs. By performing it on the tenth day, one acquires a wealth of kine. By performing it on the eleventh day, one becomes the possessor of a great wealth of clothes and utensils of brass and other metals. Such a man also has many sons all of whom are blessed with Brahmatejas. By performing the sraddha on the twelfth day, one always beholds, if one desires, various kinds of objects and artefacts of exceptional beauty, made of silver and gold. By performing the sraddha on the thirteenth day, one attains eminence over one's kinsmen. Without doubt, all the young men in the family of he who performs the sraddha on the fourteenth day, meet with death. Such a man becomes entangled in war.

By performing the sraddha on the day of the new moon, one obtains the fruition of every wish. In the dark fortnight, all the days commencing with the tenth, and ending with that of the new moon, leaving only the fourteenth day, are laudable days for the performance of the sraddha. Other days of that fortnight are not so. Then, again, as the dark fortnight is better than the lighted one, so the afternoon of the day is better than the forenoon in the matter of the sraddha.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You of great power, tell me what that object is, which, if dedicated to the Pitris, becomes inexhaustible. What havi, again, lasts for all time? What, indeed, is that which if offered becomes eternal?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O Yudhishtira, what those havis are which those who know the ritual of the sraddha regard as suitable and what the fruits are that attach to each. With sesame seeds and rice and barley and masha and water and roots and fruits, if given at sraddhas, the Pitris, O king, remain gratified for the period of a month. Manu has said that if a sraddha is performed with a copious measure of sesame, such a sraddha becomes inexhaustible. Of all kinds of food, sesame seeds, tila, are regarded as the best.

With fish offered at sraddhas, the Pitris remain gratified for a period of two months. With mutton they remain gratified for three months and with the flesh of the rabbit for four. With the flesh of the goat, O king, they remain gratified for five months, with the boar for six months, and with the flesh of birds for seven. With venison obtained from the deer called Prishata, they remain gratified for eight months, and with that obtained from the Ruru for nine months, and with the meat of the Gavaya for ten months.

With the meat of the buffalo, their satiation lasts for eleven months. With beef presented at the sraddha, their satisfaction, it is said, lasts for a full year. Payasa mixed with ghrita is as acceptable to the Pitris as beef. With the meat of the Badrinasa, the satisfaction of the Pitris lasts for twelve years. The flesh of the rhinoceros, offered to the Pitris on the anniversaries of the lunar days on which they died, becomes inexhaustible. The herb called kalasaka, the petals of the kanchana flower, and meat of the goat also, thus offered, prove inexhaustible.

On this matter, Yudhishtira, there are some slokas originally sung by the Pitris, which are also sung in the world. They were shared with me once by Sanatkumara—He that has taken birth in our vamsa should give us payasa mixed with ghrita on the thirteenth day of the dark fortnight, under the Magha Nakshatra, during Dakshinayana, the sun's southern course. One born in our race should, under the asterism Magha, as if in the observance of a vow, offer the meat of a goat or the petals of the kanchana flower. He should also offer us, with the due rites, payasa mixed with ghee, dedicating it on a place covered by the shadow of an elephant. Many sons should be coveted so that at least one may go to Gaya to perform the sraddha of his ancestors, to holy Gaya where stands the great Nyagrodha, the banyan that is celebrated across all the worlds and that makes all offerings made under its branches inexhaustible.

Even a little water, roots, fruits, meat and rice, mixed with honey, if offered on the anniversary of the day of death become inexhaustible.'"

"Bhishma continues, 'Listen to me, Yudhishtira, as I tell you what those optional sraddhas are that should be performed under the different nakshatras and that were first spoken of by Yama to King Sasabindu. That man who always performs the sraddha under the Krittika nakshatra is regarded as performing a sacrifice after establishing the sacred fire. Such a one, freed from fear, ascends into heaven with his children.

He that wishes for children should perform the sraddha under the star Rohini, while he that wants tejas should do it under Mrigasiras. By performing the sraddha under Ardra, a man becomes the doer of fierce deeds. A mortal, by performing the sraddha under Punarvasu, gains much through farming.

The man that is desirous of growth and advancement should perform the Sraddha under Pushya. By doing it under the Aslesha nakshatra, one begets heroic children. By doing it under the three Maghas, one attains to pre-eminence among kinsmen. By doing it under the prior Phalgunis, the doer is endued with good fortune. By performing the sraddha under the later Phalgunis, one gains many children; while by performing it under Hasta, one attains to the fruition of one's wishes.

By performing it under the star Chitra one has children endowed with great beauty. By doing it under Swati, one makes much profit through trade. The man that wants children acquires the fruition of his wish by performing the sraddha under the Visakha nakshatra. By doing it under Anuradha, one becomes a king of kings. By making offerings in honour of the Pitris under the Jyeshta nakshatra, with devotion and humility, one attains to sovereignty, O Kurusattama.

By performing the sraddha under Mula one finds health, and under the prior Ashadha, one acquires excellent fame. By performing it under the later Ashadha, one succeeds in roving over the whole world, freed from every sorrow. By undertaking the sraddha under Abhijit, one attains to high knowledge. By doing it under Sravana, one departing from this world attains to a very high end. The man that performs the sraddha under the Dhanishtha nakshatra becomes the ruler of a kingdom. By performing it under the nakshatra presided over by Varuna—Satabhisha—one attains to success as a physician. By performing the sraddha under the stellation of the prior Bhadrapada, one acquires large herds of goats and sheep; while by doing it under the later Bhadrapada, one acquires thousands of kine. By performing the sraddha under the asterism Revati, one acquires great wealth in utensils of white brass and copper.

By performing the sraddha under Aswini one acquires many horses, while under Bharani, one attains to longevity.

Listening to these laws about the sraddhas, King Sasabindu performed them accordingly, and succeeded in easily subjugating and ruling all the earth, this Bhumi.'"

CANTO 90

"Yudhishtira says, 'It befits you, O best of the Kurus, to tell me to what kind of Brahmanas, O Pitamaha, the offerings made at sraddhas be given away.'

Bhishma says, 'The Kshatriya who knows the laws about dana should never examine Brahmanas when making gifts to them. In all acts, however, that relate to the worship of the Devas and the Pitris, an examination has been said to be proper. The Devas are worshipped on earth by men only when they are filled with devotion that comes from the Devas themselves. Hence, with regard to dakshina offered to the Devas one should make gifts to all Brahmanas without any examination of their merits.

In sraddhas, however, the man of intelligence should examine the Brahmanas to be engaged to assist the undertakers of the sraddha both in the performance of the ritual and giving dakshina to them of the offerings made to the Pitris. Such investigation should concern itself with their birth and conduct, their age and appearance, their learning and the nobility or lack of parentage. Amongst the Brahmanas, there are some that pollute the vamsa and gotra and some that sanctify it. Listen to me, O king, as I tell you who the Brahmanas are that should be excluded.

The Brahmana that is full of guile, or is guilty of foeticide, or he that is ill with consumption, or he that keeps animals, or is destitute of Vedic study, or is a common servant of a village, or lives upon the interest of loans, or he that is a singer, or he that sells all things, or he that is guilty of arson, or he that is a poisoner, or he that is a pimp by profession, or he that sells Soma, or he that is a professor of palmistry, or he that is in the employ of the king, or he that is a seller of oil, or he that is a cheat and bearer of false witness, or he that has a quarrel with his father, or he that tolerates a lover of his wife in his house, or he that has been cursed, or he that is a thief, or he that lives by some mechanical art, or he that puts on disguises, or he that is deceitful in his conduct, or he that is hostile to those he calls his friends, or he that is an adulterer, or he that is a preceptor of Sudras, or he that has betaken himself to the profession of arms, or he that wanders with dogs to hunt, or he that has been bitten by a dog, or he that has married before his elder brothers, or he that has undergone circumcision, he that violates the bed of his guru, he that is an actor or mime, he that lives by setting up an idol and he that lives by calculating the conjunctions of stars and planets and asterisms, are all regarded as fit to be excluded.

Those conversant with the Vedas say that the offerings made at sraddhas, if eaten by such Brahmanas, go to fill the stomachs of Rakshasas instead of filling those of the Pitris, O Yudhishtira. The man who, having eaten at a sraddha, does not abstain that day from study of the Vedas or who has sexual congress that day with a Sudra woman, must know that his Pitris, because of these acts of his, have to lie for a month in his excrement. If given to a Brahmana who sells Soma, spirituous liquor, the offerings made at sraddhas are converted into human faeces; if given to a Brahmana engaged in the practice of medicine, they become converted into pus and blood; if given to one who lives by setting up an idol, they fail to produce any fruit; if to one who lives upon the interest of loans, they lead to ignominy; if given to one engaged in trade, they yield no fruits either here or hereafter. If gifted to a Brahmana born of a widowed mother, by a second husband, they become as fruitless as libations poured on ashes.

They who give dakshina of the havya and kavya offered at sraddhas to such Brahmanas as are divested of the duties ordained for them and of the good conduct that persons of their varna should observe, find that such dakshina yields no punya. The man of little intelligence who makes gifts to such Brahmanas, knowing their dispositions, obliges, by their conduct, his Pitris to eat human excrement in the next world. You should know that these wretches among Brahmanas deserve to be excluded from their lineage.

Those Brahmanas, also, of little vitality, who are engaged in teaching Sudras are the same. A Brahmana who is blind stains sixty individuals of his line; one that is impotent, a hundred; while one that is afflicted with white leprosy stains as many as he looks upon, O king. Whatever offerings made at sraddhas are eaten by one with his head wrapped round with a cloth, whatever is eaten by one with his face turned southwards, and whatever is eaten while wearing shoes or sandals, all go to gratify the Asuras.

Whatever, again, is given with malice, and whatever is given without reverence, have been ordained by Brahma himself as the portion of Bali, the prince of Asuras.

Dogs, and such Brahmanas as are polluters of their gotras, should not be allowed to look upon the offerings made at sraddhas. For this reason, Sraddhas should be performed in a place that is properly cordoned around or concealed from view. The place for a sraddha should also be strewn with sesame seeds. That sraddha which is performed without sesame seeds, or that which is done by a person in anger, has its havi stolen by Rakshasas and Pisachas. Equal to the number of Brahmanas seen by one that deserves to be excluded from the gotra, is the loss of punya he causes to the foolish performer of the sraddha who invites him to the feast.

I will now tell you who sanctifiers of the vamsa are. Do you find them out through examination. All Brahmanas that are purified by knowledge, Vedic study, and vows and observances, and they that are of good and righteous behaviour, should be known as sanctifiers of everything. I will tell you who deserve to sit in the sacred line.

He that is conversant with the three Nachiketas, he that has set up the five sacrificial fires, he that knows the five Suparnas, he that is conversant with the six angas of the Veda, he that is a descendant of sires who were engaged in teaching the Vedas and is himself so engaged, he that is well-conversant with the Chchandas, he that is acquainted with the Jyeshta Saman, he that is obedient to the sway of his parents, he that knows the Vedas and whose ancestors have been so for ten generations, he that has congress with only his lawfully wedded wives and this in their seasons, and he who has been cleansed by knowledge, by the Vedas, and by vows and observances—such a Brahmana sanctifies the lineage.

He who reads the Atharva-siras, who is devoted to the observance of brahmacharya, and who is steady in the observance of righteous vratas, who is truthful and of good and pure conduct, and who is duly observant of his svadharma; they, also, that have undergone fatigue and labour to bathe in the waters of tirthas, and have taken the avabhrita snana, the final bath, after performing sacrifices with proper mantras, who are free from the sway of wrath, who are not restless, who are blessed with forgiving dispositions, who are self-restrained masters of their senses, and they who are devoted to the good of all creatures—these should be invited to sraddhas. Anything given to such men becomes inexhaustible. These indeed are sanctifiers of lineages.

There are others also, highly blessed, that should be regarded as sanctifiers of the vamsa. They are Yatis and those that are knowers of the religion of moksha, and they that are devoted to yoga, and they that properly observe excellent vratas and they that, with collected mind, recite sacred Itihasas to the best of Brahmanas. They that are conversant with Bhashyas, they also that are devoted to grammatical studies, they that study the Puranas and they that study the Dharmashastras and, having studied them, live by them; he that has lived for the required period in the home of his guru, he that is truthful in speech, he that is a giver of thousands, they that are the very best in their knowledge of all the Vedas and the scriptural and philosophical aphorisms—these sanctify the parampara as far they look at it. And because they sanctify all who sit in the parampara, they are called sanctifiers.

Brahmavadis, utterers of Brahman, say that even a single person who is the descendant of sires who were teachers of the Vedas and who is himself a Vedic teacher, sanctifies full seven yojanas around him. If he that is not a ritwik and that is not a Vedic acharya takes the pre-eminent seat at a sraddha, with even the permission of the other ritwiks there, he is said to take the sins of all who may be sitting there. If, on the other hand, he happens to be a knower of the Vedas and free from all the faults that are regarded polluting the line, he shall not, be regarded as fallen by taking the foremost seat in a sraddha. Such a man would then truly be a sanctifier of the lineage.

For these reasons, you should properly examine Brahmanas before inviting them to sraddhas. You should invite only such among them as are devoted to their svadharma, and as are born into good families, and as are possessed of great learning. He who performs sraddhas for feeding only his friends and whose havi does not gratify the Devas and the Pitris, fails to ascend into swarga. He who gathers only his friends and relatives on the occasion of the sraddha he performs, without properly honouring deserving persons by inviting and feeding them, fails, when he dies, to leave the world by the path of the Devas, which is a lighted one and free from all afflictions and impediments.

The man who makes the sraddha he performs just an occasion for gathering his friends, never succeeds in attaining to swarga. Verily, the man who converts the sraddha into an occasion for feteing and feeding his friends, is separated from heaven even as a bird from its perch when the string tying it breaks. Therefore, he that performs a sraddha should not use it as an occasion to honour his friends. He may gather them together and make gifts of wealth to them on other occasions. The havi and the kavi offered at sraddhas should be served to them that are neither friends nor enemies but are only indifferent or neutral to him. As seed sown in sterile soil does not sprout, or as one that has not sown does not receive a share of the harvest, even so, the sraddha in which the offerings are eaten by an unworthy person yields no fruit either here or hereafter.

That Brahmana who is destitute of Vedic study is like a fire made by burning grass or straw, and is soon extinguished just like such a fire. The offerings made at sraddhas should not be given to him even as libations should not be poured on the ashes of the sacrificial fire. When the offerings made at sraddhas are exchanged by the performers with one another, instead of being given away to the truly worthy, they come to be regarded as Pisacha dakshina. Such offerings gratify neither the gods nor the manes. Instead of reaching the other world, they wander even here like a cow that has lost her calf wandering listlessly within the fold. As those libations of ghee that are poured upon the extinguished ashes of a sacrificial fire never reach either the Devas or the Pitris, a gift that is made to a dancer or a singer or a dakshina given to a lying or deceitful person, produces no punya.

The dakshina that is given to a liar or a deceitful man destroys both the giver and the receiver without benefiting them in any least respect. Such a dakshina is only pernicious and entirely censurable. The Pitris of the person making it have to fall from the path of the Devas. The gods know them to be Brahmanas who always walk, O Yudhishtira, within the bounds ordained by the Rishis who are knowers of all dharma, and who have firm faith in their efficacy. Those Brahmanas that are devoted to Vedic study, to gyana, to tapasya, and to karma, O Bhaarata, should be known as Rishis. The offerings made at sraddhas should be given to those that are devoted to knowledge. Verily, they are regarded as true men who never speak ill of Brahmanas.

Men who speak ill of Brahmanas in public should never be fed at sraddhas. If Brahmanas, be disparaged with calumny, they will destroy three generations of the one who sullies their pure name. This is the declaration of the Vaikhanasa Rishis. Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas should be examined from a distance. Whether one likes them or feels a dislike for them, one must give to such Brahmanas the offerings made at Sraddhas. That man who feeds thousands upon thousands of false Brahmanas acquires merit that is attainable by feeding even one Brahmana if that Brahmana is possessed of a knowledge of the Vedas, O Bhaarata!”

"Yudhishtira says, 'By whom was the sraddha first conceived and at what time? What is its essence? During the time when the world was peopled by only the descendants of Bhrigu and Angiras, who was the Muni that established the sraddha? What karmas should not be done at a sraddha? What are those sraddhas in which fruits and roots are to be offered? What kinds of paddy should be avoided in sraddhas? Do you tell me all this, Pitamaha!'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to me, O ruler of men, and I will tell you how the sraddha was introduced, the time of its introduction, the essences of the rite, and the Muni who conceived it.

From the Self-born Brahma sprang Atri, O you of Kuru's race. In Atri's race was born a Muni of the name of Dattatreya. Dattatreya begot a son called Nimi possessed of tapodhana, the wealth of asceticism. Nimi begot a son named Srimat who was blessed with great beauty of person. Upon the expiration of a full thousand years, Srimat, having undergone the severest tapasya, succumbed to time and departed this world.

His sire Nimi, having performed the purificatory rites according to the ritual laid down in the shastras, became filled with great grief, thinking continually of the loss of his son. Thinking of that cause of his sorrow, the Mahatman Nimi collected various agreeable items of food and drink, on the fourteenth day of the moon. The next morning, aching as his heart did with sorrow, he rose from bed and managed to withdraw his mind from the single pain which held it fast. He succeeded in busying his mind with other matters.

With his mind rapt in dhyana, he then conceived the idea of conducting a sraddha. All the fruits and roots which he himself ate, and all the different staple grains that were agreeable to him, that sage carefully thought of—Nimi who owned the wealth of tapasya.

On Amavasya, the day of the new moon, he invited seven Brahmanas worthy of worship to his asrama. Nimi, of great wisdom, made them sit upon asanas of kusa grass, and revered them by walking around their persons in pradakshina. Approaching the seven Brahmanas whom he had brought to his hermitage, the great Nimi fed them syamaka rice, unmixed with salt. At the feet of those Brahmanas who were eating the food served to them, kusa grass was spread out on the asanas upon which they sat, with the sharp ends of the blades of grass pointing towards the south.

With a pure body and mind and with concentrated attention, Nimi, having placed those blades of sacred grass in the way indicated, offered rice cakes as pinda to his dead son, uttering his name and family. Having done this, that foremost of Munis was suddenly filled with dismay at the thought of having performed a kriya that had not to his knowledge been laid down in any of the scriptures. Indeed, he began to regret what he had quite spontaneously done.

"Never done before by the Munis, alas, what have I done? How shall I avoid being cursed by the Brahmanas for this abomination as a heretic and a performer of unholy rites?"

He then thought of the original progenitor of his race. As soon as he was thought of, Atri tapodhana came there. Seeing Nimi deranged with grief at the death of his son, the immortal Atri comforted him. He said to him, "O Nimi, this rite that you have conceived is a sacrifice in honour of the Pitris. Let no fear be yours on its account, for the Pitamaha Brahma himself, in days of old, ordained it. Yes, this ritual that you have conceived was laid down by the Self-born himself. Who other than the Svayambhuva could ordain this ritual in sraddhas?

I will tell you, O son, the excellent law created by none other than Brahma in respect of sraddhas; O son, do you follow it. Listen to me. Having first performed the karana on the sacred fire with the chanting of mantras, one should next always pour libations to Agni, and Soma, and Varuna. To the Viswedevas also, who are always the companions of the Pitris, the Self-born then ordained a portion of the offerings. The earth also, as the goddess that sustains the offerings made at sraddhas, should then be praised under the names of Vaishnavi, Kasyapi and Akshaya, the inexhaustible. When water is being fetched for the sraddha, Varuna of great puissance should be given praise. After this, both Agni and Soma should be invoked with reverence and gratified with libations, O sinless one.

The deities that are known by the name of Pitris were created by the Svayambhu. Others, highly blessed, the Ushnapas, were also created by him. For all these, shares have been ordained of the offerings made at sraddhas. By adoring all these deities at sraddhas, the ancestors of the persons performing them are freed from all sins.

The Pitris created by the Self-born Brahma number seven. The Viswedevas having Agni for their mouth, for it is through Agni that they feed, I have mentioned before. I will now name those high-souled deities who deserve shares of the offerings made at sraddhas. They are Bala, Dhriti, Vipapa, Punyakrit, Pavana, Parshni, Kshemak, Divysanu, Vivaswat, Viryavat, Hrimat, Kirtimat, Krita, Jitatman, Munivirya, Diptaroman, Bhayankara, Anukarman, Pratia, Pradatri, Ansumat, Sailabha, Parama krodhi, Dhiroshni, Bhupati, Sraja, Vajrin and Vari—these are the eternal Viswedevas.

There are others also, whose names are Vidyutvarchas, Somavarchas, and Suryasri. Others numbered amongst them are Somapa, Suryasavitra, Dattatman, Pundariyaka, Ushninabha, Nabhoda, Viswayu, Dipti, Chamuhara, Suresa, Vyomari, Sankara Bhava, Isa, Kartri, Kriti, Daksha, Bhuvana, Divya, Karmakrit, Ganita Panchavirya, Aditya, Rasmimat, Saptakrit, Somavachas, Viswakrit, Kavi, Anugoptri, Sugoptri, Naptri and Iswara—these most blessed ones are numbered among the Viswedevas. They are eternal and conversant with all that occurs in Time.

The kinds of paddy which should not be offered at sraddhas are those called kodrava and pulka. Asafoetida also, among ingredients used in cooking, should not be offered, as also onions and garlic, the meat of animals slain with venomed shafts, and black salt. Other offerings that should not be made at sraddhas are the flesh of the domesticated pig, the meat of all animals not slaughtered at sacrifices, salt of the variety called vid, the herb called sitapaki, all sprouts like those of the bamboo. Indeed, all kinds of salt should be excluded from the offerings made at sraddhas, and also the fruits of the jambu.

Anything upon which anyone has spat or upon which tears have fallen should not be offered at sraddhas. Among offerings made to the Pitris or with the havya and kavya offered to the Devas, the herb sudarsana should not be included. Havi mixed with this is not acceptable to the Pitris. From the place where the sraddha is being performed, the Chandala and the Swapacha should be excluded, as also all who wear clothes dyed yellow, and those affected with leprosy, or one who has been declared outcast for his or her transgressions, or one who is guilty of Brahmahatya, or a Brahmana of mixed descent or one who is the relative of an outcast. All these should be excluded by men of wisdom from the place where a sraddha is being performed."

Having said these words in days of old to Rishi Nimi of his own race, the illustrious Atri tapodhana went back to the Grandsire Brahma's sabha in swarga.'"

"Bhishma says, 'After Nimi had innocently conceived and performed the first sraddha, all the great Rishis began to perform the sacrifice in honour of the Pitris according to the law. Firmly devoted to the discharge of all dharma, the Rishis, having performed sraddhas, began to also offer oblations to the Pitris of sacred waters, with careful attention. However, in consequence of consuming all the offerings made by persons of all the varnas, the Pitris and the Devas with them suffered from dreadful indigestion. Afflicted by the heaps of food that all men began to offer them, they repaired to the presence of Soma. Approaching Soma, they said, "Alas, great is our affliction from all the food offered to us at sraddhas. You say what is needed for our ease."

To them Soma answered, saying, "If, Devas and Pitris, you want relief from your distress, you must take yourselves to the Lord Brahma. He will accomplish what you need."

At these words of Soma, O Bhaarata, the Devas and the Pitris went to Brahma who was seated on the summit of the mountains of Meru.

The Devas said, "O illustrious one, we suffer from all the food that is offered to us at yagnas and sraddhas. Lord, show us grace and help us."

Hearing what they said, the Svayambhu said to them in reply, "Here, Agni is sitting beside me. He will help you and do what will make you well."

Agni said, "You Pitris, when a sraddha comes, we will eat the offerings made to us together. If you eat those offerings with me, you shall digest them easily."

Hearing this from the fire god, the Pitris became easy of heart. It is for this reason, also, that in making offerings at sraddhas a share is first offered to the deity of fire, O king. If a portion of the offerings at a sraddha be first made to Agni, O prince of men, Rakshasas, even of regenerate origin, cannot do any injury to such a sraddha. Beholding the deity of fire at a sraddha, Rakshasas fly away from it.

The ritual of the sraddha is that the pinda, the rice-cake, should first be offered to the deceased sire. Next, a cake should be offered to the Grandsire. After this, should one be offered to the Great-grandsire. Even this is the niyama in respect of the sraddha. Over every cake that is offered, the offerer should, with concentrated attention, utter the Savitri mantras. This other mantra also should be uttered—the one to Soma who is fond of the Pitris.

A woman who has become impure from the advent of her period, or one whose ears have been cut off, should not be allowed where a sraddha is being performed. Nor should a woman be brought from a gotra other than that of the person who is performing the sraddha, to cook the rice to be offered at the sraddha.

While crossing a river, one should offer oblations of water, tarpana, to one's Pitris, naming them all. Indeed, when one comes upon a river one should gratify one's Pitris with oblations of water. Having offered tarpana of water first to the ancestors of one's own vamsa, one should next offer such oblations to one's departed friends and relatives. When one crosses a river or stream on a chariot yoked to oxen of variegated hue, or in boats, the Pitris expect oblations of water. Those that know this always offer oblations of water with concentrated dhyana to the Pitris. Every fortnight on the day of the new moon, one should make offerings to one's deceased ancestors.

Growth, longevity, energy and prosperity are attained through devotion to the Pitris. The Grandsire Brahma, Pulastya, Vasishta, Pulaha, Angiras, Kratu and the great Rishi Kasyapa—these, O prince of Kuru's race, are regarded as great masters of yoga. They are numbered among the Pitris. Even such is the high ritual of the sraddha.

Through sraddhas performed on earth, the departed of one race are saved from sorrow in the next world. Kurusattama, I have thus explained to you the niyamas in respect of sraddhas.

I will now tell you once again about dakshina, gifts or charity."

"Yudhishtira says, 'If Brahmanas that are keeping a fast eat, at the invitation of a Brahmana, the havi offered at a sraddha, can they be charged with the transgression or a violation of their vow, or should they refuse the invitation of a Brahmana to eat? Tell me this, Pitamaha.'

Bhishma says, 'Let those Brahmanas eat, impelled by desire, who are keeping such vows as are not indicated in the Vedas. As regards those Brahmanas, however, that keep vratas indicated in the Vedas, they are regarded as guilty of a breach of their vow, O Yudhishtira, by eating the havi of a sraddha at the request of him who performs the sraddha.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Some say that fasting is a penance. Is tapasya truly identifiable with fasting, or is it not so? Tell me this, Pitamaha.'

Bhishma says, 'A regular fast for a month or a half month is not regarded as a tapasya. The truth, however, is that one who mortifies one's own body is not to be regarded either as an ascetic or as one that knows dharma. Renunciation, however, is regarded as the best of penances. A Brahmana should always be an abstainer from food, and observe the vow of brahmacharya. A Brahmana should always practise self-denial, restraining even speech, and recite the Vedas.

The Brahmana should marry and surround himself with children and relatives, from his desire of achieving dharma. He should never sleep. He should abstain from meat. He should always read the Vedas and the shastras. He should always speak the truth, and practise self-denial. He should eat vighasa, what remains after serving the deities and guests. Indeed, he should be hospitable towards all that come to his home. He should always eat amrita, the food that remains in the house after all the family, including guests and servants, have eaten. He should duly observe all ordained rites and perform sacrifices.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How may one come to be regarded as being always observant of fasts? How may one become observant of vratas? How, O king, may one come to be an eater of vighasa? By doing what may one be said to be hospitable to one's guest?'

Bhishma says, 'He who eats only morning and evening at the prescribed hours and abstains from all food during the time between, is an abstainer from food. He who has congress with only his wedded wife and that only in her season, is said to be observant of the vow of brahmacharya. By always making gifts, one comes to be regarded as being truthful in speech. By abstaining from all meat from animals slaughtered for just the sake of meat, one becomes an abstainer from meat.

By making gifts one is cleansed of all sins, and by abstaining from sleep during the day one is regarded to be always awake. He who always eats what remains after serving the needs of guests and servants is said to always eat amrita. He who abstains from eating until Brahmanas have first partaken of his food, is regarded as conquering heaven by such abstention. He who eats what remains after serving the Devas, the Pitris, and his relatives and dependants, is said to eat vighasa.

Such men acquire many regions of felicity in the world of Brahma himself. There, O king, they dwell in the company of Apsaras and Gandharvas. Indeed, they sport and enjoy all manner of unworldly delight in those realms, with the Devas, Sadasyas and the Pitris in their company, and surrounded by their own children and grandchildren. Even such is the lofty end to which they attain.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Men are seen to make diverse kinds of gifts unto the Brahmanas. What, however, is the difference, Pitamaha, between the giver and the receiver?'

Bhishma says, 'The Brahmana accepts gifts from him that is righteous, and also from him that is unrighteous. If the giver happens to be righteous, the receiver incurs little fault. If on the other hand, the giver happens to be an adharmi, the receiver sinks into hell. In this regard an old story of the conversation between Vrishadarbhi and the Saptarishis is told, O Bhaarata.

Kasyapa and Atri and Vasishta and Bharadwaja and Gautama and Viswamitra and Jamadagni, and Vasishta's wife, the chaste Arundhati, all had a common serving maid whose name was Ganda. A Sudra called Pasusakha married Ganda and became her husband. Kasyapa and others, in days of old, observed the austerest penances and roved over the world, desirous of attaining to the eternal region of Brahma through yoga-dhyana.

About that time, O delighter of the Kurus, there came a severe drought. Tormented by hunger, the whole world of living creatures grew weak and emaciated. At a sacrifice which had been performed in former times by Sibi's son, he had given away to the ritwiks a son of his as the sacrificial dakshina. From being not blessed with longevity, the prince died of starvation during the famine.

The Rishis I have named, ravaged by hunger, approached the dead prince and sat surrounding him. Indeed, those greatest of Munis saw the son of Sibi, at whose sacrifice they had officiated, dead from starvation, and began to cook the body in a large vessel, for they were compelled by pangs of hunger. All food having disappeared from the world of men, those ascetics, who wished to save their lives, took recourse, for their very lives, to such a wretched deed.

While they were thus engaged, Vrishadarbha's son, King Saibya, abroad on his travels, came upon those Rishis. Indeed, he met them on his way, even while they were cooking the dead body.

The son of Vrishadarbha said, "Accepting a dakshina from me will immediately relieve you all. Do you all, therefore, accept a gift for the support of your bodies. O Munis endowed with the wealth of tapasya, listen to me as I declare to you what wealth I have. That Brahmana who solicits me for dana is ever dear to me. Verily, I shall give you a thousand mules. To each of you I shall give a thousand cows of white coats, each one with a well-born calf, and yielding milk. I shall also give you a thousand white bulls of the best breed, all capable of bearing heavy burdens. I shall also give you a further large number of kine, of good disposition, the foremost of their kind, all fat, and each of which, having brought forth her first calf, is quick with her second.

Tell me what else I should give you—the finest villages, grain, barley, and even rarer and priceless jewels.

But, I beg you, do not seek to eat this food that you are engaged in cooking. Tell me instead what I should give to you for the support of your bodies."

The Rishis said, "O king, accepting gifts from a monarch is very sweet at first but poison in the end. Knowing this well, why do you tempt us with these offers? The body of the Brahmana is the kshetra of the gods. With penance, it is purified. Then again, by gratifying the Brahmana, one gratifies the Devas. If a Brahmana accepts the gifts made to him by the king, he loses the merit that he would otherwise acquire through his penances on that day. Indeed, accepting such dana consumes that punya even as a blazing conflagration does a forest. Let happiness be yours, O king, as the result of the dakshina you give to those that solicit you."

Saying this, they left the place, going another way. The flesh those high-souled ones had intended to cook remained uncooked. Indeed, abandoning that flesh, they went away and entered the forest in search of food. After this, the ministers of the king, urged by their master, entered that forest, and plucking some figs, attempted to give them to those Rishis. The king's officers filled some of those figs with gold and mixing them with others sought to induce those ascetics to accept them. Atri picked up some of those figs, and finding them heavy, refused to take them.

He said, "We are not destitute of knowledge. We are not fools. We know that there is gold within these figs. We have our wits about us. Indeed, we are awake and not asleep. If accepted in this world, these will produce bitter fruit in the next. He who seeks happiness both here and hereafter should never accept these."

Vasishta said, "If we accept even one gold coin, it will be counted as a hundred or even a thousand in assigning the sin that attaches to us. If we accept many coins, we shall surely attain to a most unhappy end."

Kasyapa said, "All the paddy and barley on earth, all the gold and animals and women in the world cannot satisfy the desire of a single man. Hence, one possessed of wisdom should dispel greed, and embrace contentment."

Bharadwaja said, "The horns of a ruru, after their first appearance, begin to grow as the animal grows. The greed of man is even like this. It has no measure."

Gautama said, "All the objects of pleasure that exist in the world cannot together satisfy even one person. Man is even like the ocean, for he can never be filled, even as the ocean can never be filled by all the waters that are poured into it by the rivers."

Viswamitra said, “When one desire cherished by a man is satisfied, there immediately springs up another which pierces him like an arrow and whose satisfaction he seeks.”

Jamadagni said, “Abstention from taking dana supports tapasya as its very foundation. Acceptance, however, destroys the inestimable wealth of penance.”

Arundhati said, “Some men opine that things of the world may be stored with a view to spending them upon the acquisition of dharma through dana and yagnas. I however, think, that the acquisition of dharma is better than that of worldly wealth.”

Ganda said, “When these my lords, who are imbued with great energy, are so very afraid of this which seems to be a great terror, a weak man such as I fear it the more.”

Pasusakha said, “There is nothing superior to the wealth there is in dharma. That wealth is known to the Brahmanas. I wait upon them as their servant, only to learn to value that wealth.”

The Rishis, all together, said, “Let happiness be his, as the result of the dana he gives, who is the king of the people of this land. Let his dana be successful who has sent these fruits to us, hiding gold within them.”

Having said these words, those Rishis of steadfast vows, renouncing the figs with gold in them, left that place and went wherever they wanted.

The ministers said, “O king, knowing that gold was hidden within the figs, the Rishis have gone away.”

Thus addressed by his ministers, King Vrishadarbhi was filled with wrath against all those Rishis. Indeed, to have revenge upon them, the king entered his own chamber. Observing the austerest of penances, he poured libations of ghrita on his sacred fire, accompanying each pouring with mantras that he uttered. From that fire there then arose a dreadful female form that could strike terror into anyone. Vrishadarbhi named her Yatudhani. She looked as terrible as the Last Night, who had appeared with joined hands before the king.

Addressing Vrishadarbhi, she said, “What shall I accomplish for you?”

Vrishadarbhi said, “Go and follow the seven Rishis, as also Arundhati, and the husband of their maid-servant, and the maid-servant herself, and understand what the meanings are of their names. Having understood their names, do you slay all of them. After killing them, you may go whatever you please.”

Saying, “So be it!” the Rakshasi who had been named Yatudhani flew to the forest in which the great Rishis wandered in constant search of food. Indeed, O king, those great sages, with Atri among them, roved within the forest, subsisting upon fruits and roots. In the course of their wanderings, they saw a mendicant of broad shoulders, and plump arms and legs, and a well-nourished face and belly. Of limbs that were all adipose, he was walking along with a dog for company. Seeing that mendicant whose limbs were all well-developed and handsome, Arundhati exclaimed, “None of you will ever be able to show such well-developed limbs or features!”

Vasishta said, “The sacred fire of this person is not like ours for while he can pour libations on it, morning and evening, none of us is able to do the same. This is why we see both him and his dog so healthy.”

Atri said, “This man does not feel the pangs of hunger as we do. Unlike ours, his energy has sustained no diminution. Acquired with the greatest difficulty, his Vedas have not, like ours, disappeared. Hence, it is that we see both him and his dog so plump and healthy.”

Viswamitra said, “Unlike us, this man is able to observe the eternal duties inculcated in the scriptures. I have become idle. I feel the pangs of hunger. I have lost the knowledge I had acquired. This man is not like us in this respect. Hence I see both him and his dog so fit and healthy.”

Jamadagni said, “This man has not to think of storing his annual grain and fuel as we are compelled to. Hence do I see both him and his dog so well-developed.”

Kasyapa said, “This man has not, like us, four brothers of full blood who are begging from house to house, constantly crying, Give, Give! Hence it is that I see him and his dog in such fine fettle.”

Bharadwaja said, ‘This man has no regret like ours for having condemned and cursed his spouse. He has done nothing so base and senseless. Hence I see both him and his dog so strong and healthy!”

Gautama said, “Unlike us, this man does not own only three pieces of covering made of kusa grass, and a single ranku-skin, each of which again is three years old. Hence it is that I see both him and his dog in such rude health.”

Meanwhile, seeing those great Rishis, the wandering mendicant approached them, and accosted them all by touching their hands according to the custom. They spoke together about the difficulty of finding sustenance in that forest and the consequent necessity of bearing the pangs of hunger, and all of them left that place. They continued to wander through that wilderness, all bent upon the common purpose of plucking fruits and digging up roots for sustenance.

One day, as they went along they saw a beautiful lake overgrown with lotuses. Its banks were covered with trees that stood thickly near one another. The waters of the lake were pure and transparent. Indeed, the lotuses that adorned the lake were all of the hue of the morning sun. The leaves that floated on the water were of the colour of lapis lazuli. Diverse kinds of water birds swam and frolicked upon its bosom. There was but one path leading to the lake. The banks were not miry and access to the water was easy.

Urged by Vrishadarbhi, the Rakshasi of frightful mien, who had sprung from his incantations and named Yatudhani, guarded the lake. Those foremost of Rishis, with Pasusakha in their company, went towards the lake, thinking to collect some lotus-stalks. Seeing Yatudhani of frightful aspect standing on the banks of the lake, those great Rishis addressed her, saying, ‘Who are you that stand alone in this solitary jungle? For whom do you wait here? What is your purpose? What do you do here on the banks of this lake adorned with lotuses?”

Yatudhani said, “It matters not who I am. I deserve not to be questioned about my purposes. You that are possessed of ascetic wealth, know that I am the guardian set to watch over this lake.”

The Rishis said, “All of us are hungry. We have nothing else to eat. With your leave we would gather some lotus-stalks.”

Yatudhani said, “If you strike a compact with me, you may gather lotus-stalks as you please. You must, one by one, give me your names. And then you may have the stalks.”

Ascertaining that her name was Yatudhani and that she was there to kill them after learning the extent of their strength from the meaning of their names, Atri, who was famished, addressed her, “I am called Atri because I cleanse the world of sin. For, again, thrice studying the Vedas every day, I have made days of my nights. That, again, is no night in which I have not studied the Vedas. For these reasons also I am called Atri, O lovely woman.”

Yatudhani said, “O you of great effulgence, I cannot understand the meaning of your name, nor the explanation you have given me of it. Do you go and plunge into this lake filled with lotuses.”

Vasishta said, “I am endowed with the wealth of the yoga of power. I lead, again, a grihasta’s life, and am regarded as the foremost of all men that lead this way of life. Because of owning such wealth, of my living as a householder, and of my being regarded as the foremost of all grihastas, I am called Vasishta.”

Yatudhani said, ‘The etymology of your name is perfectly incomprehensible to me, insofar as the inflections which the original roots have undergone are unintelligible. Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.”

Kasyapa said, “I always protect my body, and because of my tapasya I have become blessed with illustriousness. For thus protecting my body and for this effulgence that is due to my penances, I have come to be called by the name of Kasyapa.”

Yatudhani said, “O you of great effulgence, I cannot fathom the etymology you have given of your name. Go and plunge into this lake filled with lotuses.”

Bharadwaja said, “I always support my sons, my disciples, the Devas, the Brahmanas, and my wife. In consequence of supporting all these with ease, I am called Bharadwaja.”

Yatudhani said, “The etymology you have given me of your name is entirely incomprehensible, because of the many changes of inflection the root has undergone. Go and plunge into this lake filled with lotuses.”

Gotama said, “I have conquered heaven and earth through samyama, self-restraint. Because of my looking upon all creatures and objects with an equal eye, I am like a smokeless fire. Hence, you cannot subdue me. When, again, I was born, the refulgence of my body dispelled the surrounding darkness. For these reasons I am called Gotama.”

Yatudhani said, “The explanation you have given me of your name, O Maharishi, I cannot fathom. Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.”

Viswamitra said, “The gods of the universe are my friends. I am also the friend of the universe. Hence, O Yatudhani, know that I am called Viswamitra.”

Yatudhani said, “I can make no sense of the explanation you have given me of your name for the changes the root has undergone. Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.”

Jamadagni said, “I have sprung from the sacrificial fire of the Devas. Hence am I called Jamadagni, O you of beautiful features.”

Yatudhani said, “The etymology of your name is beyond me for the transformations its root has known. Do you go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.”

Arundhati said, “I always stay by the side of my husband, and hold the earth together with him. I always incline my husband’s heart towards me. I am, for these reasons, called Arundhati.”

Yatudhani said, “I cannot make anything of your name for the modifications its root has undergone. Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.”

Ganda said, “The Ganda means a portion of the cheek. As I have that portion a little raised above the others, I am, O you that have sprung from the sacrificial fire of Saibya, called by the name Ganda.”

Yatudhani said, ‘The explanation which you have given me of your name is incomprehensible to me because of the inflections which the root has undergone. Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.”

Pasusakha said, “I protect and tend to all animals that I see, and I am always a friend to all of them. Hence am I called Pasusakha, O you that have sprung from the sacrificial fire.”

Yatudhani said, “I cannot understand the meaning of your name. Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.”

Sunahsakha said, “I cannot explain the etymology of my name after the manner of these Munis. But know, O Yatudhani, that I am called by the name of Sunahsakha.”

Yatudhani said, “You have spoken your name only once. I have not heard any explanation of its roots. Indeed, I have not heard your name properly. Do you tell it to me again, O Dvija.”

Sunahsakha said, “Since you have not heard my name because I spoke it only once, I will strike you with my tridanda, my triple staff, and be you ashes from my blow!”

Struck on the head by the sannyasin with his tridanda, a blow that was indeed like the chastisement inflicted by a Brahmana, the Rakshasi who had sprung from the incantations of King Vrishadarbhi fell onto the earth and became ashes. Having thus destroyed the mighty Rakshasi, Sunahsakha thrust his stick into the ground and sat himself down on a grassy patch of land.

Having plucked as many lotuses as they liked, and gathered as many lotus-stalks as they wanted, the other Rishis emerged from the lake, brimming with joy. They put down the flowers and the stalks, gathered with some labour, on the banks of the water and entered the lake again, now to offer tarpana, oblations of water, to the Pitris. Coming out again, they came to the place where they had left the lotus-stalks, and those greatest of sages found that the stalks were nowhere to be seen.'

The Rishis said, "What stone-hearted sinner has stolen the lotus-stalks we gathered to appease our hunger?"

Those Dvijottamas suspected one another, O Parantapa, and said, "We shall each have to swear our innocence!"

Famished as they were and worn with toil, all those Rishis agreed and swore their innocence, one by one. Atri said, "Let him who has stolen the lotus-stalk touch sacred cows with his foot, make water facing the sun, and study the Vedas on forbidden days!"

Vasishta said, "Let him who has stolen the lotus-stalks never study the Vedas, let him be a dog catcher, be a wandering mendicant unrestrained by the laws laid down for that life, be a murderer of those that seek his protection, live upon the proceeds of the sale of his daughter, solicit wealth from those that are low and vile!"

Kasyapa said, "Let him who has stolen the lotus-stalks utter all kinds of loose and wretched words in all places, give false evidence in courts of law, eat the flesh of animals not killed in sacrifices, make gifts to undeserving persons or to deserving ones at unseasonable times, and have sexual congress with women during the day!"

Bharadwaja said, "Let him who has stolen the lotus-stalks be cruel and sinful in his conduct towards women and kinsmen and kine. Let him humiliate Brahmanas in disputations by brashly displaying his superior knowledge and skill. Let him study the Riks and the Yajuses on his own, disregarding his preceptor. Let him pour libations upon fires made with dry grass or straw!"

Jamadagni said, "Let him who has stolen the lotus-stalks be guilty of casting filth into pure sacred water. Let him be inspired with animosity towards kine. Let him be guilty of having sexual congress with women at times other than their season. Let him incur the aversion of all men and women. Let him derive his maintenance from the earnings of his wife. Let him have no friends and have many enemies. Let him be another's guest for receiving in return the hospitality which he has shown that other!"

Gotama said, “Let him who has stolen the lotus-stalks be guilty of casting aside the Vedas after having studied them. Let him cast off the three sacred fires. Let him be a seller of the sacred Soma. Let him live with that Brahmana who dwells in a village which has only one well from which water is drawn by all the varnas and who has married a Sudra woman besides!”

Viswamitra said, “Let him who has stolen the lotus-stalks be fated to see his preceptors and elders and his servants maintained by others during his own life-time. Let him not have a good end. Let him be the father of too many children. Let him be always impure and a wretch among Brahmanas. Let him be proud of his possessions. Let him be a tiller of the soil and let him be filled with malice. Let him wander the world during the season of rains. Let him be a paid servant. Let him be the priest of the king. Let him assist at the sacrifices of such corrupt men as do not deserve to be helped at their sacrifices!”

Arundhati said, “Let her who has stolen the lotus-stalks always humiliate her husband’s mother. Let her be always vexed with her husband. Let her eat whatever good things come to her house without sharing them. Disregarding the kinsmen of her lord, let her live in her husband’s house and eat, at the day’s end, the flour of fried barley. Let her come to be regarded as unenjoyable because of the stains that tarnish her. Let her be the mother of a heroic son!”

Ganda said, ‘Let her who has stolen the lotus-stalks be always a liar. Let her always quarrel with her kinsfolk. Let her sell her daughter in marriage for a dowry. Let her eat the food which she has cooked, alone and without sharing it with anybody. Let her pass her whole life in slavery. Indeed, let her who has stolen the lotus-stalks be quick with child because of sexual congress under guilty circumstances!”

Pasusakha said, “Let him who has stolen the lotus-stalks be born of a slave-mother. Let him have many children all of whom are worthless. And let him never worship the gods.”

Sunahsakha said, “Let him who has taken the lotus-stalks obtain the merit of bestowing his daughter in marriage upon a Brahmana, who has studied all the Samans and the Yajuses and who has carefully observed the vow of brahmacharya. Let him perform the final ablutions after having studied all the Atharvans!”

All the other Rishis said, “The oath you have taken is no oath at all, for all the consequences which you have wished upon the thief are most desirable for all Brahmanas. It is evident, O Sunahsakha, that you have taken our lotus-stalks.”

Sunahsakha said, “The lotus-stalks are missing, and what you say is perfectly true, for it is I who have stolen them. In the very sight of all of you, I have caused the stalks to disappear. You sinless ones, I did this thing from a desire to test you. I came here to protect you. That woman who lies slain there, as ashes, was called Yatudhani. She was sprung from the dark mantras of King Vrishadarbhi, and she had come here to kill you all. You Rishis endowed with the wealth of tapasya, the king sent her for your lives, but I have killed her. Otherwise the fierce and sinful spirit sprung from the Agni would have taken all your lives. It was to kill her and save you that I came here, learned Brahmanas.

Know that I am Vasava! You have entirely freed yourselves from the influence of greed, and thus you have won many eternal realms where every desire is fulfilled as soon as it appears in the heart. Rise up at once, Mahamunis, and ascend from this world into those realms of beatitude, Dvijas, that await you.”

Exceedingly gratified, the great Rishis replied to Purandara, saying, ‘Tathaastu, so be it!’, and they then rose into heaven in company of Indra himself. Even thus, those Mahatmans, though famished with hunger and though tempted at such a time with the offer of diverse kinds of objects of enjoyments, did not yield to temptation. As the result of their self-denial, they attained to swarga. It seems, therefore, that one should, under all circumstances, renounce greed. Even this, O king, is the highest dharma: that greed must be abandoned.

The man who narrates this account of the deeds of the righteous Rishis in assemblies of men, succeeds in acquiring wealth. Such a man has never to attain to a distressful end, for the Pitris, the Rishis and the Devas all become pleased with him. Hereafter, again, he is blessed with kirti, fame, and punya, religious merit, and great artha, wealth.’

Bhishma says, 'Listen to, the old itihasa of the oaths taken by many Rishis, one after another, during a tirtha yatra. Bharatottama, Indra had committed the theft, and the oaths were taken by many Rajarishis and Maharishis.

Once on a time, the Rishis, having assembled together, journeyed to the western Prabhasa. They held a consultation there which resulted in a resolve on their part to visit all the holy tirthas, the sacred waters on earth. Sukra and Angiras and Kavi of great learning were there, and Agastya and Narada and Parvata; and Bhrigu and Vasishta and Kasyapa and Gautama and Viswamitra and Jamadagni, O king. Also present were Rishi Galva, and Ashtaka and Bharadwaja and Arundhati and the Balakhilyas; and Sibi and Dilipa and Nahusha and Ambarisha and the royal Yayati and Dhundhumara and Puru.

Setting the Mahatman Satakratu, Indra, slayer of Vritra, at their head, those greatest of men went to the holy tirthas, one after the other, all of which are naves of utmost auspiciousness and grace upon the earth, and at last reached the most sacred Kausiki on Purnima, the day of the full moon, in the month of Magha. Having washed themselves of all their sins by ablutions performed in all the sacred waters, they finally went to the sacred Brahmasara.

Bathing in that lake, those Rishis endowed with tejas like that of fire began to gather and eat the stalks of the lotus. Amongst those Brahmanas, some had gathered the stalks of the lotus and some the stalks of the stellar lily. Soon they found that the stalks that Agastya had drawn up and left on the bank of the lake had been stolen. Agastya, best of sages, said, "Who has taken the good stalks which I gathered and left in this place? I suspect that one amongst you must have done this thing. Let him who has taken them give them back to me. It does not befit you to steal what was mine.

It is heard that time weakens the strength of dharma. That time has come upon us, and dharma is afflicted. It is meet that I should go to swarga for good, before adharma assails the world and establishes itself here. Before the time comes when Brahmanas, loudly chanting the Vedas, within the precincts of villages and inhabited places, cause the Sudras to hear them; before the Time comes when kings misrule and sin against the laws of dharma from motives of policy, I must go into swarga for good. Before men cease to regard the distinctions between the lower, the middle and the higher varnas, I shall go to swarga for ever. Before ignorance envelops the world and all things in darkness, I shall go to heaven for good. Before the time comes when the strong begin to oppress the weak and treat them like slaves, I must go to heaven for good. For, indeed, I dare not remain on earth to witness these things."

Greatly concerned by what he said, the others said to that great Muni, "We have not stolen your stalks. You should not harbour suspicion against us. O Mahamuni, we shall pronounce the most fearsome curses."

Having said these words, and conscious of their own innocence, and wanting to uphold the cause of dharma, those Rishis and Rajarishis then began to swear, one after another, the following curses.

Bhrigu said, "Let him who has stolen your stalks censure when censured, assail when assailed, and eat the flesh that is attached to the spine of animals slaughtered in sacrifice!"

Vasishta said, "Let him who has stolen your stalks neglect his Vedic studies, catch dogs, and having taken himself to mendicancy yet live in a city or town!"

Kasyapa said, "Let him who has stolen your stalks sell sundry and vulgar things in all places, become a thief of sacred wealth, and bear false witness!"

Gautama said, "Let him who has stolen your stalks live displaying coarse pride in all things, with an understanding that does not see all creatures with an equal eye, and always yield himself to the influence of desire and wrath. Let him be a tiller of soil, and let him be inspired by malice!"

Angiras said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks be always impure. Let him be a censurable Brahmana for his sins. Let him leash hounds. Let him be guilty of Brahmahatya. Let him be averse to expiations after having sinned!”

Dhundhumara said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks be ungrateful to his friends. Let him take birth in a Sudra woman. Let him eat alone any good food that comes to his house, without sharing it with any others!”

Dilipa said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks descend to those regions of misery and infamy which are reserved for that Brahmana who lives in a village having but one well and who has sexual congress with a Sudra woman!”

Puru said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks adopt the occupation of a physician. Let him be supported by the earnings of his wife. Let him have his sustenance from his father-in-law!”

Sukra said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks eat the flesh of animals not slain in sacrifices. Let him have sexual congress by day-time. Let him be a servant of the king!”

Jamadagni said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks study the Vedas on forbidden days or occasions. Let him feed friends at sraddhas performed by him. Let him eat at the sraddha of a Sudra!”

Sibi said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks die without having established a fire for daily worship. Let him be guilty of obstructing the sacrifices of others. Let him quarrel with those that are tapasvins!”

Yayati said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks be guilty of having sexual congress with his wife when she is not in her season and when he is himself in the observance of a vow and bears jata on his head. Let him also disregard the Vedas!”

Nahusha said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks live in grihasta after having betaken himself to the vow of sannyasa. Let him live waywardly, doing as he pleases and without restraint of any kind, even after having undergone the initiatory rites for a yagna or some other solemn vrata. Let him take pecuniary payment for imparting any branch of knowledge to disciples that they come to learn!”

Ambarisha said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks be cruel and unrighteous in his behaviour towards women and kinsmen and kine. Let him be guilty also of Brahmahatya!”

Narada said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks be one that identifies the body with the soul. Let him study the scriptures with an ignorant and sinful preceptor. Let him chant the Vedas, offending at each step against the laws. Let him flout all his elders!”

Nabhaga said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks always lie and have altercations with those that are righteous. Let him bestow his daughter in marriage after accepting a pecuniary dower offered by his son-in-law!”

Kavi said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks he guilty of kicking a sacred cow. Let him make water facing the sun. Let him turn away the person that seeks shelter from him!”

Viswamitra said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks become a servant that is deceitful towards his master. Let him be the priest of a king. Let him be the ritwik of one that should not be assisted at his sacrifices!”

Parvata said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks be the chieftain of a village. Let him make journeys on donkeys. Let him tie up dogs for a living!”

Bharadwaja said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks be guilty of all the sins that become his who is cruel in his deeds and untruthful in speech!”

Ashtaka said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks be a king destitute of wisdom, capricious and sinful in his behaviour, and disposed to rule the earth with adharma!”

Galava said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks be more infamous than a sinner. Let him be sinful in his conduct towards his kinsmen and relatives. Let him arrogantly proclaim the gifts he makes to others.”

Arundhati said, “Let her who has stolen your stalks speak ill of her mother-in-law. Let her feel disgust for her lord. Let her eat alone any good food that comes to her house.”

The Balakhilyas said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks stand on one foot at the entrance of a village to earn his subsistence. Let him, while knowing all his duties, be guilty of every breach of them!”

Sunahsakha said, “Let him who has stolen your stalks be a Brahmana that sleeps in happiness, having disregarded his daily homa. Let him, after becoming a sannyasi, behave in whatever way he pleases, without observing any restraint!’”

Surabhi said, “Let her who has stolen your stalks be milked, with her legs bound with a rope of human hair, and with the help of a calf not her own, and, while milked, let her milk be held in a vessel of white brass!”

After the Rishis and the Rajarishis had pronounced these diverse curses, the thousand-eyed lord of the Devas, filled with joy, cast his looks on the incensed Rishi Agastya. Addressing the sage, Maghavat declared what was in his mind. Listen to what Indra said in the midst of those Rishis and Rajarishis.

Sakra said, "Let him who has stolen your lotus-stalks be possessed of the punya of him who bestows his daughter in marriage upon a Brahmana who has observed the vow of brahmacharya, or who has studied the Samans and the Yajuses. Let him also have the merit of one that undergoes the final bath after completing the study of the Atharva Veda. Let him who has stolen your stalks have the merit of having studied all the Vedas. Let him be observant of all duties and righteous in his conduct. Indeed, let him go to Brahmaloka!"

Agastya said, "You have, O slayer of Bala, uttered a blessing instead of a curse. You have taken my lotus-stalks. Give them to me, for that is the eternal dharma."

Indra said, "Holy one, I did not take your stalks out of greed. Indeed, I removed them from the desire of hearing this sacred conclave recite what the dharmas are that we should observe. Do not give way to anger. Dharmas are the foremost of Srutis. Dharmas constitute the eternal path to cross over this samsara of the world. I have listened to this exalted discourse of you Rishis on the sanatana dharma that is eternal and immutable, and that transcends all change. Do you now, O foremost of learned Brahmanas, take back these stalks of yours. Mahamuni, it befits you to forgive my transgression, O you that are free from every fault."'

Bhishma continues, 'Thus addressed by the king of the Devas, Agastya Muni, who had been so wrathful, took back his stalks. Endowed with great intelligence, the Rishi became cheerful. After this, those great ones journeyed on their pilgrimage to many other sacred tirthas. Indeed, repairing to those holy waters, they performed their ablutions everywhere.

The man who reads this narrative with close attention on every Parva day, will not have to become the father of an ignorant and evil son. He will never be destitute of learning. No calamity will ever touch him. He will, besides, be free from every kind of sorrow. Decrepitude and decay will never be his. Freed from stains and evil of every kind, and endued with merit, he is sure to attain to swarga. He who studies this shastra observed by the Rishis, is certain, O prince of men, to attain to eternal Brahmaloka that is full of felicity.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'King of the Bharata vamsa, by whom was the custom of giving chatras and padukas at sraddhas introduced? Why was it introduced and for what purpose are those gifts made? They are given not only at sraddhas but also at other religious rites. They are given on many occasions with a view to acquiring religious punya. I want to know, in detail, Pitamaha, the true meaning of this custom.'

Bhishma says, 'Do you, O Kshatriya, listen attentively to what I tell you about the custom of giving away chatras and padukas at religious rites, and to how and by whom it was introduced. I shall also tell you in full, O Kshatriya, how it acquired the force of a permanent observance and how it came to be viewed as an act of punya. I will, in this regard, narrate the discourse between Jamadagni and the Mahatman Surya.

In ancient times, the illustrious Jamadagni of Bhrigu's race was engaged in practising with his bow. Taking aim, he shot arrow after arrow. His wife Renuka would pick up the shafts and bring them back to her husband, the Bhargava of blazing tejas. Pleased with the whizzing sound of his arrows and the twang of his bow, he amused himself by repeatedly discharging his arrows which Renuka brought back to him.

One day, at noontide, O monarch, in that month when the sun was in Jyesthamula, the Brahmana, having discharged all his arrows, said to Renuka, "O doe-eyed devi, go and fetch me the shafts I have shot from my bow. I would loose them again."

Renuka went on her errand but her feet and her head were scorched by the sun and she was forced to sit down in the shade of a tree. Having rested for only some moments, and fearing her husband's curse, the black-eyed and graceful Renuka quickly addressed herself again to the task of collecting and bringing back the arrows. Taking them with her, the renowned beauty came back, distressed in mind and her feet smarting with the heat that lay on the earth.

Trembling with fear, she approached her husband. The Rishi, filled with quick wrath, repeatedly cried to his exquisite wife, "Renuka, why have you been so long returning?"

Renuka said, "O you who are endowed with the wealth of tapasya, my head and feet were seared by the rays of the sun. Oppressed, I went into the shade of a tree. Only this delayed me and, knowing why I was late, my lord, do not be angry with me anymore."

Jamadagni said, "Renuka, this very hour with my astras, I will make ashes of the fiery star of day who caused you pain with his burning rays."

Drawing his unearthly bow, and invoking many terrible astras, Jamadagni stood, his face towards the sun and watching him as he moved across the sky. Kaunteya, Surya saw the Brahmana thus in wrath, and came to him in the guise of a Brahmana, and said, "What has Surya done to displease you, Jamadagni? Coursing through the firmament, he draws up the moisture from the earth, and he pours it down once more on her as nourishing rain. It is through this rain, O Dvija, that food grows for men, food that they so delight in. The Vedas say that it is food that constitutes prana, the life-breaths. O Brahmana, hidden in the clouds and irradiant, the sun drenches the seven Dwipas with wondrous showers of rain. Mighty Jamadagni, the rain he pours down becomes the sap of leaf, fruit, plant and herb, which become food.

Bhargava, the rites of birth, religious observances of every kind, investiture with the sacred thread, gifts of kine, weddings, everything used in yagnas, the very dandaneeti which rules men, dakshina, all manner of bond between man and man, and the acquisition of wealth have their origin in annrita, food. You know this well. All that is good and enjoyable in the universe, and all the efforts made by living creatures, flow from food. I only remind you of what you already know full well. Do you, therefore, O enlightened Rishi, appease your anger. What will you gain by annihilating the sun?'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'What did that greatest of ascetics, Jamadagni of awesome tejas, do when Surya the Brahmana, maker of day, spoke thus to him, as a supplicant?'

Bhishma says, 'Despite all the supplications of Surya, Jamadagni of the refulgence of Agni remained with wrath undimmed. Then, O king, Surya the Brahmana bowed his head to the sage and, with folded hands, said humbly to him, 'Maharishi, the sun is always in motion. How will you pierce the Lord of day who is continually moving?"

Jamadagni said, "With the eye of knowledge I know you to be both moving and motionless. I will surely teach you a lesson today. At midday, you seem to stay still in the sky for a moment. It is then, O Surya, that I shall pierce you with my arrows. There is no swerving from this my resolution."

Surya said "Regenerate Rishi, without doubt you know me, O best of archers. But, holy one, though I have offended you, behold, I am a suppliant for your protection."

At this, the most adorable Jamadagni smilingly addressed the maker of day, saying, "O Surya, when you have sought my protection, you have nothing to fear. He would transgress the simplicity that exists in Brahmanas, the stability in the earth, the mildness in the moon, the gravity in Varuna, the radiance in Agni, the brightness of Meru, and the heat of the sun, who would kill one who seeks his protection. The man that can slay a supplicant can well violate the bed of his preceptor, murder a Brahmana and drink wild spirits. Do you, therefore, think of some remedy for this evil, by which the people may find relief when seared by the sun."

So saying, that great descendant of Bhrigu remained silent for a while, and Surya forthwith created and made over to him a chatra, a splendid umbrella, and two padukas, a pair of sandals."

Surya said, "O Maharishi, take this umbrella with which the head may be protected from my rays. These sandals are made of leather to protect the feet. From this day forth, the gift of these two in all religious rites shall be established as an inflexible custom."

Yudhishtira, the custom of giving umbrellas and sandals was introduced by Surya Deva. O Bhaarata, these gifts are considered meritorious in the three worlds. Do you, therefore, give away umbrellas and sandals to Brahmanas. I have no doubt that you will acquire great punya by doing so. Best of the Bharatas, he who gives away a white umbrella with a hundred ribs to a Brahmana attains to eternal felicity after death and lives in the world of Indra, respected by Brahmanas, Apsaras and Devas. Mighty one, he who gives padukas to Snataka Brahmanas, as also to Brahmanas who perform the rituals of dharma, whose feet have become sore with the heat of the sun, attains to realms coveted by the very gods. Such a man dwells in happiness in the highest swarga after his death.

And so, O Bharatottama, I have told you in full the merits of giving away chatras and padukas at religious ceremonies.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Greatest of the Bharata vamsa, relate to me all the duties of the grihastasrama and tell me all that a man should do in order to attain to prosperity in this world.'

Bhishma says, 'O Bhaarata, let me narrate to you the old story of the almighty Krishna and Bhumidevi. After hymning the praises of the earth goddess, Krishna asked her this very thing that you have asked me.

Krishna said, "Having become a grihasta, what karma should I or one like me perform and how will such karma fructify in punya?"

Bhumidevi said, "O Madhava, the Rishis, the Devas, the Pitris and Manavas should be worshipped, and sacrifices should be performed, by a grihasta. Know that the Devas are always pleased with sacrifices, and men are gratified with hospitality. Therefore, the householder should satisfy them with whatever pleases them. By such karma, O Madhusudana, the Rishis also are gratified.

Abstaining from food, the grihasta should daily attend to his sacred fire and to his sacrificial offerings. By this are the Devas pleased. The grihasta should daily offer oblations of food and water, or of fruits, roots and also water, to gratify the Pitris, and the Vaiswadeva offering should be performed with boiled rice, and oblations of ghrita to Agni, Soma and Dhanvantari. He should offer separate and distinct oblations to Prajapati.

He should make his sacrificial offerings in proper order: to Yama in the south, to Varuna in the west, to Soma in the north, to Prajapati within the home, to Dhanvantari in the North-east, and to Indra in the east. He should offer food to men at the entrance to his home.

These, O Madhava, are known as the Bali offerings. The Bali should be offered to the Maruts and the Devas inside one's house. To the Viswedevas it should be offered in the open, and to the Rakshasas and Bhutas, the offerings should be made at night. After making these offerings, the householder should make offerings to Brahmanas, and if no Brahmana be present, the first portion of the food should be offered into the fire.

When a man wants to offer sraddha to his ancestors, he should, when the sraddha ceremony is concluded, gratify his ancestors and then make the Bali offerings in due order. He should then make offerings to the Viswedevas. He should next invite Brahmanas and then properly feed guests arrived at his home. Through this, O prince, are the Sadasyas satisfied. He who does not stay in the house long, or, having come, leaves after a short time, is called a Sadasya, and Atithi, a guest.

To his guru, to his father, to his friend and to a guest, a grihasta should say, 'I have this in my house to offer you today.' And he should offer it accordingly every day. The householder should do whatever they would ask him to do. This is the established custom. The householder, O Krishna, should eat last of all and only after having offered food to all of them.

The householder should worship, with offerings of madhuparka, his king, his priest, his preceptor and his father-in-law, as also Snataka Brahmanas even if they were to stay in his house for a whole year. In the morning as well as in the evening, food should be offered on the ground to dogs, swapachas and birds. This is called the Vaiswadeva offering. The householder who performs these ceremonies with a mind unclouded by passion, obtains the blessings of the Rishis in this world, and after dying he attains to swarga."

Having listened to all this from Bhumidevi, Krishna did as she had told him. Do you also do the same. By performing these duties of a householder, O king, you shall acquire fame in this world and attain to heaven after you leave it.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Of what kind is the gift of light, Pitamaha? How did this dakshina originate? What are the merits that attach to it? Tell me all this.'

Bhishma says, 'Bhaarata, listen to the ancient itihasa of the discourse between Manu, that Lord of creatures, and Suvarna. There was in days of yore an ascetic of the name Suvarna. His complexion was like that of gold and hence was he called Suvarna, the gold-complexioned. From a pure lineage, of pure character and conduct, and excellent accomplishments, he had mastered all the Vedas. Indeed, in accomplishments he surpassed many of high birth.

One day, that learned Brahmana saw Manu, the Lord of all creatures, and approached him. Meeting with each other, they exchanged the customary greetings and polite enquiries after each other's well-being. Both of them were firm in the observance of truth. They sat down on the delightful breast of Meru, great mountain of gold. Seated there, they began to converse with each other on diverse subjects connected with the great Devas and Rishis and Daityas of ancient times.

Then Suvarna said to the Svayambhuva Manu, "It behoves you to answer one question of mine for the benefit of all creatures. O Lord of all creatures, the Devas are seen to be worshipped with offerings of flowers and other fragrant things. What is this? How did this practice originate? What are the merits that attach to it? Do you discourse to me on this matter."

Manu said, “The ancient tale is told of the discourse between Sukra and the great Daitya Mahabali. Once upon a time, Sukra of Bhrigu’s race approached the presence of Bali, the son of Virochana, while the legendary Asura ruled the three worlds. The Lord of the Asuras, that giver of sacrificial dakshina in abundance, having worshipped the Bhargava with arghya, and having offering him a seat, himself sat down after his guest had seated himself. Then, this same matter that you have brought up, about the punya attaching to the offering of flowers and incense and lamps, arose. Indeed, the king of the Daityas put this high question to Sukra, that most learned of all sages.’

Bali said, ‘O foremost of all who know the Brahman, what is the punya of offering flowers and incense and lamps: pushpa, dhupa and deepa? O greatest of Brahmanas, discourse to me on this.’

Sukra said, ‘Tapa first sprang into life. Afterwards came dharma, and karuna, compassion, and the other virtues. In the interval between, many vines, creepers and plants started into life. Innumerable were the species of those. All of them have Soma for their lord. Some of these creepers and plants came to be regarded as amrita and some came to be regarded as visha, poison. Others that were neither this nor that formed yet another class. Amrita is what gives immediate gratification and joy to the mind. Visha tortures the mind exceedingly by its very odour. Know again that nectar is most auspicious and that poison is as inauspicious.

All the deciduous herbs are amrita. Visha is born of the energy of fire. Flowers gladden the mind and confer prosperity. Hence, men of righteous deeds bestowed the name Sumanas on them. That man who is in a state of purity offers flowers to the Devas finds that the gods become gratified with him, and as a consequence, bestow prosperity upon him. O king of the Daityas, those Devas to whom worshippers offer flowers, uttering their names the while, become gratified with the offers because of their devotion.

The green plants and herbs are of diverse kinds and possess diverse kinds of energy. They are classified as fierce, mild and powerful. Listen to me as I tell you which trees are useful for sacrifices and which are not. Hear, also, what malas, garlands, are agreeable to the Asuras, and which are beneficial when offered to the Devas. I shall also tell, in their due order, what garlands are agreeable to the Rakshasas, which to the Uragas, which to the Yakshas, which to Manavas, and which to the Pitris.

Flowers are of diverse kinds. Some are wild, some are from trees that grow in the midst of human habitations; some belong to trees that never grow unless planted in well-tilled soil; some are from trees growing on mountains; some are from trees that are not smooth; and some from trees that have thorns. Fragrance, beauty and taste also make for differences.

The scent that flowers yield is of two kinds, pleasant and pungent. Those flowers that exude fragrance should be offered to the Devas. The flowers of trees that are without thorns are generally white in hue. Such flowers are always acceptable to the Devas.

One possessed of wisdom should offer garlands of water flowers, such as the lotus, to the Gandharvas and Nagas and Yakshas.

Such plants and herbs as produce red flowers, as are possessed of sharp scent, and as have thorns have been laid down in the Atharvan as fit for all mantras to cause harm to enemies. Such flowers as are possessed of keen energy, as are painful to the touch, as grow on trees and plants having thorns, and as are either blood-red or black, should be offered to evil spirits and other dark, unearthly beings.

Such flowers as gladden the mind and heart, as are exquisitely soft and redolent when pressed, and as are of beautiful forms, have been said to be worthy of being offered to Manushyas, human beings.

Such flowers as grow on cemeteries and crematoria, or in places dedicated to the deities, should not be fetched and used for marriages and other rites having growth and prosperity for their object, or for acts of dalliance and pleasure in secrecy. Such flowers as are born on mountains and in vales, and as are pleasant in scent and aspect, should be offered to the Devas. Sprinkling them with sandalwood paste, such fine flowers should be duly offered according to the laws of the scriptures. The gods become gratified with the scent of flowers; the Yakshas and Rakshasas with their sight; the Nagas with their touch; and humans with all three, scent, sight and touch.

Flowers offered to the Devas gratify them immediately. They have the power to fulfil every desire by merely wishing it. When pleased with devotees offering them flowers, the Devas immediately satisfy all the desires cherished by their worshippers. Gratified themselves, they quickly gratify their worshippers. Honoured, they cause their worshippers to enjoy all honours. Disregarded and insulted, they cause those vilest of men to be ruined and consumed.

I will now speak to you of the merits that attach to the laws about the gift of dhupa, incense. Know, O prince of Asuras, that incense is of diverse kinds. Some of them are auspicious and some inauspicious. Some incense consists of natural exudations. Some are made of fragrant wood set afire. And some are artificial, being made by the hand, and of diverse substances mixed together. Their scent is of two kinds: pleasant and the opposite. Listen to more on this subject of dhupa or gandha.

All natural exudations are agreeable to the Devas. It is, however, certain that the best of all these is that of the mukula. Of all dhupas of the sari class, the agarwood is the best. It is most agreeable to the Yakshas, the Rakshasas and Nagas. The scent of the shallaki, and others of the same class, are much desired by the Daityas. Dhupas made of the perfume of the sala and the deodar, mixed with various spirits of strong scent, are, O king, ordained for human beings. Such dhupas are said to immediately gratify the Devas, the Danavas and Bhutas. Besides these, there are many other kinds of dhupas used by men of purposes of pleasure or enjoyment.

All the merits that have been spoken of as attaching to the offering of flowers should be known equally to attach to the gift of such dhupas as are satisfying.

I will now speak of the punya that attaches to the dakshina of deepam, lamps, and who may give them at what time and in what manner, and what should be the kind of lamps offered. Light is said to be energy and fame, and has an upward motion. Hence the gift of light, which is energy, enhances the tejas of men. There is a hell called Andhatamas, a place of absolute darkness. The time of dakshinayana, the sun's southward course, is also regarded as dark. For escaping that hell and the darkness of this time, one should give lamps during Uttarayana, when the sun is on his northward course. The good always laud such an offering.

Since, again, light, jyoti, has an upward course and is regarded as a cure for tamas, darkness, one should be a giver of light. Even this is the conclusion of the scriptures. It is owing to the lights offered that the Devas have become invested with beauty, energy and splendour. By abjuring light, the Rakshasas have become endowed with the opposite attributes. Hence, should one always give lamps.

By giving deepas, a man is blessed with keen vision and splendour. One that gives lamps should not be an object of jealousy with others. Lamps, again, given by others, should not be stolen or extinguished. One that steals a lamp becomes blind. Such a man has to grope through darkness in the next world and becomes devoid of splendour. He that gives lamps shines in beauty in the celestial realms even like a row of lamps.

Among deepams, the best are those in which ghee is burnt. Next in order are those in which the juice of the fruits yielded by deciduous plants is burnt. One who desires advancement and growth should never burn fat or marrow or the juice that flows from the bones of living creatures.

The man who desires advancement and felicity should always offer lamps at descents from mountains, on roads through forests and other inaccessible places, under sacred trees standing in the midst of human habitations, and at crossings of streets. The man who lights lamps always illumines his race, attains to purity of soul and radiance of form. Verily, such a man, after death, attains to the companionship of the luminaries in the firmament, the sun and the moon.

I will now speak to you upon the merits, with the fruits they bring, that attach to bali offerings made to the Devas, the Yakshas, the Uragas, human beings, Bhutas and Rakshasas. Unscrupulous and vile men that eat without first serving Brahmanas and Devas and Atithis and children, should be known as Rakshasas. Hence, one should first offer the food one has prepared to the Devas after having worshipped them duly with restrained senses and concentrated attention.

One should offer the bali to the gods, bending one's head in reverence. The Devas are always supported by food that householders offer. Verily, they bless such homes in which offerings are made to them. The Yakshas and Rakshasas and Pannagas, as also guests and all homeless persons, are supported by the food offered by grihastas. Indeed, the Devas and the Pitris derive their sustenance from such offerings. Gratified by such offerings they gratify the offerer in return with longevity, fame and wealth.

Clean food, of pleasant aroma and appearance, mixed with milk and curds, should, along with flowers, be offered to the Devas. The balis that should be offered to Yakshas and Rakshasas should be rich with blood and meat, with wine and spirits accompanying it, and adorned with coatings of fried paddy. Balis mixed with lotuses and utpalas are very agreeable to the Nagas. Sesame seeds, boiled in raw sugar, should be offered to the Bhutas, Pretas and other unearthly beings.

He who never eats any food without first serving the Brahmanas and Devas and Sadasyas, himself becomes entitled to the first portions of anna.

Such a man is endowed with bala and tejas, strength and energy. Hence, one should never take any food without first offering a portion thereof to the gods after worshipping them with reverence. One's home always blazes forth with beauty because of the household deities that live in it. Hence, he that desires his own advancement and prosperity should worship the grihadevas, the household deities, by offering them the first portion of every meal."

Even thus did the learned Kavi, Sukra of Bhrigu's race, discourse to Mahabali, the king of the Asuras. That discourse was next recited by Manu to the Rishi Suvarna; Suvarna, in his turn, recited it to Narada. The Devarishi Narada recited to me the merits that attach to the several acts of offering I have mentioned. Informed of those merits, do you, O son, perform the kriyas and karmas that I have told you about.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'I have, Pitamaha, heard what the merits are that are won by offerers of flowers and incense and lights. I have heard you speak also of the punya that attaches to a due observance of the laws in respect of the offering of the bali. O Grandsire, discourse to me once more upon this subject. Indeed, tell me again of the merits of offering incense and lamps. Why are balis offered on the ground by grihastas?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the old tale of the discourse between Nahusha and Agastya and Bhrigu. The royal sage Nahusha, possessed of the wealth of tapasya, acquired the sovereignty of swarga through his own good deeds. With restrained senses, O king, he dwelt in heaven, engaged in performing diverse karmas of both human and celestial nature. From that high-souled monarch flowed diverse kinds of human karmas and diverse kinds of celestial kriyas also, O king of men.

The diverse rites with respect to the sacrificial fire, the collection of sacred fuel and of kusa grass, as also of flowers, and the offering of bali consisting of food adorned with powdered fried paddy, and the offer of dhupa and jyoti—all these, O Rajan, occurred daily in the abode of that high-souled king while he dwelt in swarga.

Indeed, though living in heaven, he performed the sacrifice of japa, silent chanting, and dhyana, the sacrifice of meditation. And Nahusha, although he had become the king of the Devas, yet worshipped all the deities, as he used to do in days of yore, with every due rite and ceremony.

Some time passed, and then Nahusha became proud of his position as the king of all the Devas. This filled him with pride. From that time, he ceased performing the rituals and sacrifices and his japa and dhyana as well. Filled with arrogance because of the boon he had received from the Devas, Nahusha caused the very Devarishis to bear him on their shoulders.

However, from the cessation of all his spiritual and religious practices, his tejas began to sustain a diminution. The time was long for which Nahusha, filled with pride, continued to employ the greatest of Rishis, possessed of the tapodhana, as the bearers of his palanquin. He made the immortal sages discharge, by turns, this humiliating work.

The day came when it was Agastya's turn to pull the royal ratha, O Bhaarata. At that time, Bhrigu, that foremost of all Brahmagyanis, came to Agastya, while the Rishi sat in his asrama, and said, "Mahamuni, why should we patiently put up with the indignity this evil Nahusha, who has become the king of the Devas, inflicts on us?"

Agastya said, "How can I curse Nahusha, O great Rishi? You know how the boon-giving Brahma himself has granted Nahusha the highest of boons! Coming into swarga, the boon that Nahusha asked for was that whoever looked at him for even a moment would, deprived of all energy, come under his sway. The Self-born Brahma granted him even this boon, and it is for this that neither you nor I have been able to consume him with a curse. It is for this same reason that none else amongst the greatest Rishis has been able to consume or cast him down from his lofty position.

Also, my lord, Brahma gave Nahusha amrita to drink. And for that reason as well we have become powerless against him. The supreme God, it seems, gave that boon to Nahusha in order to plunge all creatures into grief. That wretch among men treats us Brahmanas vilely and sinfully. O most eloquent of all, do you tell me what I should do, and have no doubt that I will do as you say."

Bhrigu said, "It is at the command of Brahma the Grandsire that I have come to you in order to put an end to the power and sway of Nahusha who is possessed of great energy but who has been stupefied by fate.

That vile king, swollen with pride, who has become Lord of the Devas, will today yoke you to his ratha. With my urjas today will I cast him down from his position, for he has transgressed every norm and restraint. Today, in your very sight, I will re-establish the true Indra in his place, him of a hundred Aswamedhas, after bringing down the sinful Nahusha from his throne.

Today, that sinner will insult you with a kick, from his mind being afflicted by fate, which intends to cause his downfall. Incensed by the insult you will curse the wretch, that enemy of the Brahmanas, who has flouted every law of dharma, by saying, 'Be you a snake!'

Before your very eyes, O Maharishi, will I hurl Nahusha down into the world below, back to Bhumi, all his power and majesty lost from the cries of Fie on you! that will resound all around him. Truly, I shall cast Nahusha down from swarga today, that accursed sinner who is intoxicated with lordship and power. Yes, I shall indeed do this, if it be acceptable to you, O Muni!"

Thus addressed by Bhrigu, Mitravaruna's son Agastya, of unfading puissance and glory, was delighted and freed from every anxiety.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'How was Nahusha plunged into distress? How was he cast down into the world? How, indeed, was he deprived of the sovereignty of the gods? Tell me all about it, Pitamaha.'

Bhishma says, 'Even thus did those two Rishis, Bhrigu and Agastya, converse. I have already told you how Nahusha, when he first became the king of the Devas, conducted himself in a most becoming manner. Verily, all pure and wondrous deeds, both human and divine, flowed from that Mahatman Rajarishi. The offering of lamps, and every other similar rite, the due offerings of balis, and all rituals as are performed on especially sacred days—all these were properly observed by Nahusha who had become the king of the Devas.

Pious karmas are always performed by those that have wisdom, in both the world of men and that of the gods. O best of kings, if such piety is observed with regularity and steadfastness, grihastas always succeed in acquiring prosperity and advancement. Even such is the effect of the gift of lamps and of incense, as also of bowing in worship and prostrations to the gods. When food is cooked, the first portion should be offered to a Brahmana. The particular offerings called bali should also be given to the household deities. The Devas become gratified with such gifts. It is also wellknown that the measure of satisfaction which the gods derive from such offerings is a hundred times as great as that which the householder himself derives from making them. Those blessed with piety and wisdom make offerings of incense and lights, accompanying them with bowing and prostrations. These are always fraught with advancement and prosperity to those that perform them. Those rites which the learned undergo during their ablutions, using holy water, accompanied with pranama and namaskara to the gods, always contribute to the gratification of the gods. When worshipped with proper rites, the highly blessed Pitris, Rishis who own the wealth of asceticism, and the grihadevatas, the household deities, all become gratified. Filled with these thoughts and such knowledge, Nahusha, that great king, when he became the sovereign of the gods, faithfully observed all these karmas and dharmas fraught with great glory.

Shortly after, Nahusha's good fortune waned, and he began to flagrantly flout all these holy karmas and began instead to defy all restraints in the manner I have already alluded to. Because he no longer observed the laws laid down for the offerings of incense and lamps, his tejas declined rapidly. Rakshasas obstructed his yagnas and dakshinas.

It was at this time that Nahusha yoked that foremost of Rishis, Agastya, to his ratha. Nahusha of great power, smiling all the while in hubris, set that Mahamuni to the task of bearing him from the banks of the Saraswati to the place he would indicate. Even then, Bhrigu addressed the son of Mitravaruna, saying, "Do you close your eyes until I enter into the jata on your head."

And Bhrigu of unfading glory and terrific energy entered into the matted hair of Agastya, who stood still as a wooden post. Soon after, Nahusha saw Agastya approach him to carry his palanquin. Looking at the Deva king, Agastya said, "Do you yoke me to your ratha without delay. To what place shall I bear you? O Lord of the Devas, I will take you wherever you wish to go."

Nahusha had the Mahamuni Agastya yoked to his ratha. Bhrigu, who was hidden within Agastya's jata, grew pleased with what Nahusha did. He took care not to see Nahusha for he well knew the boon that Brahma had granted that king, that whoever he looked at would come under his sway. Agastya, meanwhile, though thus insulted direly by Nahusha, did not give way to wrath but stayed calm.

Then, O Bharata, the arrogant Nahusha prodded great Agastya with his goad. Still the righteous sage remained calm. Then Nahusha himself gave way to anger and kicked Agastya Muni on the head with his left foot, crying Sarpa! which meant both 'hurry' and 'snake'. No sooner was the kick delivered, than Bhrigu in Agastya's matted hair blazed up in wrath and cursed Nahusha: "You dare kick this great Muni's head? I cast you down into the world below, vain Nahusha, and become a snake as you fall, O wretched sinner of the dark heart!"

Cursed by the invisible Bhrigu, Nahusha immediately turned into a great snake and fell down onto the earth. If, Yudhishtira, Nahusha had seen Bhrigu, the sage would not have been able to curse him.

Even though he plunged down into the world below, because of all the dakshina that Nahusha had given, as also his vratas, tapasya and yagnas, he did not lose his memory but remembered everything. He then began to worship and appease Bhrigu to have redemption from the curse. Agastya, filled with compassion, joined Nahusha in pacifying Bhrigu so that the curse might see some end. At last, the wrathful Bhrigu felt pity for Nahusha and pronounced that the curse would indeed end one day.

Bhrigu said, "There will appear a king on earth named Yudhishtira, the greatest of his vamsa. He will free you from my curse." And the Maharishi Bhrigu vanished from Nahusha's sight. Having thus accomplished the work of the true Indra, performer of a hundred sacrifices, Agastya also returned to his asrama, praised and worshipped by all the grateful Brahmanas of heaven.

You freed Nahusha from Bhrigu's curse, and he rose into Brahmaloka in your very sight. As for Bhrigu, having cast Nahusha down into this world, he went to Brahma's loftiest realm and told the Pitamaha what he had done. Summoning Indra back, he said to all the Devas, 'You gods, through the boon I granted him, Nahusha acquired the sovereignty of swarga. Deprived of that power by the angry Agastya, he has been cast down into the world. Devas, you cannot live without a king. Do you once more install Indra as the king of swarga."

To the Grandsire, O son of Pritha, who said so to them, the Devas, filled with joy, replied, "So be it!" The divine Brahma installed Indra on the throne of swarga and, made king of the Devas again, Vasava shone forth once more in splendour. Even this is what transpired in days of yore, through the sin of Nahusha.

However, because of the punya he had acquired through all that he once did which was worthy, auspicious and sacred, Nahusha also regained his place in Devaloka. Hence, when evening comes and sandhya, grihastas should light lamps and give offerings of deepam. The giver of lamps is sure to acquire divine glory when he dies. Why, givers of light become as resplendent as the full moon.

The giver of lamps is blessed with beauty of form and strength for as many years as the number of moments for which the lamps given by him burn.'"

CANTO 101

"Yudhishtira says, 'Where do those foolish, wretched and sinful men go, Pitamaha, that steal or misappropriate things that belong to Brahmanas?'

Bhishma says, 'I will tell you an old tale of a conversation between a Chandala and a low Kshatriya. Listen to me.

The Kshatriya said, "Chandala, you seem to be old in years, but your behaviour seems to be that of a boy. Your body is smeared with dust raised by dogs and donkeys, but without minding that dirt, you are anxious about the little drops of vine milk that have fallen upon your person. It is plain that such deeds as are censured by the pious are ordained for the Chandala. Why, indeed, do you seek to wash off the drops of milk from your person?"

The Chandala said, "Formerly some cows belonging to a Brahmana were stolen. While they were being carried away, some milk from their udders fell upon a number of Soma plants that grew by the roadside. Those Brahmanas that drank the juice of the plants with that milk, as also the king who performed the sacrifice in which that Soma was drunk, had to fall into Naraka. Indeed, for having thus appropriated something that had belonged to a Brahmana, the king with all the Brahmanas that had assisted him had to go to hell. All those men also, Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, that drank milk or ghee or curds, in the palace of the king who had stolen the Brahmana's kine, found hell for themselves.

The stolen kine, shaking their bodies, slew with their milk the sons and grandsons of those that had stolen them, as also the king and the queen, although the latter treated the animals with great care and attention. As regards myself, O king, I used to live in the observance of the vow of brahmacharya in the place where those cows were kept after being stolen.

The food that I got by begging was sprinkled over with the milk of those kine. Because I ate that food, Kshatriya, I have, in this life, become a Chandala. The king who had stolen the kine belonging to a Brahmana found an ignominious end. Hence, one should never steal or take anything that belongs to a Brahmana. Behold to what condition I am reduced just because I ate food that had been sprinkled over with milk belonging to a Brahmana.

It is for this same reason that Soma plants are never sold by a wise man. They who sell the Soma plant are censured by the Rishis. Indeed, O son, they who buy Soma and they who sell it, both fall into the hell called Raurava when, leaving this world, they go into Yamaloka. That man who, even after knowing the Vedas, sells Soma, becomes a usurer in his next life and quickly meets with destruction. Full three hundred times he has to sink into hell and be turned into an animal that lives on human ordure.

Serving a man who is vile and low, pride, and rape committed upon a friend's wife, if weighed against one another in a balance, would show that unbridled pride is the heaviest sin. Behold this dog, so sinful and disagreeably pale and lean. He was a human being in his past life. It is through pride that living creatures attain to such miserable ends.

As for myself, I was born into a large and noble family, in a past life, O Kshatriya, and I was a thorough master of all branches of knowledge and all the sciences. I knew the gravity of all these faults, but influenced by pride, I became blinded and ate the meat attached to the vertebrae of animals. It is for that sin that I have devolved to this condition.

Ah, look at the reverses brought by Time. Like one whose cloth has taken fire at one end, or who is pursued by bees, look, I run here and there, pierced through by fear, and smeared with dirt. They that lead the domestic life are saved from all sins by a study of the Vedas, as also by gifts of other kinds, as they have been declared by the wise. O Kshatriya, a Brahmana who is a sinner is saved from all his sins by studying the Vedas, if he betakes himself to the vanaprastha and abstains from attachment of every kind.

O great Kshatriya, I find myself in this life of a Chandala, born into a dark and sinful order. I fail to see clearly how I can wash myself of all my sins. Because of some punya I did in a past life, I have not lost the memory of my previous lives. O king, I throw myself on your mercy. I beg you, resolve my bewilderment. By what auspicious course can I hope to free myself from this horrible fate? O best of men, by what means can I be rid of being a Chandala?”

The Kshatriya said, “Know, O Chandala, the means by which you may be able to find your redemption. By sacrificing your prana, your life-breath, for the sake of a Brahmana you can attain what you seek. By sacrificing your body in the fire of battle as a libation to the beasts and birds of prey, for the sake of a Brahmana, you can achieve mukti. By no other means will you find success.”

Thus addressed, that Chandala, O scorcher of your foes, poured his prana as a libation into the fire of battle, for the sake of protecting a Brahmana’s wealth, and as the consequence of that deed attained to a most desirable end. Hence, son, you must always protect the property of Brahmanas, if, Mahabaho, you wish for an end that is eternal felicity.’

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, it has been said that all pious men attain to the same realm after death. Is it true, O Bhaarata, that there is difference of position or status among them?'

Bhishma says, 'With different deeds, son of Pritha, men attain to different realms. They who are righteous attain to regions of felicity, while they who are sinful attain to regions that are full of misery. Listen to the old story of the discourse, son, between Rishi Gautama and Vasava.

A Brahmana of the name of Gautama, mild and self-restrained and with all his senses under complete control, saw a baby elephant that had lost his mother and that was grief-stricken. Full of daya, and steadfast in the observance of his vows, the ascetic nursed that infant animal. After a long time, the little creature grew up into a large and mighty elephant.

One day, Indra, assuming the form of King Dhritarashtra, seized that elephant which was as big as a hill and from whose rent temples the juice of musth trickled. Seeing the elephant dragged away, Maharishi Gautama addressed King Dhritarashtra and said, "Ungrateful Dhritarashtra, do not rob me of this elephant. I look upon him as a son and I have reared him with great effort and care. It is said that between the righteous, friendship springs up if they exchange just seven words. You should be careful, O king, that the sin of wounding a friend does not touch you. It does not become you, O king, to forcibly take this elephant, who brings me my fuel and water, that protects my asrama when I am away, who is docile and obedient to his master, who is mindful of obeying his preceptor in all things, who is mild and well-tamed, and who is grateful and very dear to me. Indeed, you must not take him from me, ignoring my protests and cries."

Dhritarashtra said, "I shall give you a thousand kine, a hundred maid-servants, and five hundred pieces of gold. I shall also, O great Rishi, give you diverse other kinds of wealth. What use can Brahmanas have for elephants?"

Gautama said, "Keep, O king, your kine and maid-servants and coins of gold and gemstones and diverse other kinds of wealth. What, Rajan, have Brahmanas to do with wealth?"

Dhritarashtra said, "Brahmana have no use for elephants. Verily, learned Brahmana, elephants are meant for Kshatriyas. I cannot be considered as sinning by taking this elephant for my royal mount. Do not continue to obstruct me, Gautama."

Gautama said, "Illustrious king, even if I have to go to Yamaloka where the righteous live in joy and the sinful in grief, I shall take this elephant of mine from you."

Dhritarashtra said, "They that are without deeds of punya, they that have no faith and unbelievers, they that are of sinful souls and are always engaged in gratifying their senses—only they have to go to Yama's world and endure the suffering that he inflicts. I, Dhritarashtra, shall go to a higher realm, and not to Yamaloka."

Gautama said, "Yamaloka is such that men are there sternly controlled. No untruth can be told there. Only truth prevails in that place. There the weak persecute the strong. Going there, I will force you to yield up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "Only those that, intoxicated with pride, behave towards their eldest sister and father and mother as towards enemies, have to repair, O great ascetic, to such a realm. I shall go to a higher world. Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not have to go to Yamaloka."

Gautama said, "The realm of Kubera Vaisravana, called Mandakini, is attained by the highly blessed whom every joy and comfort await there. There Gandharvas and Yakshas and Apsaras live, gladdening all the denizens with enchanting music and dance. Repairing even there, O king, I will force you to yield up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "Those who regard hospitality to guests as a vrata, who observe other goodly vows, who give shelter to Brahmanas, and who eat what remains after all those that are dependent upon them, find Kubera's Mandakini. I shall not go there, for a higher world awaits me."

Gautama said, "If you attain to those forests of every enchantment, mantled with flowers, that grow on the summit of Meru, that echo with melodious voice of Kinnaris, and are graced with beautiful jambus of wide-spreading branches, I will come even there and force you to give up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "Brahmanas that are of mild dispositions, that are devoted to truth, that possess great learning in the scriptures, are compassionate to all creatures, that study the Puranas with all the Itihasas, that pour libations on the sacred fire and make gifts of honey to Brahmanas, repair to such realms, Rishi. I shall go to a world that is higher. Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not go to the summit of Meru but further. If you know of any other loftier world of great renown and felicity, speak to me of it, for even there shall I go."

Gautama said, "If you go to the forests that belong to Narada, which he holds dear, which are adorned with rare flowers, which echo with the melodious songs of the prince of Kinnaras, and which are the eternal abode of Gandharvas and Apsaras, I shall follow you there and force you to give up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "They who never beg for alms, they who cultivate music and dancing, and always rove about in joy, attain to such realms. Rishi, I shall repair to a world that is higher. Dhritarashtra will not have to go to Narada vana!"

Gautama said, "If you go to that realm where the Uttara-Kurus blaze in beauty and pass their days in gladness, O king, in the company of the very Devas; where those beings that have their origin in fire, those that have their origin in water, and those that come from mountains, dwell in bliss, and where Sakra rains down the fruition of every wish, and where women live in perfect freedom, unrestrained by rules of any kind regulating them, and where there is no jealousy between the sexes—even there will I come and force you to give up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "Men that are free from desire for all things of pleasure, that abstain from meat, that never take up the rod of chastisement, and never inflict the least harm on creatures chala and achala, mobile and unmoving, that have made themselves the soul of all creatures, that are entirely free from ego, that have cast off attachments of every kind, that regard gain and loss, as also praise and blame, as equal—only those men, O Maharishi, attain to such realms. I shall find a higher world. Dhritarashtra shall not go the world of the Uttara-Kurus."

Gautama said, "Next to these blaze in beauty those eternal regions, redolent with divine fragrance, which are free from passions of every kind and that are without sorrow. These are the realms the Lord Soma. If you go even to Somaloka, I will thence and force you to give up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "Men that always make gifts without receiving any in return, who never accept any service from others, who own nothing which they cannot give to a deserving person, who are hospitable to all creatures, who are inclined to show grace to everyone, who have forgiving dispositions, who never speak ill of others, who protect all creatures by throwing over them the shroud of compassion, and who are always righteous in their conduct—only such men, O great Rishi, attain to Soma's world. I will find a higher realm. Dhritarashtra shall not go to Somaloka."

Gautama said, "Above those blaze in beauty other worlds that are eternal, free from passion and darkness and sorrow, and that lie at the feet of the sun god. If you go even to Suryaloka, I will come there and force you to yield up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "Men who are attentive to the study of the Vedas, are devoted to the service of their gurus, who perform tapasya and keep stern vratas, who are firm in truth, who never utter a word that hints of disobedience or enmity towards their preceptors, who are always alert, and ever ready in their service to elders and teachers—they go, great Rishi, to such worlds, they that are pure, have purified souls, are of restrained speech, that are unwavering in dharma, and masters of the Vedas. But I shall attain to a higher world. Verily, Dhritarashtra shall not go to Suryaloka."

Gautama said, "Beyond Surya, are the eternal regions that blaze with beauty, that are supremely fragrant, are free from passion, and that are free from every sorrow. They are the abode of the Mahatman Lord Varuna. If you go even there, I will follow you and force you to yield up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "Men who worship the Devas by keeping the Chaturmasya vrata, who perform a hundred and ten sacrifices, that pour libations every day on their sacred fire with devotion and faith for three years in perfect accord with the laws declared in the Vedas, bear without flinching the burden of all dharma, walk steadily along the way trodden by the righteous, that immaculately sustain the conduct followed men of dharma—only they find such realms. I shall find a higher world. Dhritarashtra shall not go to the world of Varuna."

Gautama said, "Above them are the regions of Indra of awesome tejas, worlds free from passion and sorrow, which are difficult of access and coveted by all men. Even if you attain to Indraloka, I will come there and force you to give up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "He who lives for a hundred years, who is imbued with heroism, who studies the Vedas, and who performs sacrifices with devotion—such men attain to the world of Sakra. I shall find a higher world. Dhritarashtra shall not go to Indraloka."

Gautama said, "Above Indra's swargas are the lokas of the Prajapatis, worlds of transcendent felicity abounding in every ecstasy, and where sorrow never comes. Belonging to those powerful ones from whom all creation has sprung, they are coveted by all souls. Even if you go there, I will follow you and force you to give up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "Kings that have performed the Avabhrita Snana, the concluding ablution upon the completion of the Rajasuya sacrifice, that are endowed with righteous souls, that have protected their subjects perfectly, and that have washed their limbs with sanctified water upon the completion of the Aswamedha yagna, repair to such realms. Dhritarashtra shall not go there."

Gautama said, "Next to those, blaze the eternal realms of sublime redolence, free from passion, and transcending all sorrow. That is Goloka, the world of kine, difficult of attainment, where no grief or oppression goes. Even if you gain Goloka, I will come there and force you to yield up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "He who, owning thousand kine, gives away a hundred kine every year, or owning a hundred kine gives away ten every year, or owning only ten or even five kine gives away one cow, and they who attain to a mature old age practising the vows of brahmacharya all their days, who obey all the declarations of the Vedas, and who, with great tejas of spirit, betake themselves to pilgrimages to sacred waters and shrines, dwell in felicity in the world of kine. They who journey to Prabhasa and Manasa, the lakes of Pushkara, the large lake Mahatsara, the sacred forests of Naimisa, Bahuda, Karatoya, Ganga, Gayasiras, Vipasa, Sthulavaluka, Krishna, the five rivers of the Punjab, the vast lake Mahahrada, Gomati, Kausiki, Champa, Saraswati, Drisadwati and Yamuna—indeed, those illustrious Brahmanas, steadfast in the observance of vows, who go to these sacred waters, attain to the regions of which you speak. Endowed with divine bodies and adorned with celestial garlands those blessed ones, always exuding the most ethereal fragrances, repair to those regions of joy and gladness. Dhritarashtra shall not go there."

Gautama said, "Beyond these, are worlds where there is no fear of the least cold or heat, no hunger, no thirst, no pain, no sorrow, no joy, no one that is agreeable or disagreeable, no friend, and no enemy; where decrepitude and death are not, and where there is neither righteousness nor sin. Going even to that realm which is freed from every passion, which wells with equable happiness, and where there is wisdom and the guna of only sattva—verily, even if you attain to sacred Brahmaloka, I will come there and force you to give up this elephant to me."

Dhritarashtra said, "They who are freed from all attachments, who are possessed of cleansed souls, who are steady in the observance of the foremost vows, who are devoted to the yoga that depends on stilling the mind, and who have in this life attained to the happiness of swarga—those wedded to the sattva guna—attain to the sacred world of Brahma. O Maharishi, you will not find Dhritarashtra there."

Gautama said, "Where the best of rathantaras is sung, where altars are strewn with sacred kusa blades, for the performance of Pundarika sacrifices, there where Soma-drinking Brahmanas go on chariots drawn by supernal steeds—if you go even thence, I will come there and force you to give up this elephant."

Now Gautama paused, then, a smile dawning on his lustrous face, said, "I believe that you are none other than the slayer of Vritra, the god who has performed a hundred sacrifices, and are ranging through all the mandalas of the universe. I hope I have not, through the weakness of my mind, not recognising you, committed any fault by anything that I have said to you."

The god of a hundred sacrifices said, "I am Maghavat. I came to the world of men to seize this elephant. I bow to you. Do you command me. I shall accomplish all that you may be pleased to ask."

Gautama said, "Do you give me, O Devaraja, this white elephant that is so young, for he is only ten years of age. I have brought him up as a child of my own. Dwelling in these forest, so has grown under my eye and has been a dear companion to me. Do you free my child that you have seized and wish to drag away."

Indra of a hundred sacrifices said, "This elephant that has been a son to you, O Brahmanottama, comes to you looking wistfully at you. Behold, he sniffs your feet with his trunk. My salutations to you. Do you pray for my welfare."

Gautama said, "King of the Devas, I do always think of your good. I always offer you worship. Do you also, O Sakra, bestow your blessings on me. Given by you, I accept this elephant."

Indra said, "Amongst all those greatest Mahatman Rishis that firmly adhere to truth and that have the Vedas planted in their heart, you alone have been able to recognise me. And for this I am exceedingly pleased with you. Do you, therefore, O Brahmana, come with me quickly, along with this your son. You deserve to attain to diverse regions of great felicity without the delay of even a single day."

Having said these words, the Vajradharin set Gautama before him, along with his son, that white elephant, and flew up into swarga, which is difficult of attainment by even the righteous.

He who would listen to this Itihasa every day or would recite it, restraining his senses the while, attains to Brahmaloka even as Gautama did.'"

CANTO 103

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have discoursed to us on diverse kinds of gift, on the tranquillity of the soul, on Truth, on compassion, on contentment with one's wedded wife, and the merits of dakshina. It is known to you, Pitamaha, that there is nothing to equal tapasya to acquire punya. It befits you now to expound to me what constitutes the highest tapasya.'

Bhishma says, 'Yudhishtira, one attains to a realm of felicity that corresponds to the kind of penances that one undertakes. I hold, O son of Kunti, that there is no penance that is superior to fasting, abstaining from food. Listen to the ancient narrative of the discourse between Bhagiratha and the illustrious Brahma.

I have heard, O Bhaarata, that Bhagiratha attained to that world which transcends that of the Devas, of kine and of the Rishis. Seeing this, O monarch, the Pitamaha Brahma said to Bhagiratha, "How, O Bhagiratha, have you attained to this world that is so difficult of attainment? Not the Devas, or Gandharvas, or Manavas succeed in coming here without having practised the severest austerities. How have you attained to this realm?"

Bhagiratha said, "I used to make gifts of hundreds of thousands of gold coins to Brahmanas, observing the Brahmacharya vrata all the while, but it is not through the punya of those gifts, O Greatest, that I have attained to this world. I performed the Ekaratra sacrifice ten times, and the Pancharatra yagna as many times. The Ekadasaratra I performed eleven times. The great sacrifice of Jyotishtoma I did a hundred times. It is not, however, through the merits of those sacrifices that I have attained to this world of felicity.

For a hundred years, I lived continuously beside the holy Jahnavi, all the while practising the severest austerities. There I made gifts to Brahmanas of thousands of male and female slaves. By the side of the Pushkara lakes, I gave dakshina to the Brahmanas, a hundred thousand times, of a hundred thousand steeds, and two hundred thousand kine. I also gave away a thousand damsels of great beauty, each adorned with golden moons, and sixty thousand more decked with opulent ornaments of pure gold. It is not, however, through the punya of those deeds that I have succeeded in attaining to these realms.

O Lord of the universe, performing those sacrifices known as Gosava, I gave away ten arbudas of kine, giving each Brahmana ten kine, each one with her calf, and each of whom yielded milk at the time, and with each of whom were given a vessel of gold and one of white brass for milking her. Performing many Soma sacrifices, I gave away to each Brahmana ten cows each of whom yielded milk, and each of whom had brought forth only her first calf, besides giving gifts to them of hundreds of Rohini cows. I also gave away to Brahmanas twice ten prayutas of other kine, all milk yielding. It is not through the merit of those gifts, O Brahma, that I have succeeded in attaining to this realm of bliss.

I also gave away a hundred thousand horses of the Balhika breed, all white of complexion, and adorned with garlands of gold. It is not, however, through the merits of those gifts that I have attained to this exalted world. I gave away eight crores of golden coins to Brahmanas, and then another ten crores also, at every yagna that I performed. It is not, however, through the merits of those that I have attained to this region of felicity.

I also gave away ten and then seven crores of fine steeds, O Grandsire, each of green complexion, each having ears that were dark, and each adorned with garlands of gold. I also gave away ten and seven thousand elephants of huge size, of tusks as big as ploughares, each having the whorls on its body which are called padmas, and each adorned with garlands of gold. I gave away ten thousand chariots, Pitamaha, made entirely of gold, and which were adorned with diverse golden ornaments. I also gave away seven thousand other chariots with magnificent horses yoked. All the horses were caparisoned in golden adornments. Those rathas represented the dakshinas of a sacrifice and were of exactly that kind indicated in the Vedas.

At the ten great Vajapeya yagnas that I performed, I gave away a thousand horses, each as powerful as Indra himself, judged by their prowess and the sacrifices they had performed. Spending a vast sum of money, O Brahma, and performing eight Rajasuya sacrifices, I gave away to the Brahmanas that officiated at them a thousand kings and their kingdoms, their necks draped with garlands of gold, after having vanquished all those Kshatriyas in battle. It is not, however, through the merits of those deeds that I have attained to this transcendent realm.

At those sacrifices, O Lord of the universe, the dakshina that flowed from me was as copious as the stream of Ganga herself. To each Brahmana I gave two thousand elephants decked with gold, as many horses caparisoned with golden ornaments, and a hundred villages of the best kind. Verily, I gave these to each Brahmana three times in succession. Living in tapasya, subsisting on a frugal diet, adopting tranquillity of mind, and restraining my speech, I dwelt for a long time on the breast of Himavat by the side of that Ganga whose irresistible cataract as she fell from heaven Mahadeva bore on his head, and contained. It is not through the merit of these pious observances, O Pitamaha, that I have attained to this region.

Casting the Sami twig, I adored the gods in myriads of such sacrifices as are completed in a single day, and such others as take twelve days for their completion, and others still as can be completed in three and ten days, besides many Pundarikas. I have not attained to this rarest realm through the punya of any of those sacrifices.

I gave Brahmanas eight thousand white bulls, each graced with a magnificent hump, and each having one of its horns covered with gold. I also gave them beautiful wives whose necks were adorned with chains of gold. I also gave away great heaps of gold and wealth of every other kind. Verily, I gave away hillocks of gemstones and other precious things. Villages in thousands teeming with wealth and corn, also I gave. With all my senses about me, I gave away to the Brahmanas a hundred thousand cows, each of whom had brought forth only her first calf, at the many great sacrifices I performed. It is not, however, through the merits of those deeds that I have attained to this supreme realm.

I adored the Devas in a sacrifice that is completed in eleven days. Twice I worshipped them in sacrifices that are completed in twelve days. I adored them also, many a time, in Aswamedha yagnas. Six and ten times I performed the Arkayana yagna. It is not through the punya of those that I have attained to this condition.

I also gave to each Brahmana a forest of golden kanchana trees extending for a yojana on every side, and with each tree hung with jewellery and gems of every kind. It is not through the merits of that karma that I have attained to this region. For thirty years, with my heart perfectly free from anger, I observed the Turayana vrata that bestows the most superior merit, and every day gave away to Brahmanas nine hundred kine. Lord of the universe, every one of those was a Rohini cow, and yielded milk at the time I gave them away. It is not through the merits of those deeds, O Brahma, that I have attained to this world.

I worshipped thirty fires every day, Pitamaha. I adored the Devas in eight sacrifices in which the fat of all species of animals was poured on the fire. I adored them with seven sacrifices in which the fat of humans was poured on the fire. I worshipped them in a thousand and twenty-eight Viswajita yagnas. It is not through the merits of those sacrifices, O Lord of all the Gods, that I have attained to this realm.

On the banks of the Sarayu and the Bahuda and Ganga, as also in the forest of Naimisa, I gave away millions of kine to the best Brahmanas. It is not through the merits of those gifts that I have attained to this region.

Indra knew about the vow of upavasa, fasting; he, however, kept it a secret. Sukra, of Bhrigu's line, gained knowledge of it with atmadrishti, spiritual vision, he acquired through tapasya. Blazing with tejas as he does, it is Usanas who first made upavasa known to the universe. I observed that vrata, O boon-giving Lord! When I accomplished that highest vow, the Brahmanas all became gratified with me. A thousand Rishis came to me, and all of them said, 'Do you, Bhagiratha, attain to Brahmaloka!' It is only from keeping upavasa, the vow of fasting, that I succeeded in attaining to this world of the highest felicity. There is no doubt in this, O Lord.

Asked by you, the Supreme Ordainer of all things, I have duly expounded the punya that accrues from fasting. In my opinion, there is no penance higher than fasting. I swear this to you, O Greatest of all the Gods. Be you propitious to me."

Having said all this, King Bhagiratha was honoured by Brahma himself with every due rite. Do you, therefore, Yudhishtira, observe upavasa, the vow of fasting and worship the Brahmanas every day. The blessing uttered by Brahmanas can accomplish everything, both here and hereafter. Indeed, the Brahmanas should ever be gratified with gifts of clothes, food and fine white kine, and excellent homes and mansions. The very Devas should gratify the Brahmanas. Freeing yourself from greed, practise this vow of the most superior punya that is not known to all.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Man, it is said, is endowed with a span of life which extends for a hundred years, and with energy and strength that are considerable. Why then, Pitamaha, do humans die even when they are very young? By what does a man become long-lived, and by what is his life shortened? Through what does a man acquire the fame that rests upon great achievements? Through what does one attain to wealth and prosperity? Is it by tapasya, or brahmacharya, or the silent japa of sacred mantras, or with the help of herbs and drugs? Is it by his actions, or speech? Explain to me this, O Grandsire!'

Bhishma says, 'I shall tell you what you ask. Indeed, I will tell you what the reason is, for which one becomes short-lived, and the reason for which one is blessed with a long life. I will also explain to you the reason for which one succeeds in acquiring the fame that rests on great achievements, and the reason for which one succeeds in acquiring wealth and prosperity. Indeed, I shall enlighten you about the manner in which a man must live in order to be given all that is beneficial to him.

It is by vyavahara, conduct, that one acquires longevity, and it is by vyavahara, also, that one acquires wealth and prosperity. Indeed, it is through one's conduct that one acquires the fame that rests upon great achievements, both here and hereafter.

The man whose conduct is improper or evil never has a long life. All creatures become afraid of such a man and are oppressed by him. If, therefore, one wishes one's own advancement and prosperity, one should, in this world, betake oneself to conduct that is proper and good. Good conduct succeeds in dispelling the inauspiciousness and misery of even one that is sinful. Dharma has vyavahara for its indication. They that are good and righteous are so because of the neeti they follow. The indications, again, of good neeti are afforded by the actions of those that are good and righteous. People esteem that man who acts righteously and who does good even if they only hear of him without actually seeing him.

They that are disbelievers, professed atheists, they that are without all karma, they that are disobedient to preceptors and transgress the injunctions of the scriptures, they that are unacquainted with and, so, unobservant of duties, and they that are of evil conduct, become short-lived. They that are of improper behaviour, they that transgress all restraints, they that are unscrupulous in sexual congress, become short-lived here and find hell for themselves hereafter.

Those men live for a hundred years who, though without any accomplishments, betake themselves to propriety and righteousness of neeti and thus become endowed with faith and are freed from malice. He that is free from anger, who is truthful in speech, who never does any injury to any creature in the universe, who is without malice, crookedness and insincerity, succeeds in living for a hundred years. He who always breaks little clods of earth, or tears up the grass that grows under his feet, or bites his nails off with his teeth, or is always impure, or very restless, never succeeds in living long.

One should wake from sleep at the hour known as the Brahma muhurta and then think of both dharma and artha. Getting out of bed, one should wash one's face and rinse one's mouth in achamana, and joining one's hands in an attitude of reverence, say the morning prayers. In this way, also, when dusk falls, should one say one's evening prayers, sandhya vandana, not speaking to anyone at the time.

One should never look at the rising sun, or at the setting sun. Nor should one look at the sun when he is in eclipse; nor at his image in the water; nor at midday when he is at his zenith. The Rishis, adoring the two sandhyas, the twilights of dawn and dusk, with regularity, succeeded in attaining longevity. Hence, one should, restraining speech, say one's prayers regularly at the two sandhyas.

As for Brahmanas that do not say their sandhya vandana at the two twilights, a righteous king should set them to such tasks as are ordained for Sudras. Men of every varna should never have sexual congress with the wives of others. There is nothing that shortens life so effectually as sexual congress with other men's wives. For as many thousands of years shall the adulterer have to live in hell as the number of pores on the bodies of the women with whom he commits the sin.

One should dress one's hair, apply kohl to one's eyes, and clean one's teeth, as also worship the Devas, all in the forenoon. One should not look at urine or faeces, or tread on it or touch it with one's feet. One should not set out on a journey at dawn, or at midday, or in the evening sandhya, or with an unknown companion, or with a Sudra, or alone. While travelling along a road, one should, standing aside, always make way for a Brahmana, for kine, for kings, for an old man, for one who is carrying a burden, for a woman quick with child, or for a weak person.

When one comes upon a large tree that is familiar and known to be auspicious, one should walk around it in pradakshina. One should also, coming to an intersection where four roads meet, walk around it before pursuing one's journey. At midday, or at midnight, or at night in general, or at the two sandhyas, one should not go to charusars, places where four roads meet. One should never wear sandals or clothes that have been worn by another.

One should always observe the vow of brahmacharya, and should never cross one's legs. One should observe the vow of brahmacharya on the day of the new moon, as also on that of the full moon, as also on the eighth lunar day of both fortnights. One should never eat the flesh of animals not killed in sacrifice. One should never eat the flesh from the back of an animal. One should avoid censuring and calumniating others, as also all other kinds of deceitful behaviour.

One should never pierce others with word shafts. Indeed, one should never utter any cruel speech. One should never accept a gift from a man who is low and vulgar. One should never utter such words as trouble others or are inauspicious or are sinful. Wordy arrows can fly from the mouth. Pierced by them, the victim grieves day and night. The man of wisdom never looses them for they pierce the very vitals of others. A forest, pierced with shafts or cut down with the axe, grows again. The man, however, who is pierced with words unwisely spoken, becomes the victim of wounds that fester and lead to death. Barbed arrows and nalikas and broad-headed shafts can be extracted from the body. Arrows of words, however, cannot be removed for they lie embedded in the very heart.

One should not taunt a person that is defective of a limb or who has a limb in excess, or one that is without learning, or one who is miserable, or one that is ugly or poor, or one that is without strength. One should avoid atheism, calumny against the Vedas, censuring the Devas, malice, pride, arrogance and harshness. One should not, in wrath, take up the rod of chastisement for laying it upon another. Only the son or the pupil, it has been said, may be mildly punished, for instruction.

One should not speak ill of Brahmanas; nor should one point at the stars with one's fingers. If asked, one should not say what the lunation is on a particular day. By telling it, one's life is shortened. Having answered calls of nature or having walked on a public road, one should wash one's feet. One should also wash one's feet before sitting down to recite the Vedas or to eat. These are the three things which are regarded as pure and sacred by the gods and fit for the Brahmana's use—that which has no impurity, that which has been washed in water, and that which has been well spoken of.

One should never cook samyava, krisara, mamsa, sashakuli and payasa for oneself. Whenever cooked, these should be offered to the Devas. Every day one must attend to one's sacred fire. One should give alms every day. One should, restraining speech the while, clean one's teeth with the neem twig. One should never be in bed when the sun is up. If one fails any day to be up with the sun, one should perform an expiation. Rising from bed, one should first salute one's parents, and preceptors, or other elders deserving of respect. By so doing, one attains to long life. The neem twig should be thrown away when done with, and a new one should be used every day.

One should eat only such food as is not forbidden in the scriptures, and abstain from food of every kind on days of the new and full moon. One should, with senses restrained, answer calls of nature, facing the north. One should not worship the Devas without having first cleaned one's teeth and rinsed one's mouth. Without worshipping the gods, one should never go to meet anyone save one's guru, or one old in years, or a righteous man, or a wise one.

They that are wise should never see themselves in an unpolished or dirty mirror. One should never have sexual congress with an unknown woman or with a pregnant one. One should never sleep with the head pointing towards the north or the west. One should not lie upon a bed that is broken or rickety. One should not sleep on a bed without having examined it first with a light. One should not sleep on a bed with anyone beside one.

One should never sleep in a transverse direction. One should never make a compact with atheists or do anything with them.

One should never drag a seat with one's foot and then sit on it.

One should never bathe naked, or at night. An intelligent man should never suffer his limbs to be rubbed or pressed after bathing. He should never smear lotions upon his body without having first bathed. Having bathed, one should never wave one's cloth in the air to dry it. One should never wear wet clothes; never remove from one's body the garlands of flowers one may wear. Nor should one wear such garlands over one's outer garments.

One should never even talk to a woman during her period. One should not answer a call of nature in a field where crops are grown, or in a place too near an inhabited village. One should never answer a call of nature in a water body of any kind. One should first wash one's mouth thrice with water before eating. Having finished one's meal, one should wash one's mouth thrice with water, and then twice again.

One should eat, with face turned eastwards, silently, and without finding fault with the food. One should always leave a remnant of the food that is set before one. Having finished one's meal, one should touch fire in one's mind. If one eats with one's face turned eastwards, one is blessed with longevity. By eating facing southwards, one acquires great fame. By eating facing the west, one acquires great wealth. By eating with face turned northwards, one becomes truthful in speech.

Having finished one's meal, one should wash one's mouth and face with water. Similarly, all the limbs, the navel, and the palms of the hands should be washed with water. One should never seat oneself upon husk of corn, or upon hair, or upon ashes, or bones. One should, on no account, use the water that has been used by another to wash or bathe.

One should always perform the homa for propitiating the Devas, and recite the Savitri mantra. One should always eat while seated. One should never eat while standing or walking. One should never answer a call of nature in a standing posture. One should never answer a call of nature on ashes or in a cow-pen. One should wash one's feet before sitting down to one's meal. One should never sit or lie down to sleep with wet feet. He who sits down to his meal after having washed his feet, lives for a hundred years.

One should never touch three things of great energy, without purifying oneself—fire, a cow, or a Brahmana. By observing this rule, one acquires longevity. One should not, while impure, cast one's gaze upon three things of great energy—the sun, the moon and the stars.

The life-breaths of a young man travel upwards when an old and venerable person comes to his home. He gets them back by standing up and properly saluting the guest. Old men should always be saluted. One should offer them seats with one's own hand. After the elder has taken his seat, one should sit down oneself and remain with hands joined in reverence. When an old man walks along a road, one should always follow him and never walk ahead.

One should never sit on a torn or broken chair. One should throw away a broken vessel of white brass, never using it again. One should never eat without a piece of upper garment clothing one's body. One should never bathe naked. One should never sleep naked. One should never so much as touch the remains on other people's dishes and plates after they have eaten.

One should never, while unclean, touch another's head, for it is said in the scriptures that the life-breaths are all concentrated in the head. One should never strike another on the head or seize him by the hair. One should not join one's hands together to scratch one's head. One should not, while bathing, repeatedly dip one's head in water. By doing so, one shortens one's life. He who has bathed by dipping his head in water should not, afterwards, apply oil to any part of his body. One should never eat a meal without eating some sesame.

One should never teach the Vedas or any scriptures at a time before bathing. Nor should one study while one is not clean. When a storm rises or a malodour fills the air, one should never think of the Vedas. Those conversant with ancient history recite a gatha sung by Yama in days of old. He that runs while unclean or studies the Vedas, indeed, that regenerate Brahman who studies the Vedas at forbidden times, loses his Vedas and shortens his life. Hence, one should never study the Vedas with attention at forbidden hours.

They who answer a call of nature, with their face towards the sun, or towards a blazing fire, or towards a cow, or towards a Brahmana, or on the road, become short-lived. At daytime both calls of nature should be answered while facing north. At night, those calls should be answered facing the south. By doing this, a man does not shorten his life. He that wishes to live long should never disrespect or insult any of these three, however weak or emaciated they may appear to be—a Brahmana, a Kshatriya and a snake. All three are endowed with virulent poison. The snake, if angry, burns up the victim with only a glance of its eyes. The Kshatriya also, if angry, consumes the object of his wrath with his tejas as soon as he looks at him. The Brahmana, stronger than any of these two, destroys not only the object of his anger but his whole race as well, not through his eyes alone but even with a thought. The man of wisdom should, therefore, tend to these three with care.

One should never engage in any disputation with one's preceptor. O Yudhishtira, if the guru becomes angry, he should always be pacified by every honourable means. Even if the guru happens to be entirely wrong, one should still follow and honour him. Without doubt, calumny against the preceptor always consumes the lives of those that utter them.

A man should always answer a call of nature in a place at some remove from his home. He should wash his feet at a distance from his home, and also always throw away the remnants of his food at a remove from his home. Truly, he who desires his own good should do all these.

One should not wear garlands of red flowers. They who are possessed of wisdom should wear garlands of flowers that are white in hue. Rejecting the lotus and the lily, O you of great might, one may wear on one's head, however, a flower that is red, even if it be a water bloom. A garland of gold can never become impure. After one has bathed, O king, one should use perfumes mixed with water. One should never wear one's upper garment to cover the lower limbs or the lower garments to cover the upper ones. Nor should one wear clothes worn by another. One should not, again, wear a piece of cloth that has not its proper border. When one goes to bed, O king, one should wear a different cloth. When making a journey also, one should wear a different cloth. So also, when worshipping the gods, one should wear a different cloth.

The man of intelligence should smear his limbs with unguents made of priyangu, chandana, bilwa, tagara and kesara. In observing a fast, one should first purify oneself by bathing, and adorn one's person with ornaments and lotions. One should always abstain from sexual congress on days of the full moon and the new moon.

One should never, O monarch, eat off the same plate with another even if that other happens to be of one's own or equal rank. Nor should one ever eat any food that has been prepared by a woman in her period. One should never eat any food, or drink any drink whose essence has been removed. Nor should one eat anything without giving a portion to persons that wistfully gaze at the food that one has.

The man of intelligence should never sit close to one that is impure. Nor should one sit close to persons that are of burning piety. All food that is forbidden in ritual acts should never be eaten, even on other occasions. The fruits of the sacred fig tree and the banyan, as also the leaves of the sun hemp, and the fruits of the athi tree should never be eaten by one who is desirous of his own good. The flesh of goats, of cows and the peacock, should never be eaten. One should also abstain from dried flesh and all meat that is stale. The man of intelligence should never eat any salt, by taking it up with his hand. Nor should he eat curds and the flour of fried barley at night. One should abstain from the meat of animals not slain in sacrifices.

One should, with concentrated attention, eat once in the morning and once in the evening, abstaining entirely from all food during the interim. One should never eat any food in which one finds a hair. Nor should one eat at the sraddha of an enemy. One should eat silently; one should never eat without covering one's person with an upper garment, and without sitting down. One should never eat any food placing it on the bare ground. One should never eat except in a sitting posture. One should never make any noise while eating.

The man of intelligence should first offer water and then food to anyone that has become his guest, and after having served the guest thus, should then sit down himself to his meal. He who sits down to dine in a line with friends and himself eats any food without giving a portion thereof to his friends, is said to eat poison. As for water and payasa and flour of fried barley and curds and ghee and honey, one should never, after drinking or eating these, offer the leftovers to others.

One should never, O king of men, eat any food doubtingly. One who wishes for food should never drink curd at the end of a meal. After the meal is finished, one should wash one's mouth and face with the right hand only, and taking a little water should then dip the toe of one's right foot in it. After washing, he should touch the crown of his head with his right hand. With attention, he should next touch fire. The man who knows how to observe all these injunctions with care, succeeds in attaining to the foremost position among his kinsmen.

After finishing his meal, a man should wash his nose and eyes and ears and navel and both hands with water. He should not, however, keep his hands wet but dry them. Between the tip and the root of the thumb is situated the sacred tirtha known as the Brahma-tirtha. On the back of the little finger, it is said, is the Deva-tirtha. The intervening space between the thumb and the forefinger, O Bhaarata, should be used for discharging the Pitri rites, after touching water according to the law.

One should never speak ill of others. Nor should one ever utter anything that is at all disagreeable. The man that desires his own good should never seek to provoke the wrath of others upon himself. One should never seek to converse with a person who has fallen away from his varna. The very sight of such a person should be avoided. One should never come into any manner of contact with a fallen person. By avoiding such contact, one succeeds in attaining to a long life. One should never indulge in sexual congress during the day. Nor should one have congress with a virgin, or with a prostitute or with a barren woman. One should never have congress with a woman who has not bathed after her period. By avoiding these, a man attains to a long life.

After washing the several limbs directed in religious rituals, one should wash one's mouth thrice, and again twice more. By doing this, one becomes pure and fit to perform sacred karmas. The several organs of sense should each be washed once, and water should also be sprinkled over the whole body. Having done this, one should perform the worship of the Pitris and the Devas, according to the laws of the Vedas.

Listen to me, O you of Kuru's race, as I tell you what purification is cleansing and beneficial for a Brahmana. Before beginning to eat and after finishing the meal, and in all karmas requiring purification, the Brahmana should perform the achamana with water placed on the Brahma-tirtha. After ejecting any residual matter from the throat and spitting, he should wash his mouth before he can become pure.

A kinsman who happens to be old, or a friend who happens to be poor, should be kept in his house and his comforts looked after as if he were a member of the family. By doing this, one succeeds in acquiring both fame and long life. The establishment of pigeons in one's house is fraught with blessedness, as also of parrots both male and female. If female, these taken to one's home will dispel misfortune. The same is the case with cockroaches. If fireflies, vultures, wood-pigeons or bees enter a house or seek residence in it, karmas of propitiating the Devas should be performed. These are creatures of evil omen, as also ospreys.

One should never divulge the secrets of high-souled men, Mahatmans; one should never have sexual congress with a forbidden woman. Nor should one ever have such congress with the wife of a king or with women that are the friends of queens. One should never become intimate with physicians, or with children, or with persons that are old, or with one's servants, O Yudhishtira. One should always provide for friends, for Brahmanas, and for such as seek one's protection. By doing this, O king, one acquires a long life.

The man of wisdom should live in a house that has been constructed with the help of a Brahmana and a skilled artisan, if indeed, O king, the man desires his own welfare. One should not sleep during the evening twilight. Nor should one study at such an hour, any branch of knowledge. The man of intelligence should never eat at that sandhya. By avoiding these one acquires a long life. One should never perform any ritual in honour of the Pitris at night. One should not adorn one's person after finishing one's meal. One should bathe at night, if one desires one's own advancement. One should also, O Bhaarata, always abstain from the flour of fried barley at night.

The leftovers of food and drink, as also the flowers with which one has worshipped the deities, should never be used again. Inviting a guest at night, one should never, with excessive courtesy, force him to eat to the point of being full. Nor should one eat oneself to the point of fullness, at night. One should not kill a bird to eat, especially after having fed it.

A wise man should marry a virgin born into a high family, endowed with auspicious indications, and of full age. Begetting children upon her and thus perpetuating his race, he should make his sons over to a good preceptor in order to acquire general knowledge, O Bhaarata, as also a knowledge of the special customs of the family. The daughters that one may beget should be bestowed upon youths of respectable families, that are again possessed of intelligence. Sons should also be established and a portion of the family inheritance given to them, O Bhaarata, as their provision.

One should bathe by dipping one's head in water before one sits down to perform any sraddha in honour of the Pitris or the Devas. One should never perform a sraddha under the constellation of one's birth. No sraddha should be performed under any of the Bhadrapadas, prior or later, nor under the Krittika nakshatra, O Bhaarata. The sraddha should never be performed under any of the nakshatras that are regarded as fierce, such as Aslesha, or any of those that, upon calculation, seem to be hostile. Indeed, in this respect, all the nakshatras should be avoided which are forbidden in treatises on astrology.

One should sit facing either the east or the north while being shaved by a barber. By so doing, O great king, one acquires a long life. One should never indulge in either the criticism of others or self-reproach, for it is said that all calumny is sinful, whether of others or of oneself.

In marriage, one should avoid a woman that is without any limb. Even a virgin, if such, must also be avoided. A woman of the same pravara should also be avoided; as also one that has any bodily defect; as also one that has been born in the vamsa to which one's mother belongs.

A wise man should never have sexual congress with a woman who is old, or one that has abandoned grihasta for vanaprastha, or one that is true to her husband, or one whose organs of generation are not healthy or well-formed. You must not to marry a woman of a yellow complexion, or one afflicted with leprosy, or one born into a family in which there has been epilepsy, or one that is low in birth and habits, or one that is born in a family in which the disease called switra, leprosy, has ever appeared, or one belonging by birth to a vamsa in which there are early deaths.

Only that young woman who is blessed with auspicious limbs and indications on her person, and who is accomplished in diverse ways, who is agreeable and good-looking, should you marry. One should marry, O Yudhishtira, into a family that is higher or at least equal to one's own. He who desires his own prosperity should never marry a woman of an inferior varna or one who has fallen away from the order of her birth.

Carefully lighting the fire, one should accomplish all those karmas which have been ordained and declared in the Vedas or by the Brahmanas. One should never seek to injure women. Wives should always be protected. Malice always shortens life. Hence, one should always abstain from cherishing malice. Sleep during the day shortens life. To sleep after the sun has risen shortens life. They who sleep at any of the twilights, or at nightfall or who go to sleep in a state of impurity, have their lives shortened. Adultery always shortens life. One should not remain without bathing after being shaved.

One should, O Bhaarata, scrupulously abstain from studying or reciting the Vedas, and eating, and bathing, at eventide. When the evening sandhya comes, one should collect one's senses for dhyana, meditation, in stillness. One should, O king, bathe and then worship the Brahmanas. Indeed, one should bathe before worshipping the Devas and reverentially saluting the guru. One should never go to a sacrifice unless invited. Indeed, one may go there without an invitation if one wishes merely to see how the sacrifice is conducted. If one goes to a sacrifice for any other purpose without an invitation and if one does not, on that account, receive proper worship from the sacrificer, one's life is shortened.

One should never go alone on a journey to foreign parts. Nor should one ever travel alone anywhere at night. Before evening comes, one should return to one's home and remain within.

One should always obey the commands of one's mother and father and preceptor, without at all judging whether those commands are beneficial or otherwise. One should attend with great care to the Vedas and to the science of arms. Do then, O king, as carefully attend to riding an elephant, a horse and a war-chariot. The man who attends to these with care succeeds in attaining to happiness. Such a king succeeds in becoming unconquerable by his enemies, and holds sway over his servants and kinsmen without any of them being able to have the better of him. The king that attains to such a position and that carefully attends to the dharma of protecting his subjects, never has to incur any loss.

You should acquire, O Rajan, the science of reasoning, as also the science of words, the science of the Gandharvas, and the four and sixty branches of knowledge known by the name kala, the arts. Every day hear the Puranas and the Itihasas and all the other sacred lore that exists, as also the life-stories of all great Mahatmans.

When your wife has her period, you should never have congress with her, nor even summon her for conversation. The man endowed with wisdom may accept her companionship on the fourth day after her period ends and she has the bath of purification. If one indulges in congress on the fifth day from the first appearance of the time of fertility, one begets a daughter. By indulging in congress on the sixth day, one has a son. The man of wisdom should, in the matter of sexual congress, know this rule about odd and even days.

Kinsmen and relatives by marriage and friends should all be treated with respect. One should, according to the best of one's power, adore the gods with yagnas, giving away different kinds of offerings as sacrificial dakshina. After the time ordained for grihastasrama, the domestic life, has passed, one should, O king, enter the life of a vanaprastha, a forest recluse.

I have thus told you all the indications, in brief, of men who succeed in living long. What remains untold you should hear from the mouths of men well-versed in the three Vedas, O Yudhishtira. You should know that pravritti, conduct, is the root of prosperity. Conduct is the enhancer of fame. It is vyavahara that prolongs life. It is conduct that destroys all evils. Vyavahara has been said to be superior to all the branches of knowledge. It is conduct that begets dharma, and it is righteousness that lengthens life.

Conduct is bestows kirti, fame, ayu, long life, and swarga, heaven. Vyavahara is the most efficacious rite of propitiating the deities to have auspiciousness of every kind. The Self-born Brahma himself has said that one should show compassion to all orders of men.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O greatest of the Bharatas, how the eldest brother should behave towards his younger brothers and how the younger brothers towards their eldest brother.'

Bhishma says, 'Do you, O son, always behave towards your younger brothers as their eldest brother should. You are always the eldest of all these your brothers. That high conduct which a guru should always adopt towards his sishyas should you adopt towards your younger brothers. If the preceptor is without wisdom, the disciple cannot possibly treat him with respect. If the guru is possessed of purity and nobility of conduct, the disciple also attains naturally to conduct of the same kind, O Bhaarata. The eldest brother should at times be blind to the actions of his younger brothers, and, though in fact possessed of wisdom, should at times behave as if he does not understand their actions. If the younger brothers be guilty of any transgression, the eldest brother should correct them through indirect ways and means.

If there be understanding and love among brothers and if the eldest brother seeks to correct his younger brothers by direct methods or harshly, their enemies, O son of Kunti, who are full of envy and sorrow at the sight of the love between the brothers will surely seek to bring discord among them, to cause dissension among the brothers and disunite them.

It is the eldest brother that enhances the prosperity of the family or destroys it entirely. If the eldest brother is without sense and wisdom, and evil in his ways, he brings about the destruction of the whole family. The eldest brother who injures his younger brothers ceases to be regarded as the eldest and forfeits his share in the family property and deserves to be checked by the king. That man who acts deceitfully, has, without doubt, to go to regions of grief and every kind of evil. The birth of such a person serves no useful purpose even as the flowers of the cane.

That family into which a sinful soul is born falls subject to every evil. Such a one brings infamy, and all the punya of the family disappears. Such among brothers as are wedded to evil forfeit their shares of the family property. In such cases, the eldest brother may appropriate the whole Yautuka property without giving any portion thereof to his younger wayward brothers. If the eldest brother makes any acquisition, without using the paternal property and by going to a distant place, he may keep for himself such acquisitions, without giving any share to his younger brothers.

If unseparated brothers wish, during the lifetime of their father, to divide the family property, the father should give equal shares to all his sons. If the eldest brother happens to be sinful and undistinguished by accomplishments of any kind, he may be disregarded by his younger brothers. If the wife of the younger brother happens to be sinful, her or his good must still be looked after.

Those who know the efficacy of righteousness say that dharma is the highest good. The Upadhyaya is superior to even ten acharyas. The father is equal to ten Upadhyayas. The mother is equal to ten fathers or even the whole world. There is no elder equal to the mother. Verily, she transcends all in respect of the reverence due to her. It is for this reason that wise men regard the mother as deserving of so much adoration.

After the father has ceased to draw breath, O Bhaarata, the eldest brother should be regarded as the father. It is the eldest brother who should assign to the younger ones their means of support, and protect and cherish them. All the younger brothers should bow to him and obey his authority. Indeed, they should live in dependence upon him even as they did upon their father while he was alive. So far as the body is concerned, O Bhaarata, it is the father and the mother who create it. That birth, however, which the acharya ordains, is regarded as the true birth, which is, besides, unfading and immortal.

The eldest sister is like the mother. The wife of the eldest brother is also like the mother, for the younger brother, in infancy, receives nurture from her.'"

CANTO 106

"Yudhishtira says, 'The disposition is seen, Pitamaha, in all the varnas of men, including the very Mlecchas, to keep fasts. I do not however know the reason for this. I have heard that only Brahmanas and Kshatriyas should observe the upavasa vrata. How, then, are the other orders to be taken as earning any punya by fasting? How have vratas and fasts come to be observed by those of all castes?

What is that end to which one devoted to the observance of fasts attains? It has been said that fasts are most meritorious and that fasts are a great refuge. O Lord of men, what is the fruit earned in this world by the man that fasts?

By what means is one cleansed of one's sins? By what means does one acquire dharma? By what means, O best of the Bharatas, does one succeed in acquiring punya and swarga?

After having kept a fast, what should one give away, Tell me, what those dharmas are by which one may obtain the things that lead to happiness?'

To Kunti's son by the god Dharma, Yudhishtira who knows every dharma and who asked him these, Santanu's son, Bhishma who also knows dharma deeply, replies, 'In former days I heard of these high merits as attaching to the observance of fasts according to the shastras. O Bhaarata, I asked Rishi Angiras of great punya the very questions which you have asked me today. Questioned by me, the illustrious Rishi, who sprang from the sacrificial fire, answered me thus in respect of the observance of upavasas according to the law.'

Angiras said, "As regards Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, fasts for three nights at a stretch are ordained for them, O Kurunandana. Indeed, a fast for one night, for two nights, and for three nights, they may keep. They should never fast beyond three nights. As regards Vaisyas and Sudras, the duration of fasts prescribed for them is a single night. If, from folly, they observe fasts for two or three nights, such fasts never lead to their advancement. For Vaisyas and Sudras, also, fasts for two nights have been ordained, but on certain special occasions. Fasts for three nights, however, have not been laid down for them by those who know the laws regarding this matter.

That man of wisdom who, with his senses and soul under control, O Bhaarata, fasts by abstaining from one of the two meals, on the fifth and the sixth days of the moon as also on the day of the full moon, is imbued with forgiveness and beauty of person and knowledge of the scriptures. Such a man is never childless or poor.

He who performs sacrifices to worship the Devas on the fifth and sixth days of the moon, supersedes all members of his family and succeeds in feeding a large number of Brahmanas. He who fasts on the eighth and the fourteenth days of the dark fortnight is freed from maladies of every kind and possessed of great energy. The man who abstains from one meal every day throughout the month of Margasirsha, should, with reverence and devotion, feed a number of Brahmanas. By so doing he is freed from all his sins. Such a man is endued with prosperity, and all kinds of grain become his. He becomes invested with tejas. Such a man reaps an abundance of harvest from his fields, acquires great wealth and a plenitude of corn.

The man, O Kaunteya, who passes the whole month of Pausha, abstaining every day from one of two meals, gains good fortune, a handsome appearance and great fame. He who passes the whole month of Magha, abstaining every day from one of the two meals, is born into a high family and attains to a position of eminence among his kinsmen. He who passes the month of Bhagadaivata, confining himself every day to only one meal becomes a favourite with women who, indeed, readily own his sway. He who passes the whole of the month of Chaitra, eating just one meal a day, is born into a high family and becomes rich in gold, gems and pearls. The person, whether man or woman, who passes the month of Vaisakha, abstaining from one meal every day, and keeping his or her senses under control, attains to a position of eminence among kinsmen. The one, man or woman, who passes the month of Jyeshta eating one meal a day, also succeeds in attaining to a position of preeminence and gains great wealth.

He who passes the month of Ashadha confining himself to one meal a day and with senses steadily concentrated upon his duties, comes to possess much corn, great wealth, and begets many children. He who passes the month of Sravana, confining himself to one meal a day, receives the honours of Abhisheka wherever he may happen to live, and attains to a position of pre-eminence among kinsmen, whom he supports.

That man who confines himself to only a single meal a day for the entire month of Proshthapada, is blessed with great wealth and attains to swelling and lasting affluence. The man who passes the month of Aswin, on one meal a day, becomes pure in soul and body, an owner of many animals and carriages in abundance, and many good children as well. He who passes the month of Kartika, confining himself to one meal a day, grows possessed of heroism, many wives and great fame.

I have now told you, O king of men, what the fruits are that men obtain by observing fasts for each of the twelve months. Listen now, O king, to what the injunctions are in respect of each of the lunar days.

The man who, abstaining from it every day, takes rice at the expiration of every fortnight, acquires a great many kine, a large family and a long life. He who observes a fast for three nights every month, and does so for twelve years, attains to a position of supremacy among his kinsmen and associates, without a rival to contest his claim and without any anxiety caused by anyone endeavouring to rise to his height. These vratas that I speak of should be observed for two and ten years. Let the inclination be manifested towards this.

That man who eats once in the forenoon and once after evening and abstains from drinking or eating anything in the interval, and who observes compassion towards all creatures, and pours libations of clarified butter on his sacred fire every day, attains to success, O king, in six years. There is no doubt about this. Such a man earns the punya that attaches to the performance of the Agnishtoma sacrifice. Invested with merit and freed from every kind of stain, he attains to the region of the Apsaras that rings with the sound of songs and dance, and passes his days in the company of a thousand unearthly nymphs of great beauty. He rides a chariot of the colour of melted gold and receives high honours in Brahmaloka. After the exhaustion of his punya, such a one returns to this earth and attains to pre-eminence.

The man who spends a whole year, confining himself every day to one meal, attains to the merit of the Atiratra yagna. He ascends into heaven after his death and receives great honours there. Upon the exhaustion of that merit, he returns to earth and attains to a position of eminence.

He who passes one year fasting for three days in succession, and eating on every fourth day, and abstaining from doing injury of every kind, adheres to truthfulness of speech, and keeps his senses under control, attains to the merit of the Vajapeya yagna. Such a one ascends into swarga after his death and receives high honour there.

That man, O son of Kunti, who passes a whole year fasting for five days and eating only on the sixth day, acquires the punya of the Aswamedha yagna. The chariot he rides is drawn by Chakravakas. Such a man enjoys every kind of happiness in heaven for full forty thousand years.

He who passes a whole year keeping upavasa for seven days and eating only every eighth day, acquires the merit of the Gavamaya sacrifice. The chariot he rides is drawn by swans and cranes. Such a one enjoys all kinds of bliss in swarga for fifty thousand years.

He who spends a whole year, O king, eating only at intervals of a fortnight, acquires the punya of a continuous upavasa of six months. The illustrious Angiras himself has declared this. Such a man dwells in swarga for sixty thousand years. He is roused every morning from his bed by the sweet notes of vinas and vallakis and venus, O king. He who spends a whole year drinking only a little water at the expiration of every month, acquires the merit of the Viswajita yagna. Such a man rides a chariot drawn by lions and tigers. He dwells in heaven for seventy thousand years in the enjoyment of every kind of happiness.

No fast for more than a month, O king of men, has been ordained. Even this, son of Pritha, is the law in respect of fasts that has been declared by sages who know dharma. That man who, unafflicted by disease and free from every malady, keeps a fast, acquires, at every step the merits that attach to sacrifices. Such a man ascends into heaven in a chariot drawn by swans. Endowed with puissance, he enjoys every kind of happiness in swarga for a hundred years. A hundred of the most beautiful Apsaras wait upon him and dally with him. He is roused from his bed every morning by the sound of the kanchis and the nupuras of those divine nymphs. He rides in a chariot drawn by a thousand swans. Dwelling, again, in a realm teeming with hundreds of the most beautiful women, he passes his time in great joy.

The man who is desirous of attaining swarga does not care to seek strength when he becomes weak, or to cure his wounds when he is wounded, or to be treated with healing drugs when he is ill, or to be soothed by others when he is angry, or to mitigate, by spending wealth, the sorrows caused by poverty. Leaving this world, where he suffers only privations of every kind, he flies straight into heaven and rides in rathas adorned with gold, his person embellished with ornaments of every kind. There, in the midst of hundreds of exquisite Apsaras, and cleansed of every sin, he enjoys all kinds of pleasures and happiness.

Indeed, abstaining from food and enjoyment in this world, he takes leave of this body and attains to Swargaloka as the fruit of his tapasya. There, freed from all his sins, health and happiness become his and whatever wishes arise in his mind are instantly gratified. Such a one rides on a celestial chariot of golden complexion, of the refulgence of the morning sun, set with pearls and lapis lazuli, resounding with the music of vinas and murajas, adorned with banners and lamps, and echoing with the tinkling of celestial bells. He enjoys all kinds of ecstasy for as many years as there are pores in his body.

There is no shastra superior to the Vedas. There is no person more worthy of reverence than one’s mother. There is no acquisition superior to that of dharma, and no penance superior to upavasa, fasting. Just as there is nothing more sacred, in heaven or earth, than Brahmanas, there is no penance that is superior to the observance of fasts. It was by fasting that the Devas attained to swarga. It is through upavasa that the Rishis have attained to high spiritual felicity and success.

Viswamitra passed a thousand celestial years, confining himself every day to but one meal, and as the consequence became a Brahmarishi. Chyavana and Jamadagni and Vasishta and Gautama and Bhrigu—all these greatest Rishis invested with the virtue of forgiveness, attained to swarga through upavasa. In former days, Angiras declared this to the great Rishis. The man who teaches another the merit of fasting never has to suffer any kind of misery. The laws about fasts, in their due order, O son of Kunti, have flowed from Maharishi Angiras. The man who daily reads these laws or hears them read, is freed from sins of every kind. Not only is such a one freed from every sorrow and calamity, but his mind cannot be touched by any kind of taint or fault. He succeeds in understanding the tongues of all creatures that are other than human, and acquiring eternal fame, becomes the foremost of his species.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha Mahtaman, you have discoursed to us on the subject of sacrifices, including the merits, in detail, that attach to them both here and hereafter. One must, though, remember, that the poor cannot perform sacrifices, for these require a large store of all kinds of wealth. Indeed, the punya attaching to sacrifices can be acquired only by kings and princes, and not by those that are destitute of wealth and that live alone and are helpless. Do you tell us, Pitamaha, what the laws are in respect of such rites and deeds that are fraught with punya equal to what attaches to sacrifices and which, therefore, the impoverished can also perform.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O Yudhishtira! Those laws that I have told you of, which were first promulgated by Mahamuni Angiras, and which have punya for their very soul, are regarded as equal to yagnas for the fruits they bestow both here and hereafter. The man who eats one meal in the forenoon and one at night, without taking any food or drink between, and who observes this practice for six years, abstaining all the while from injuring any creature and regularly pouring libations on his sacred fire every day, attains, without doubt, to success. Such a man acquires hereafter a chariot of the hue of molten gold, and goes to dwell for millions of years in Brahmaloka, in the company of Apsaras, a realm ever alive with the blissful sounds of music and dance, and which blazes with the effulgence of fire.

He who spends three years, confining himself every day to one meal and abstaining all the while from congress with any woman other than his own wife, attains to the merit of the Agnishtoma yagna. Such a man is regarded as having performed a sacrifice, with a bounty of gifts in gold, which is dear to Vasava himself. By being constantly truthful in speech, giving dakshina, revering the Brahmanas, avoiding malice, becoming forgiving and self-restrained, and conquering anger, a man attains to the highest end. Riding a chariot of the complexion of white clouds, drawn by swans, he lives, for millions and millions of years, in the company of Apsaras.

Fasting a whole day and eating only one meal on the next, he who pours libations upon his sacred fire for a whole year, and attends every day to his sacred fire and rises each morning before the sun does, attains to the punya of the Agnishtoma yagna. Such a man acquires a chariot drawn by hamsas and kraunchas, swans and cranes. Surrounded by the most delectable Apsaras, he dwells in the world of Indra.

That man who eats only one meal every third day, and pours libations every day on his sacred fire for a whole year, he who thus attends to his fire every day and wakes from sleep every morning before the sun is up, attains to the high punya of the Atiratra yagna. He acquires a chariot drawn by peacocks and swans and cranes. Journeying to the realm of the Saptarishis, he lives there among Apsaras of untold beauty, for full three padmas of years.

Fasting for three days in succession, he who eats only one meal every fourth day, and pours libations every day on his sacred fire, acquires the high merit of the Vajapeya yagna. The chariot he acquires is graced by supernal Apsaras, who have Indra for their father. Such a man lives in Indraloka for millions and millions of years and experiences indescribable joy witnessing the sport and dalliance of the king of the Devas.

Fasting for four days in succession, he who eats only one meal every fifth day, and pours libations on the sacred fire every day for a whole year, and who lives without greed, telling the truth, worshipping Brahmanas, abstaining from every kind of injury, and avoiding malice and sin, acquires the punya of the Vajapeya sacrifice. The chariot he rides is made of gold and drawn by swans and has the irradiance of many suns rising together. He acquires a palatial mansion of pure white. He lives there in great happiness for full one and fifty padmas of years.

Fasting for five days, he who eats on only the sixth day, and pours libations on his sacred fire every day for a whole year, and who performs three sandhya ablutions during the day to purify himself, and says his prayers and does his worship, and who leads a life of brahmacharya, divested of malice in his conduct, acquires the merit of the Gomedha yagna. He acquires a resplendent chariot of pure gold, with the refulgence of blazing fire and drawn by swans and peacocks. He sleeps on the lap of Apsaras and is awakened every morning by the melodious tinkling of nupuras and kanchis. He leads a life of bliss for ten thousand million years and three thousand million besides, and eight and ten padmas and two patakas as well. Such a man resides, honoured by all, in Brahmaloka for as many years as there are hairs on the bodies of hundreds of bears.

Fasting for six days, he who eats only one meal every seventh day and pours libations on the sacred fire every day, for a full year, keeping mowna all the while and the vow of brahmacharya, and abstaining from the use of flowers and unguents and honey and meat, attains to the region of the Maruts and of Indra. Crowned with the fruition of every desire as it springs up in the mind, he is waited upon and adored by Apsaras. He acquires the punya of a sacrifice in which an abundance of gold is given away. He attains the most transcendent realms, where he lives for countless years in the greatest joy.

He who shows forgiveness to all and fasting for seven days eats on every eighth day for a whole year, and, pouring libations every day on the sacred fire, adores the Devas regularly, acquires the lofty punya of the Paundarika yagna. The ratha he rides is of the colour of the lotus. Without doubt, such a man acquires also a great number of perfect Apsaras, all of youth and beauty, some that are dark, some with complexions of gold, and some that are syamas, blue, whose charms and allurements and demeanour are graceful and enjoyable past description.

He who fasts for eight days and takes only one meal on every ninth day for a whole year, and pours libations on the sacred fire daily, acquires the great punya of a thousand Aswamedha yagnas. The chariot he rides in heaven is as beautiful as a lotus. He always journeys in that vimana, accompanied by the daughters of Rudra, himself wearing celestial garlands and radiant as the midday sun or the fires of blazing Agni. Attaining to the realms of Rudra, he lives there in great rapture for years beyond count.

He who fasts for nine days and takes only one meal every tenth day for a whole year, and pours libations on his sacred fire daily, acquires the high merit of a thousand Aswamedha yagnas, and attains to the companionship of Brahmanas' daughters blessed with beauty that fascinates the hearts of all creatures on any world. These women of incomparable beauty, some of complexions of the white lotus and some of the blue, always keep him in joy. He acquires a beautiful vimana, that ranges in exquisite and mystic rounds, everywhere, and looks like the cloud Avarta, while it may also may be said to resemble an ocean-wave. That vimana resounds with the constant tinkling of rows of pearls and other unworldly gemstones, and the melodious resonance of conches, and is adorned with columns of crystals and diamonds, as also with an altar of the same jewels. He makes all his journeys in this vimana, drawn by swans and cranes and lives for millions and millions of years in great felicity in swarga.

He who fasts for ten days and eats only ghrita on every eleventh day for a whole year and pours libations on his sacred fire daily, who never, in word or thought, covets the companionship of other's wives and who never utters an untruth even for the sake of his mother and father, succeeds in beholding Mahadeva of great puissance seated on his bull-drawn ratha. Such a man acquires the high merit of a thousand Horse-sacrifices. He sees the vimana of the Self-born Brahma himself fly down to bear him away in it. He rides in that transplendent craft, with Apsaras of beauty and skills at love impossible to remotely describe, their skins like soft blazing gold. Endowed himself with the splendour of the yoga-fire, he lives for countless years in a celestial mansion in Swargaloka, replete with every rapture. For those countless years he experiences the matchless joy of bowing his head in reverence to Rudra adored by Devas and Danavas. Such a man daily sees Mahadeva Siva with his divine eyes.

The man who, having fasted for eleven days eats only a little ghee on the twelfth, and observes this upavasa for a whole year, succeeds in having the merits that attach to all the sacrifices together. The chariot he rides has the lustre of a dozen suns. Adorned with pearls and corals and other gemstones of incalculable value, embellished with rows of hamsas and nagas and mayuras and flocks of chakravakas giving throat to their melodious notes, and adorned with great and majestic domes, is the unearthly mansion in which he dwells in Brahmaloka. That palace, O king, always throngs with glorious men and women who wait upon him in service. This is what the most blessed Rishi Angiras, knower of every dharma, said.

That man who, having fasted for twelve days eats a little ghrita on the thirteenth, and bears himself in this way for a whole year, succeeds in attaining the merits of the Daiva yagna, the Divine Sacrifice. He acquires a vimana of the complexion of the newly blown lotus, adorned with pure gold and piles of jewellery and gemstones. He travels to the world of the Maruts, which teems with Apsaras adorned with every kind of celestial ornament, divine nymphs redolent with celestial perfumes, and who possess every element of felicity. The number of years he resides in those happy regions is beyond count. Soothed with the music and the melodious voices of Gandharvas and the rhythms of drums and panavas, he is constantly gladdened by the Apsaras of transcendent beauty and gifts.

The man who, having fasted for thirteen days, eats a little ghrita on the fourteenth, and bears himself in this way for a full year, obtains the merits of the Mahamedha yagna. Apsaras of even more indescribable beauty, and whose age cannot be guessed for they are for ever young in appearance, adorned with every ornament and with armlets of flaming radiance, wait upon him with many sky-chariots and follow him on his journeys. He is awakened every morning by the voices of swans, the tinkle of nupuras, and the most pleasant jingling of kanchis. Verily, he dwells in a most superior palace, waited upon by these celestial women, for years as countless as the grains of sand on the shores of the Ganga.

That man who, keeping his senses restrained, fasts for a fortnight and takes only one meal on the sixteenth day, and does so for a whole year, pouring libations daily on his sacred fire, acquires the high punya that attaches to a thousand Rajasuya yagnas. The vimana he rides in is of great beauty and is drawn by swans and peacocks, and is, besides, adorned with garlands of pearls and the purest gold and graced with bevies of heaven’s nymphs decked with ornaments of every kind, and that magical craft, celestial and of celestial attributes, has one column and four arches and seven altars exceedingly auspicious, with thousands of banners, and is awash with the strains of divine music, and embellished with pearls and corals and other lambent jewels, and has the brightness of lightning, and is, besides, drawn by the most magnificent and unearthly elephants and rhinocerii which go as freely through the air as they do over ground. Such a man lives in swarga for a thousand yugas.

The man who, having fasted for fifteen days, takes one meal on the sixteenth, and does this for a whole year, acquires the punya attaching to the Soma sacrifice. Attaining to swarga, he lives in the company of Soma’s daughters. His body fragrant with lotions whose scents are as fragrant as those of Soma himself, he acquires the power of transporting himself instancly to any place he likes. Seated in his chariot he is waited upon by the most beautiful women of pleasing ways, and commands all things of enjoyment. He enjoys such happiness for countless years.

That man who, having fasted for sixteen days, eats a little ghrita on the seventeenth day and bears himself in this way for a whole year, pouring libations daily on his sacred fire, attains to the regions of Varuna and Indra, and Rudra and the Maruts and Usanas and Brahma himself. There he is waited upon by celestial women and sees Devarishi Bhurbhuva and grasps the very universe in his ken. The daughters of the God of gods gladden him there. Those women, of ever-pleasing ways and adorned with every gorgeous ornament, can assume two and thirty forms to give him pleasure. As long as the sun and the moon move in firmament, so long does that man of wisdom dwell in those realms of felicity, living upon the succour of amrita.

The man who, having fasted for seventeen days, eats only one meal on the eighteenth, and bears himself in this way for a whole year, succeeds in grasping the seven Dwipas of which the universe consists in his ken. While journeying in his vimana he is always followed by a large train of other sky-chariots, which fly with the most agreeable sound and are full of Apsaras ablaze with ornaments and beauty. Enjoying the greatest bliss, the great craft in which he goes is also divine and of unearthly grandeur, drawn by lions and tigers, and often sounding as deeply as thunderheads. He lives in such felicity for a thousand kalpas on rare and sweet amrita.

That man who, having fasted for eighteen days, eats only one meal on the nineteenth, and does this for a full year, also succeeds in grasping within his ken all the seven Dwipas of which the universe consists. The realm to which he attains is inhabited by diverse tribes of Apsaras, and resounds with the melodious voices of Gandharvas. The ratha he rides in is possessed of the brightness of the sun. His heart being freed from every anxiety, he is waited upon by the foremost of divine women. Decked in celestial garlands, and of unearthly handsomeness now, he lives in such joy for millions and millions of years.

The man who, having fasted for nineteen days eats only one meal on every twentieth day, and bears himself in this way for a full year, adhering all the while to truthfulness of speech and to the observance of other great vratas, while also abstaining from meat, leading the life of a Brahmacharin, and devoted to the good of all creatures, attains to the vast regions, of untold happiness, which belong to the Adityas. While journeying in his own vimana, he is followed by a numerous train of sky chariots in which Gandharvas and Apsaras ride, all adorned with celestial garlands and smeared with unworldly liniments.

The man who, having fasted for twenty days, takes a single meal on the twenty-first day and bears himself in this way for a full year, pouring libations daily on his sacred fire, attains to the regions of Usanas and Sakra, of the Aswins and the Maruts, and lives there in uninterrupted happiness of great measure. Unacquainted with sorrow of any kind, he rides in the foremost of vimanas on his cosmic sojourns, and is waited upon by the most exquisite Apsaras and, possessed of marvellous power, he sports in joy like a god himself.

The man who, having fasted for one and twenty days, takes a single meal on the twenty-second day and bears himself in this way for a full year, pouring libations on his sacred fire daily, abstaining from injuring any creature, adhering to truthfulness in speech, and freed from malice, attains to the regions of the Vasus and grows as lustrous as the sun. Possessed of the power of going everywhere at will, amrita his food and drink, and riding in the most magnificent vimana, his person decked with unearthly ornaments, he dallies in ecstasy in the company of celestial women.

The man who, having fasted for two and twenty days, eats a single meal on the twenty-third day and bears himself in this way for a full year, keeping his senses under control, attains to the realms of Vayu, of Usanas, and of Rudra. Able to fly anywhere at will and always roving as he pleases, he is worshipped by diverse tribes of Apsaras. Riding in his best of vimanas and his person decked with divine ornaments, he sports for countless years in great felicity in the company of supernal women.

That man who, having fasted for three and twenty days, eats a little ghee on the twenty-fourth day, and bears himself in this way for a full year, pouring libations on his sacred fire, dwells for countless years in great happiness in the regions of the Adityas, his person decked with celestial robes and garlands and divine perfumes and liniments. Riding in a splendid chariot made of gold and drawn by swans, he lives in rapture in the company of thousands and thousands of Apsaras.

The man who having fasted for four and twenty days eats a single meal on the twenty-fifth, and bears himself thus for a full year, acquires a ratha of the foremost sort, full of every enjoyment. He is followed in his journeys by a large train of chariots drawn by lions and tigers, which resound as deeply as the roar of thunderclouds, and are ridden by celestial women. Himself riding in a vimana of great majesty, he dwells in those regions for a thousand kalpas, in the company of hundreds of Apsaras, and eating ambrosial food and drinking nectarine amrita.

That man who, having fasted for five and twenty days eats only one meal on the twenty-sixth day, and bears himself thus for a full year, keeping his senses under control, freed from attachment to things mundane, and pouring libations every day on his sacred fire, is worshipped by the Apsaras, and attains to the regions of the seven Maruts and of the Vasus. When abroad on his celestial journeys, he is followed by a flotilla of vimanas of crystal, encrusted with all kinds of gemstones, and ridden by Gandharvas and Apsaras who show him every honour. He remains in those regions, in enjoyment of such felicity, and blessed with divine energy, for two thousand yugas.

That man who having fasted for six and twenty days eats a single meal on the twenty-seventh day and bears himself in this way for a full year, pouring libations daily on his sacred fire, acquires great merit and going into swarga receives honour from the Devas. Living there, he feeds on amrita, freed from thirst of every kind, and enjoying every rapture. His soul purified of all dross and journeying in a celestial vimana of glittering beauty, he dwells there, O king, bearing himself after the manner of the Devarishis and the great Rajarishis. Possessed of immense tejas, he lives there in utmost happiness fawned upon by Apsaras of every delight, for three thousand yugas and as many kalpas.

That man who, having fasted for seven and twenty days eats a single meal on the twenty-eighth day and bears himself in this way for a full year, with soul and senses under perfect control, acquires awesome punya, equal to what the Devarishis attain. Owning every manner of enjoyment, and endued with terrific tejas, he blazes like the midday sun. Women of the most delicate features and radiant complexions, of deep bosoms, tapering thighs and full and round hips, all wearing celestial ornaments, all profound mistresses of dalliance and love, gladden him with their company while he rides in a most delightful vimana brilliant as Surya and furnished with every article of enjoyment, for thousands and thousands of kalpas.

The man, who having fasted for eight and twenty days eats a single meal on the twenty-ninth day, and bears himself in this way for a full year, adhering all the while to truthfulness of speech, attains to auspicious regions of great happiness that are worshipped by Devarishis and Rajarishis. The chariot he obtains has the effulgence of the sun and the moon; made of pure gold and adorned with every kind of gem, Apsaras and Gandharvas ride in it dancing and singing melodiously. His every delight is attended to by the women of proud beauty and charms. He has every conceivable object of enjoyment, great vigour to enjoy it all, the splendour of a blazing fire, the lustre, form and majesty of a god. The regions he attains are those of the Vasus and the Maruts, of the Sadhyas and the Aswins, of the Rudras and of Brahma himself.

That man who, having fasted for a full month, takes a single meal on the first day of the following month and maintains this for a full year, looking upon all things with an equal eye, attains to Brahmaloka. There he quaffs amrita. His form magnificent and resplendent, and delightful to all, he shines forth with tejas and prosperity like the sun himself of a thousand rays. Devoted to yoga and adorned with divine raiment and garlands and daubed with divine perfumes and smeared with unearthly lotions and pastes, he passes his time in utter bliss, unacquainted with the least sorrow. He scintillates in his vimana, attended by divine women as luminous as himself.

Those women, the daughters of the Devarishis and the Rudras, adore him with veneration. They assume diverse forms that fascinate and please him no end, their speech is mellifluous and sweet in a myriad of ways, and they unfailingly gratify the one they wait upon in every way, imaginable and beyond imagining. While abroad on his yatras, he goes in a vimana of the hue of the azure sky, invisibly, for it is so magical subtle. Behind him fly fleets of chariots that look like full moons; before him go those that resemble clouds; on his right are red craft; below him are blue ones; and above him are those of variegated hue. He is always adored by those that wait upon him. Endowed with great wisdom, he lives in the world of Brahma for as many years as are measured by the drops of rain that fall in course of a thousand years on that part of the earth which is called Jambudwipa. Verily, possessed of the brilliance of a Deva, he lives in that realm of unalloyed felicity for as many years as the drops of rain that fall upon the earth in the monsoon.

The man who, having fasted for a whole month, eats on the first day of the following month, and does so for ten years, attains to the status of a Maharishi. He undergoes no change of form when entering Swargaloka to reap the rewards of his karma in his life. Verily, even this is the lofty condition to which one attains by restraining speech, practising self-denial, subjugating anger, sexual appetite, and the desire to eat, pouring libations on the sacred fire and regularly worshipping the two twilights. That man who purifies himself by the observance of these and similar vratas and karmas, and who eats in this way, keeping upavasas, becomes as stainless as the ethereal Akasa and blessed with refulgence like that of the sun himself. Such a man, O king, ascends into swarga in his own body, enjoys all the felicity that is there like a Deva, at his will.

And I have thus told you, O king of the Bharatas, what the laws are with regard to sacrifices, one by one, and how their fruits accrue to him who keeps upavasas. Poor men, O son of Pritha, who are unable to perform yagnas may, nevertheless, acquire the fruits thereof by fasting. Verily, by keeping these fasts, even the poorest man may attain to the highest end, O Bharatottama, attending all the while, besides, to the worship of the Devas and Brahmanas. I have indeed told you in detail the laws in respect of fasts. Do not harbour any doubt that men who keep such upavasas, who are heedful and pure and high-souled, that are thus freed from pride and contentions of every kind, that are blessed with devout minds and hearts, and who pursue their end with steadfastness and fixity of purpose, never deviating from their chosen path, will certainly find all the swargas and wondrous lokas that I have described.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, Pitamaha, of that which is regarded as the foremost of all tirthas. Indeed, tell me what tirtha is the most auspicious and bestows the greatest purity.'

Bhishma says, 'Without doubt, all tirthas are possessed of punya. Listen, however, with attention to me as I tell you which the great Tirtha, the cleanser, is of men blessed with wisdom. Adhering to eternal Truth, one should bathe in the tirtha called Manasa, which is unfathomable for its depth, stainless, and entirely pure, and which has Truth for its waters and the understanding for its depth. The fruits in the form of purification, which one acquires by bathing in that tirtha, are freedom from greed, utmost sincerity, truthfulness, and mildness of conduct, compassion, abstention from injuring any creature, self-restraint and tranquillity.

Also, men that are free from attachments, who are divested of pride, who transcend all the pairs of opposites—pleasure and pain, praise and blame, heat and cold, and all the rest—that have no wives and children, houses and lands and gardens, or anything else, who are invested with purity, and who subsist upon the alms given to them by others, are regarded themselves as tirthas. He who is acquainted with the truths of all things and who is free from ego, ahamkara, is said to be the highest tirtha.

In searching for the indications of purity, your scrutiny should ever be directed towards these attributes—so that where these are present, you may take purity to be present, and where these are not, purity also should be concluded to be absent. Men and women from whose souls the three gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas have been washed, they who, regardless of outward cleanliness and impurity pursue the ends they have set themselves, they who have renounced everything, they who are possessed of omniscience and imbued with universal vision, and they who are of pure conduct, are regarded as tirthas possessing the power of washing away sins.

The man whose limbs alone are wet with water is not regarded as one that has bathed or is purified. He, on the other hand, is regarded as pure who has washed himself with self-denial. Such a man is said to be pure both inwardly and outwardly. They who never concern themselves with what is past, they who feel no attachment to acquisitions and possessions that are present, indeed, they who are free from desire, are said to have the highest purity. Knowledge is said to constitute the most especial purity of the body. So also freedom from desire, and cheerfulness of heart. Pravritti, purity of conduct, constitutes the purity of the mind.

The purity that one attains by ablutions in sacred waters is regarded as inferior, while the purity which arises from knowledge is regarded as the best. The ablutions which one performs with a blazing mind in the waters of the knowledge of Brahman in the tirtha called Manasa are the true ablutions of those that are conversant with Truth. That man who is possessed of true purity of conduct and who is always devoted to the preservation of a proper attitude towards all, indeed, he who is possessed of pure attributes and merit—only he is truly pure.

These that I have mentioned are said to be the tirthas that inhere to the body. Do you listen to me as I tell you what those sacred tirthas are that are situated on the earth, this Bhumi. Even as special attributes that inhere to the body have been said to be sacred, there are particular places on earth as well, and particular waters that are regarded as sacred. By reciting the names of the tirthas, by performing ablutions there, and by offering oblations to the Pitris in those places, one's sins are washed away. Men whose sins are thus washed attain to swarga when they leave this world. From their association with righteous men, through the exceptional efficacy of the earth herself in those sacred places and particular waters, there are certain portions of this Bhumiloka that have come to be regarded as sacred.

The tirthas of the mind are distinct from those of the earth. He who bathes in both attains to success without the least delay. As strength without exertion, or exertion without strength, can never accomplish anything, singly, and as these, when combined, can accomplish all things, even so one that is endowed with the purity that is conferred by the tirthas in the body as also by that which is given by the tirthas on the earth, becomes truly pure and attains to absolute success. That purity which is derived from both sources is the best.'"

CANTO 109

"Yudhishtira says, 'It befits you, Pitamaha, to tell me what the highest, the most beneficial and the most certain fruit are of all kinds of fasts in this world.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O king, to what was sung by the Svayambhuva himself, and by accomplishing which, without doubt, a man attains to the highest happiness.

The man who fasts on the twelfth day of the moon in the month called Margasirsha and worships Krishna as Kesava for the whole day and night, attains to the merit of the Aswamedha yagna and is cleansed of all his sins. He who, in the same way, fasts on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Pausha and worships Krishna as Narayana, through the whole day and night, attains to the merits of the Vajapeya yagna and the highest success. He who fasts on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Magha and worships Krishna as Madhava, all day and night, attains to the merits of the Rajasuya yagna, and redeems his very vamsa.

He who fasts on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Phalguna and worships Krishna as Govinda, all day and night, attains to the merit of the Atiratra yagna and goes to the realm of Soma. He who fasts on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Chaitra and worships Krishna as Vishnu, through the day and night, acquires the punya of the Pundarika yagna and attains to Devaloka. By keeping a similar fast on the twelfth day of the month of Vaisakha and worshipping Krishna as Madhusudana, all day and night, one attains to the punya of the Agnishtoma yagna and gains the world of Soma. By fasting on the twelfth lunar day in the month of Jyeshta and worshipping Krishna as Trivikrama who covered the universe with three steps, one attains to the merits of the Gomedha sacrifice and sports with the Apsaras in great ecstasy.

By fasting on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Ashada and worshipping Krishna as the Vamana who beguiled the Asura king Mahabali, one attains to the merits of the Naramedha yagna and dallies in bliss with the Apsaras. Observing a fast for the twelfth lunar day of the month of Sravana and worshipping Krishna day and night as Sridhara, one attains to the merits of the sacrifice called Pancha yagna and acquires a beautiful vimana in swarga in which he experiences every rapture. By fasting on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Bhadrapada and worshipping Krishna as Hrishikesa through the whole day and the night, one attains to the merits of the Sautramani sacrifice and is purified of all sin. By keeping Upavasa on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Aswin and worshipping Krishna as Padmanabha, one attains, without doubt, to the punya of the sacrifice in which a thousand kine are given away. By observing a fast on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Kartika and worshipping Krishna as Damodara, one attains to the combined punya of all the sacrifices.

He who, in this way, adores Krishna for a whole year as Pundarikaksha, acquires the power of remembering his past births and wins great wealth in gold. Similarly, he who worships Krishna every day as Upendra attains to identity with him. After Krishna has been worshipped in this manner, one should, at the conclusion of one's vrata, feed a goodly number of Brahmanas or give dakshina to them of ghrita.

The illustrious Vishnu, that Ancient Being, has himself said that there is no fast that possesses punya superior to what attaches to such fasting.'" Vaisampayana said, “Approaching the Kuru Grandsire, venerable in years, Bhishma who lies on his bed of arrows, Yudhishtira of great wisdom asks him, ‘How, Pitamaha, does one acquire beauty of form and prosperity and an agreeable disposition? How does one become possessed of dharma, artha and kama? How does one become invested with happiness?’

Bhishma says, ‘In the month of Margasirsha, when the moon comes into conjunction with the asterism Mula, when his two feet are united with that very nakshatra, O king, when Rohini is in his calf, when his knee-joints are in Aswini, and his shins are in the two Ashadhas, when Phalguni is his anus, and Krittika his waist, when his navel is in Bhadrapada, his eyes in Revati, and his back on the Dhanishthas, when Anuradha is his belly, when with his two arms he reaches the Visakhas, when his two hands are indicated by Hasta, when Punarvasu, O king, is his fingers, Aslesha his nails, when Jyeshta is his neck, when Sravana is his ears, and his mouth Pushya, when Swati is his teeth and lips, when Satabhisha is his smile and Magha his nose, when Mrigasiras is in his eye, and Chitra in his forehead, when his head is in Bharani, when Ardra is his hair, he should begin the vow called Chandravrata.

Upon the completion of that vrata, dakshina of ghrita should be given to Brahmanas who know the Vedas. As the fruit of that vow, one becomes possessed of true gyana. Indeed, with such a vrata a man becomes as full of every blessed attribute as the moon himself when he is full.’”

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, O you of great wisdom and who know all the scriptures, I wish to know those most excellent injunctions, the laws through which mortal creatures have to make their rounds of rebirth. What is that conduct, by which, O king, men succeed in attaining to high swarga, and what is that pravritti by which one sinks into naraka? When, abandoning the dead body that is as inert as a piece of wood or clod of earth, people journey to the other world, what follows them there?'

Bhishma says, 'Look, yonder comes the illustrious Brihaspati of great intelligence. Do you ask the most blessed one himself. The subject is an eternal mystery. None else can adequately explain the matter. There is no one as wise or as eloquent as the great Brihaspati, the Devaguru.'

While the son of Pritha and the son of Ganga speak with each other, there comes to that place from the very firmament, the lustrous Brihaspati of stainless soul. Yudhishtira, and all the others, with Dhritarashtra at their head, stand up and receive Guru with every proper honour. Verily, immaculate is the worship they offer to the preceptor of the Devas. Then Dharma's royal son, Yudhishtira, approaches the lambent Brihaspati and, wanting to know the truth, asks him his question.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O most illustrious one, you are conversant with all dharma and all the shastras. Do you tell me, holy Guru, who is the true friend of mortal creatures? Is it the father or mother, or son, or preceptor, or kinsmen, or relatives, or those called friends, that can be truly known as the friend of a mortal? One goes to the next world, leaving one's dead body that is like a piece of wood or a clod of earth. Who is it that follows him there?'

Brihaspati says, 'One is born alone, O king, and one dies alone; one crosses alone the difficulties one meets with, and one alone encounters whatever misery falls to one's lot. One has really no companion in these things. The father, the mother, the brother, the son, the preceptor, kinsmen, relatives and friends, leaving the dead body as if it were a piece of wood or a piece of earth, after having mourned for only a moment, all turn away from it and return to their own concerns. Only dharma follows the one thus abandoned by them all. Hence, it is plain, that dharma is the only friend and that dharma alone should be sought by all.

One endowed with dharma will attain to that high end which is called swarga; if with sin, he goes to hell. Hence, the man of intelligence should always seek to acquire religious merit through wealth won by lawful means. Piety is the only friend which creatures have in the world hereafter. Let by greed, stupefaction, compassion, or fear, one without much knowledge is seen to indulge in evil deeds, even for the sake of another, his judgment darkened by avarice or lust. Dharma, artha and kama—these three constitute the fruit of life. One should acquire these three by being free from impropriety and sin.'

Yudhishtira says, 'I have carefully listened to what you have said, O illustrious one, your words fraught with truth, words that are most auspicious and beneficial. I wish now to know of the life of the body after death. The dead spirit of man becomes subtle, sukshma, and unmanifest. It becomes invisible. How is it possible for piety to follow it?'

Brihaspati says, 'Earth, wind, ether, water, light, mind, Yama the king of the dead, intellect, the Soul, as also day and night, all together behold as witnesses the punya and paapa of all living creatures. With these, dharma follows the creature when he dies. When the body becomes bereft of life, skin, bones, flesh, the vital seed and blood, O you of great intelligence, leave it at the same time. Imbued with punya and paapa, the jiva, after the destruction of one body, attains to another. After the attainment by the jiva of that body, the presiding deities of the five elements once more see as witnesses all his actions good and bad. What else do you wish to hear? If invested with righteousness, the jiva enjoys happiness. What other matter, pertaining to this or the other world, shall I tell you about?'

Yudhishtira says, ‘You have explained, great Guru, how dharma follows the jiva. I want to know how the vital seed originates.’

Brihaspati says, ‘The food that these deities, O king, who dwell in the body—earth, wind, ether, water, light and mind—eat, gratifies them. When those five elements become gratified, with the mind numbering the sixth, their vital seed is then generated, O Shuddhatman. When an act of union takes place between male and female, the vital seed flows out and causes conception. This is the answer to your question. What else do you wish to hear?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘You have, O illustrious one, said how conception takes place. Do you explain how the jiva that takes birth grows by becoming possessed of a body.’

Brihaspati said, ‘As soon as the jiva enters the retas, the vital seed, he is seized by the elements, the Mahabhutas, and the mind. When the jiva is disunited from them, he attains to the other end, to death. When he is invested with the elements the jiva attains to a corporeal body. The gods that preside over those elements witness from within all his actions, good and bad. What else do you wish to hear?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Leaving off skin and bone and flesh, and all those six elements, in what does the jiva reside, illustrious one, to enjoy and endure happiness and sorrow?’

Brihaspati said, ‘Invested with all his karma, the jiva quickly enters the semen virile, and using the womb and ova of women takes birth in time, O Bhaarata. After being born, the jiva receives suffering and death from the messengers of Yama. Indeed, dukha and a painful round of rebirths are his inheritance. Instilled with life, O king, the jiva in this world, from the moment of his birth, enjoys and endures his own previous karma, depending upon his punya and paapa, his righteousness and his sins. If the jiva, to the best of his power, follows dharma from the day of his birth, he enjoys, when reborn, happiness without interruption. If, on the other hand, he sins more than he follows dharma, he reaps happiness at first as the reward of his good deeds and suffers for his sins after.

The sinful jiva has to go to the dominions of Yama and suffer great torment there; he then takes birth into an intermediate order of being. Listen to me as I tell you what the different sins are by committing which the jiva, overcome by folly, is forced to be born in different orders of being, as declared in the Vedas, the shastras and the sacred Itihasas. Mortals have to go into the frightful realms of Yama. In those worlds, O king, there are places that are fraught with every merit and that are worthy of being the abodes of the very gods. There are, again, places in those lands that are worse than those inhabited by beasts.

Indeed, there are parts of Yamaloka equal to the world of Brahma himself in auspiciousness, as there are those which are equally dark and fearsome. Creatures, bound by their karma, endure myriad kinds of suffering and torture in the hells of Yamaloka. I will tell you what those deeds and dispositions are by which a soul finds an end that is full of terror and torment.

If a Brahmana, after having studied the four Vedas, is overcome by folly and accepts a gift from a fallen man, he has then to be born into the asinine species. He has to live as an ass or a donkey for five and ten years. Casting off his asinine form, he has next to be born as an ox, in which state he has to live for seven years. Casting off his bovine form, he has next to take birth as a Rakshasa of the twice-born kind. Living as a regenerate Rakshasa for three months, he then regains his status, in his next birth, of a Brahmana.

A Brahmana, who officiates at the sacrifice of a fallen person, must be born as a vile worm. In this form he must live for five and ten years, O Bhaarata. Freed from the condition of being a worm, be next takes birth as an ass, a mule or a donkey. Thus he must spend five years, and then as a pig, for as many years. After that, he is born as a cock, and living for five years in that form, he is born as a jackal and lives for as many years in that state. He has next to take birth as a dog, and living thus for a year, he regains his human condition.

The foolish disciple who offends his preceptor by doing any injury to him, has certainly to undergo three transformations in this world. Such a man, O monarch, has first to become a dog. He then becomes a beast of prey, and then a donkey. Leaving his asinine form, he has to wander for some while in great affliction as a Pisacha, a spirit. After the end of that existence, he is born a Brahmana. That sinful disciple who even in thought commits adultery with the wife of his preceptor, has to undergo many fierce births and shapes in this world. First, he lives as a dog for three years. Casting off the canine form when death comes, he is born as a worm or some vile vermin. In this form he lives for a year. Leaving that form he succeeds in regaining his human condition as a Brahmana.

If, without reason, the guru kills his sishya who is like a son to him, he has to be born as a beast of prey. That son who disregards his father and mother, O king, has to take birth as a mule or a donkey, and live like that for ten years. After that he will be born as a crocodile, in which form he must live for a year. After this he regains a human form.

That son with whom his parents become angry has to be born as a donkey, live that life for ten months. He is next born as a dog and remains one for fourteen months. He is then born as a cat and after living as a cat for seven months he is born as a man again.

He who speaks ill of his parents takes birth as a sarika. If a son strike his parents, O king, he is born a tortoise. Living as a tortoise for ten years, he is next born as a porcupine. After that he becomes a snake, and living for six months in that form he regains the condition of humanity.

That man who, while subsisting upon the food that his royal master supplies, acts in a manner injurious to the interests of his master, is born as an ape. For ten years he has to live as an ape, and after that for five years as a mouse. After that he becomes a dog, and after living as a dog for six months, he succeeds in regaining his humanity.

The man who misappropriates what is entrusted to him for safekeeping must undergo a hundred transformations. He at last takes birth as a vile worm, and lives as one for full fifteen years. Upon the exhaustion of his great sin in this way, he succeeds in being born into the human species again.

That man who harbours malice towards others has, after death, to take birth as a sarngaka. The man of evil heart who is guilty of a breach of trust has to be born as a fish. Living as a fish for eight years, he is born, O Bhaarata, as a deer. Living as a deer for four months, he is next born as a goat. After the expiration of a full year, he casts off his goatish body, and takes birth as a worm. After that he succeeds in regaining a human form.

That shameless and insensate man who, through tamas, steals paddy, barley, sesame, masha, kulattha, oil-seeds, oats, kalaya, mudga, wheat, atasi, and other kinds of grain, is born as a rat or mouse. After leading the life for some time he must be born a swine. No sooner is he born a pig than he dies of disease. His sin following him, that fool has next to take birth as a dog, and spends five years as one, after which he is born again into the human race.

Having committed adultery with another man's wife, one has to be born as a wolf. After that he has to assume the forms of a dog, a jackal and a vulture. He has next to be born as a snake and then as a kanka and then as a crane, before regaining a human form. That sinner who, stupefied by folly, commits adultery with his own brother's wife, will be born as a male kokila and live in that form for a whole year, O king. He who, through lust, commits adultery with the wife of a friend, or the wife of his preceptor, or the wife of his king, has, after dying, to be born as a hog. He spends five years in his porcine form, and is then born a wolf for ten years. For the next five years he has to be a cat and then another ten years a rooster. He then lives as an ant for three months, and then as a worm for a month. Having undergone these transformations, he has next to live again as a vile worm for four and ten years. When his sin is exhausted by such expiation, he at last regains the human condition again.

When a wedding is about to take place, or a sacrifice, or a dakshina is about to be made, O you of great puissance, the man who offers any obstruction, will be born in his next life as an odious worm, and spend fifteen years as one, O Bhaarata. When his sin is exhausted by such suffering, he regains the human condition.

Having once bestowed his daughter in marriage upon another, he who seeks to give her again to a second husband, has to be born among worms, and live thus for thirteen years. Upon his sin being exhausted, he is born as a man again.

He who eats without having performed the rites in honour of the Devas or those in honour of the Pitris or without having offered even oblations of water to both the Rishis and the Pitris, will be born a crow. Living as a crow for a hundred years he next assumes the form of a rooster. His next transformation is into a snake, for a month. After this, he regains a human form.

He who disrespects his eldest brother who is even like a father, must, after dying, be born as a krauncha, a crane, and live as one for two years. Leaving his crane's body, he is born human again.

The Sudra who has sexual intercourse with a Brahmana woman, is born in his next life as a pig, and no sooner is he born into the porcine order, dies of some virulent disease. The wretch has next to be a dog, and only then, after his sin is exhausted, returns into the human fold. The Sudra who fathers a child upon a Brahmana woman is reborn as a mouse.

The man who is guilty of ingratitude, O king, goes to Yamaloka, where he is subject to dreadful torment by Yamadutas, provoked to fury, the messengers, of the grim king of the dead. Iron cudgels, heavy hammers and mallets, sharp lances, heated jars, all full of agony, frightful forests of sword-blades, heated sands, thorny salmalis—these and many other instruments of torture such a man endures in the catacombs of Yama, O Bhaarata. After being thus exorcised of his sins in the land of death's grim lord, the ingrate returns to this world and is born among vermin. He lives as a rat or a mouse for fifteen years. He has then to enter a human womb and suffer abortion a hundred times in succession. After this, he is born into some intermediate order between man and inanimate nature. Having endured such misery for a great many years, he must be born as a hairless tortoise, and spend long years in his shell until his sins are exhausted and he is born human again.

A man who steals curds will be born as a crane. One becomes a monkey by stealing raw fish. That man of intelligence who steals honey will be born a wretched gadfly. By stealing fruits or roots or rice-cakes one becomes an ant. By stealing nishpava one becomes a halagolaka. By stealing payasa one becomes a tittiri bird. By stealing sweet cakes, one becomes a screech-owl. That man of little intelligence who steals iron has to be born a crow. That man of little understanding who steals white brass has to take birth as a bird of the harita species. By stealing a vessel of silver, one becomes a pigeon. By stealing a vessel of gold, one has to be born as a rodent. By stealing a piece of silken cloth, one becomes a krikara. By stealing a piece of cloth made of red silk, one becomes a vartaka. By stealing a piece of muslin, one becomes a parrot. By stealing a piece of cloth that is of fine texture, one becomes a duck after leaving one's human body. By stealing a piece of cloth made of cotton, one becomes a crane. By stealing a piece of cloth made of jute, one becomes a sheep in one's next life. By stealing a piece of linen, one has to be born as a hare. By stealing different kinds of colouring matter, one must be born as a peacock. By stealing a piece of red cloth, one has to take birth as a bird of the jivajivaka species.

By stealing unguents such as sandalwood paste and perfumes in this world, the man of greed, O king, has be born as a mole. Assuming the form of a mole, he lives that life for fifteen years. After the exhaustion of his sin through such suffering, he regains a human form. By stealing milk, one becomes a crane. That man, O king, who through a darkening of his mind, steals oil, will be reborn as an animal that lives in oil.

That wretch who, himself armed, kills an unarmed man, either to have his victim's wealth or from feelings of hostility, will, after leaving his human body, be born as a donkey, a form in which he lives for two years and then meets a violent death from a sharp weapon. Leaving his donkey's body, he is born as a deer, always filled with anxiety at the thought of all the predators that might kill him. Upon the expiration of a year from the time of his birth as a deer, he has to yield up his life at the point of a weapon. He next takes birth as a fish and dies in consequence of being hauled up in a net, after having been a fish for four months. He has next to be born as a beast of prey. For ten years he has to live as a predator, and then he is born as a leopard, particularly, in which form he has to live for five years. Impelled by the change brought about by time, he then casts off that form and, his sins having been exhausted, regains the status of a man.

That man of little understanding who kills a woman has to go to Yamaloka to endure diverse kinds of misery and torment. He then has to pass through full one and twenty further transformations. After that, O monarch, he is born as a rodent. Living as a rat in filth for twenty years, he regains his humanhood.

By stealing food, a man will be born as a bee. Living for many months in the company of other bees, his sin is exhausted and he is born human again. By stealing paddy, he becomes a cat. That man who steals food mixed with sesame cakes becomes a mouse in his next birth, as big or small as the amount of food he stole. He bites humans every day and as a consequence, garners further sin and travels through a varied round of rebirths.

The fool who steals ghee has to be born as a gallinule. That wicked one who steals fish has to take birth as a crow. By stealing salt, one has to be born a mocking bird. He who misappropriates what is left with him in trust, has to sustain a diminution in the period of his life, and after his death, he is born among fishes. Having lived for some time as a fish, he dies and regains his human form. However, he is short-lived.

Indeed, having sinned, O Bhaarata, one has to take birth into an order intermediate between that of humankind and vegetables. Such persons of little wit are entirely unacquainted with dharma, which has their own hearts for its authority. Men who commit diverse sins and then seek to expiate them through continuous vows and observances of piety, become instilled with both happiness and misery and live in great anxiety of heart.

Sinners who yield to greed and sin are surely born as Mlecchas that do not deserve to be associated with. On the other hand, men who abstain from sin all their lives become free from disease of every kind, are endowed with beauty of form and possessed of wealth. Women also, when they do as I have said, attain to births of the same kind, good and bad. Indeed, they have to be born as the mates of the beasts I have spoken of.

I have told you all the sins that relate to the appropriation of what belongs to others. I have discoursed to you very briefly on the subject, O Anagha. You will hear again, and further, of these, O Bharata, in connection with some other subject. I heard all this, O king, in days of old, from Brahma himself, and I asked all about it in a becoming manner, when he discoursed upon it in the midst of the Devarishis. I have told you truly and in detail about everything that you asked. Having listened to all this, O monarch, do you always set your heart on dharma, great righteousness.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have told me, O regenerate one, what the end is of adharma and sin. I desire now to hear, O most eloquent one, what the end is of dharma. Having committed diverse acts of sin, by what karma do men succeed in attaining to an auspicious end in this world? By what deeds, also, do men attain to an auspicious end in heaven?'

Brihaspati says, 'By committing sins with a perverted mind, one yields to the sway of adharma and as a consequence, finds hell for oneself. That man who, having perpetrated sinful deeds through the stupefaction of his mind, feels the pangs of repentance and sets his heart on dhyana of God, does not have to endure the results of his sins. One is freed from one's sins in direct proportion to which one repents for them. If having committed a sin, O king, one confesses and proclaims it in the presence of Brahmanas who know dharma, one is quickly cleansed from the obloquy arising from one's sin. One emerges from consequences and disgrace, fully or otherwise, like a snake from his diseased slough. By making, with a concentrated mind, gifts of various kinds to a Brahmana, and concentrating the mind upon one's chosen god, a sinner purifies himself and attains to an auspicious end.

I shall now tell you what those gifts are, O Yudhishtira, by making which a man, even if guilty of having sinned, may be blessed with punya. Of all kinds of dana, annadana, that of food, is regarded as the best. One who wishes for punya should, with a sincere heart, make gifts of food. Food is the life-breath of men. From it all creatures are born. All the worlds of living creatures are established upon food. Hence food is lauded. The Devas, Rishis, Pitris and men, all give praise to food.

King Rantideva, in olden days, went to swarga by making gifts of food. Food that is good and which has been acquired lawfully, should be given, with a cheerful heart, to such Brahmanas as are possessed of Vedic lore. That man has never to take birth in an intermediate order, whose food, given with a cheerful heart is eaten by a thousand Brahmanas. By feeding ten thousand Brahmanas, a man transcends even piety and becomes devoted to yoga.

A Brahmana who knows the Vedas, by giving away food acquired by him as alms to another Brahmana devoted to the study of the Vedas, succeeds in attaining to felicity here in this world. The Kshatriya who, without taking anything that belongs to a Brahmana, protects his subjects lawfully, and gives offerings of food, acquired through the exercise of his strength, to Brahmanas distinguished in Vedic knowledge, with a concentrated heart, succeeds by this dakshina, O Dharmatman, in purifying himself of all his sins. The Vaisya who divides the produce of his fields into six equal shares and makes a gift of one of those shares to deserving Brahmanas, washes himself of all his sins. The Sudra who, earning food won by hard labour and at the risk of life itself, makes a gift of it to Brahmanas, is exorcised of every sin.

That man who, by putting forth his physical strength, earns food without injuring any creature and makes a gift of it to Brahmanas, avoids all sorrows and disasters. By cheerfully making gifts of food acquired by lawful means to Brahmanas pre-eminent for their knowledge of Vedic lore, a man is washed of all his sins. By treading in the path of the righteous, one is freed from all sins.

By giving such food as produces great energy, a man becomes himself filled with great tejas. The path made by the charitable is always trodden by those that are gifted with wisdom. They that give offerings of food are regarded as givers of life. The punya they acquire through such gifts is eternal. Hence, a person should, under all circumstances, seek to earn food by lawful means, and having earned it, to always make gifts of it to deserving men.

Food is the great refuge of the world of living creatures. By giving annadana, one has never to go into hell. Hence, one should always make gifts of food, having earned it by lawful means. The householder should always seek to eat after having made a gift of food to a Brahmana. Every man should make the day fruitful by giving dana of food. By feeding, O king, a thousand Brahmanas, all of whom are conversant with dharma and the shastras and the sacred Puranas, a man never has to go into naraka or to return to this world to suffer rebirths. Blessed with the fruition of his every wish, he enjoys untold bliss hereafter. Possessed of such punya, he lives in joy, freed from every anxiety, possessed of beauty of form and great fame and endowed with wealth.

I have thus told you all about the high merit of annadana, the gift of food. Even this is the root of all dharma and punya, as also of all dakshina and dana, O Bhaarata.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Non-violence, the observance of the Vedic ritual, meditation, subjugation of the senses, penances and obedient services rendered to the preceptors—which amongst these is fraught with the greatest punya?'

Brihaspati says, 'All these six are fraught with merit. They are different doors of piety. I shall speak of them; do you listen, O king of the Bharatas. I shall tell you what constitutes the highest good for a human being.

The man who practises the religion of universal compassion achieves his highest good. That man who keeps under control the three faults—lust, wrath and greed—and practises the virtue of compassion, attains to success. He who, from motives of his own benefit or pleasure, kills other harmless creatures, never attains to weal in the next world. That man who regards all creatures as his own self, and behaves towards them as towards his own self, laying aside the rod of punishment, and completely subjugating his wrath, succeeds in attaining to bliss.

The very Devas, who wish for a fixed abode, cannot discern or fathom the glorious path of the man who makes himself the soul of all creatures and looks upon them all as his own self, for such a person leaves no trace or trail. One should never do to another that which one regards as injurious to one self. This, in brief, is the law of dharma.

By doing otherwise, yielding to desire, one becomes guilty of adharma, of sin. In refusals and gifts, in happiness and misery, in the agreeable and the disagreeable, one should judge their effects by a reference to one's own self. When one injures another, the injured turns around and injures the injurer. Similarly, when one cherishes another, that other cherishes the cherisher. One should frame all one's conduct according to this. I have told you what dharma is even in this subtle way.'

The guru of the Devas, that Mahabuddhi, having said all this to King Yudhishtira the just, flies straight up into the heavens and vanishes.'" Vaisampayana said, "After this, Yudhishtira of mighty tejas, foremost of eloquent men, addresses his Grandsire lying on his bed of arrows.

CANTO 114

Yudhishtira says, 'O you of great intelligence, the Rishis and Brahmanas and the Devas, led by the authority of the Vedas, all laud that religion which has daya, compassion, for its indication. But, O king, what I ask you is this: how does a man who has perpetrated acts of injury to others in word, thought and deed save himself from misery?'

Bhishma says, 'Brahmavadis, utterers of Brahman, have said that there are four kinds of compassion or non-violence. If even one of those four kinds is not observed, the dharma of karuna is not observed. As all four-footed animals are incapable of standing on three legs, even so the dharma of daya, the religion of compassion, cannot stand if any of those four divisions or parts is wanting. As the footprints of all other animals are engulfed in those of the elephant, even so all other religions are said to be in that of compassion. A person becomes guilty of injury, violence, through acts, words and thoughts. Discarding it mentally at first, one should next discard it in word and deed. He who, according to this law, abstains from eating meat, is said to be purified in a threefold way. It is heard that utterers of Brahman ascribe to three causes the sin of eating meat. That sin may attach to the mind, to words and to deeds. It is for this reason that men of wisdom who are endowed with tapasya refrain from eating meat. Listen to me, O king, as I tell you what the faults are that attach to the eating of meat.

The meat of other animals is like the flesh of one's son. That foolish man, his man darkened by tamas, who eats meat is regarded as the vilest of human beings. The union of father and mother produces a child. After the same manner, the cruelty that a helpless and sinful wretch commits by devouring flesh, produces its progeny of repeated rebirths fraught with great misery. As the tongue is the cause of the knowledge or sensation of taste, so do the scriptures declare that attachment proceeds from taste.

Well-dressed, cooked with or without salt, meat, in whatever form one may consume it, gradually attracts the mind and enslaves it. How will those fools that subsist upon meat succeed in listening to the sweet music of the drums and cymbals and vinas and flutes of heaven? They who eat meat applaud it highly, suffering themselves to be deluded by its taste, which they pronounce to be something inconceivable, indescribable and unimaginable. Even such praise of meat is full of sin.

In the olden days, many righteous men, by giving the flesh of their own bodies, protected the flesh of other creatures and as a consequence of such acts of punya, attained to heaven. In this way, O king, the religion of compassion is surrounded by four considerations. And I have thus declared to you that dharma which contains all other dharma within it.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have said many times that abstention from violence, from doing injury, is the highest religion. In sraddhas, however, performed in honour of the Pitris, men must, for their own good, make offerings of many kinds of meat. You have said so yourself while discoursing upon the laws in respect of sraddhas. How can meat be procured without killing a living creature? Your declarations seem contradictory to me, and a doubt has arisen in my mind about the dharma of abstaining from meat.

What are the sins that one incurs by eating meat, and what are the merits that one wins by doing so? What are the sins of him who eats meat by himself killing a living creature? What are the merits of him who eats the meat of animals killed by others? What is the punya and paapa of him who kills a living creature for another? Or of him who eats meat, buying it from others? I wish, O sinless one, that you should discourse to me on this subject in detail. I want to know clearly about this eternal religion with certainty.

How does one attain to longevity? How does one acquire strength? How does one attain to faultlessness of limbs? Indeed, how does one become invested with all excellent indications?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to me, O scion of Kuru's race, what the punya is that attaches to abstaining from meat. Listen to me as I declare to you what the laws, in truth, are on this matter. Those Mahatmans who desire beauty, faultlessness of limbs, long life, understanding, mental and physical strength, and memory, must abstain from acts of injury. On this subject, innumerable discourses took place between the Rishis. Listen, Yudhishtira, to what their opinion was.

The punya acquired by that man who, with the steadfastness of a vrata, adores the Devas every month in horse sacrifices, is equal to his who eschews honey and meat. The seven celestial Rishis, the Balakhilyas, and those Rishis who drink the rays of the sun, all of fathomless wisdom, laud abstention from meat. The Self-born Manu has said that the man who does not eat meat, or who does not kill living creatures, or who does not cause them to be killed, is a friend of all creatures. Such a man cannot be oppressed or wounded by any creature. He enjoys the confidence of all living beings. He always enjoys, besides, the approbation and commendation of the righteous.

The Dharmatma Narada has said that the man who wishes to increase his own flesh by eating the flesh of other creatures, meets with disaster. Brihaspati has said that the man who abstains from honey and meat acquires the punya of dana and yagnas and tapasyas. In my estimation, these two are equal: he who adores the gods every month with an Aswamedha yagna for a hundred years, and he who abstains from honey and meat. Because of abstention from meat one comes to be regarded as one who always adores the gods in sacrifices, or as one who always makes gifts to others, or as one who always undergoes the severest austerities.

That man who having eaten meat gives it up afterwards, acquires merit that is so great that a study of all the Vedas or a performance, O Bhaarata, of all the sacrifices, cannot bestow its like. It is exceedingly difficult to give up meat after one has become acquainted with its taste. Indeed, it is exceedingly difficult for such a person to observe the high vow of abstention from meat, a vow that reassures every creature by dispelling all fear. That learned person who gives to all living creatures the dakshina of complete reassurance comes to be regarded, without doubt, as the giver of prana, life-breaths, in this world.

Even this is the high religion which men of wisdom eulogise. The life-breaths of other creatures are as dear to them as those of their own self. Men blessed with intelligence and pure souls should always behave towards other creatures after the manner in which they would like others to behave towards them. It is seen that even those men who possess great learning and who seek to achieve the highest good in the form of mukti, are not free from the fear of death. What need be said of those innocent and healthy creatures imbued with love of life, when they are sought to be slain by sinful wretches who live by such slaughter?

For this reason, O king, know that the renunciation of meat is the highest refuge of dharma, of swarga, and of ananda. Non-violence is the highest dharma. It is, again, the highest tapasya. It is also the highest truth from which all dharma proceeds. Flesh cannot be had from grass or wood or stone. Unless a living creature is slain, it cannot be eaten. Hence lies the sin in eating flesh.

The Devas who live upon Swaha, Swadha and Soma, are devoted to truth and sincerity. Those men, however, who are for gratifying the sensation of taste, should be known as Rakshasas wedded to the guna of rajas. That man who abstains from meat is never put in fear, O king, by any creature, wherever he may be, in a terrible wilderness or inaccessible fastnesses, by day or by night, or during the two twilights, in the open squares of towns or in assemblies of men, from upraised weapons or in places where there is great fear from wild animals or snakes. All creatures seek his protection. He is an object of confidence with all creatures. He never causes any anxiety in others, and has never himself to become anxious.

If there was no one who ate flesh, there would then be none to kill living creatures. The man who kills living creatures kills them for the sake of the one who eats flesh. If flesh were regarded as inedible, there would then be no slaughter of living creatures. It is for the sake of the eater that the slaughter of living creatures continues in the world. Since, O you of great splendour, the life-span of men who butcher living creatures or cause them to be butchered is shortened, it is clear that the man who wishes his own good should give up meat entirely.

Savage men, who engage in the slaughter of living creatures, never find protectors when they are in need. Such men should always be assailed and persecuted even as beasts of prey.

Through greed or dullness of the mind, for the sake of strength and energy, or through association with sinners, the disposition manifests itself in men to sin. That man who seeks to increase his own flesh by eating the flesh of others has to live in this world in great anxiety, and after dying, must be born into mediocre or base races and families. High Rishis devoted to the observance of vows and self-restraint have said that abstention from meat is worthy of every praise, that it fetches fame and heaven, and is a great propitiation by itself. This I heard in days of old, O son of Kunti, from Markandeya when that Rishi discoursed on the sins of eating flesh.

He who eats the flesh of animals that are eager to live but have been killed by either himself or others, incurs the sin that attaches to the slaughter for his cruelty. He who buys meat kills living creatures through his wealth. He who eats meat kills living creatures by eating them. He who binds or seizes and actually kills living creatures is the butcher. These are the three kinds of slaughter.

He who does not himself eat meat but approves of a slaughter is stained with the sin of slaughter. By abstaining from meat and showing compassion to all creatures one renders oneself immune to being harmed by any creature, and acquires a long life, perfect health and happiness. The punya acquired by a person by abstaining from meat is superior to that of one who makes a gift of gold, of kine and of land. One should never eat meat of animals not dedicated in sacrifices and that are killed in vain, and that has not been offered to the Devas and Pitris in accordance with the laws. There is not the slightest doubt that a person by eating such meat goes to hell.

If one eats meat that has been sanctified from its having been procured from animals dedicated in sacrifices and that have been slain for the purpose of feeding Brahmanas, one incurs a little fault. By doing otherwise, one surely becomes stained with sin. That wretch among men who slays living creatures for the sake of those who would eat them, incurs great sin. The eater's paapa is not as great. That beast among men who, following the path of religious rites and sacrifices laid down in the Vedas, would yet kill a living creature from the lust to eat its flesh, will certainly become a resident in hell.

That man who, having eaten meat later abstains from it, attains to great merit by his renunciation. He who arranges for getting hold of meat, he who approves of the arrangements for devouring meat, he who kills, he who buys or sells, he who cooks, and he who eats, are all regarded as flesh-eaters.

I will now cite another authority, depending upon what was declared by the Great Ordainer himself, and established in the Vedas. It has been said that the religion which has karma for its indications has been ordained for householders, O best of kings, and not for those who wish for mukti. Manu himself has said that meat which is sanctified with mantras and properly dedicated, according to the laws of the Vedas, in rites performed in honour of the Pitris, is pure. All other meat falls under the class of what is obtained by despicable slaughter, and leads to hell and infamy. One should never eat, Lord of the Bharata vamsa, even like a Rakshasa, any meat that has been procured by means not sanctioned by the laws. Indeed, one should never eat flesh obtained from meaningless slaughter and that has not been sanctified by the Vedas.

The man who wishes to avoid grief and calamity of every kind should abstain from the meat of every living creature. It is heard that in the ancient kalpa, those who wanted to attain to auspicious worlds hereafter, performed sacrifices with seeds and not animals. Filled with doubts about the propriety of eating flesh, the Rishis asked Vasu the ruler of the Chedis to solve them. King Vasu, knowing that flesh should not be eaten, answered that it was edible, O monarch. From that moment Vasu fell down from the firmament into the earth. After this he once more repeated his opinion, and he had to sink below the earth into Patala for it.

Desirous of benefiting all men, the high-souled Agastya, with the help of his penances, dedicated, once for all, all wild deer to the Devas. Hence, there is no longer any necessity to sanctify those animals to offer them to the deities and the Pitris. Served with flesh according to the law, the Pitris become gratified.

Listen to me, king of kings, to what I tell you now, O sinless one. There is complete happiness in abstaining from meat. He that undergoes severe austerities for a hundred years and he that abstains from meat, are both equal in point of merit. This is my firm opinion.

During the bright fortnight of the month of Karttika in particular, one should abstain from both honey and meat. In this, it has been ordained, there is great punya. He who abstains from meat for the four months of the rains acquires the four valued blessings of achievements, longevity, fame and might. He who abstains for the whole month of Karttika from meat of every kind, transcends all kinds of woe and lives in perfect happiness. They who abstain from flesh for either months or fortnights at a stretch have the realm of Brahma ordained for them as the fruit of their abstention from cruelty.

Many kings in ancient days, O son of Pritha, who had identified themselves with the souls of all creatures and who were conversant with the truths of all things, both Soul and Not-soul, abstained from eating flesh either for the whole of the month of Karttika or for all of the lighted fortnight in that month. These were Nabhaga and Ambarisha and the high-souled Gaya and Ayu and Anaranya and Dilipa and Raghu and Puru and Kartavirya and Aniruddha and Nahusha and Yayati and Nriga and Vishwaksena and Sasabindu and Yuvanaswa and Sibi, the son of Usinara, and Muchukunda and Mandhatri, and Harischandra.

Do you always speak the truth, and never lie. Truth is an eternal duty. It is through Truth that Harischandra roves through heaven like a second Chandramas. These other kings also, Syenachitra, O monarch, and Somaka and Vrika and Raivata and Rantideva and Vasu and Srinjaya, and Dushmanta and Karushma and Rama and Alarka and Nala, and Virupaswa and Nimi and Janaka of great intelligence, and Aila and Prithu and Virasena, and Ikshvaku, and Sambhu, and Sweta, and Sagara, and Aja and Dhundhu and Subahu, and Haryaswa and Kshupa and Bharata, O Yudhishtira, did not eat flesh during the month of Karttika and for that attained to swarga, and blessed with prosperity, blazed forth with refulgence in Brahmaloka, adored by Gandharvas and surrounded by thousands of Apsaras of incomparable beauty.

Those Mahatmans who practise this exceptional dharma of complete non-violence surely find heaven for themselves. Righteous men who, from their very birth, allow no honey, meat or wine to pass their lips, are regarded as Munis. The man who lives the dharma of never eating flesh or who recites it for others to hear, will never have to go into hell even if he is utterly evil in other ways.

He, O king, who often reads these laws about abstaining from meat, the injunctions that are sacred and adored by the Rishis, or hears them read, is cleansed of every sin and attains to great felicity from having every wish fulfilled. He also attains to a position of pre-eminence among kinsmen. When afflicted with any great trouble, he readily transcends it. When obstructed with impediments, he overcomes them with the utmost ease. When ill with disease, he is swiftly and marvellously cured, and afflicted with sorrow he is liberated from it, again with great ease. Such a man has never to be born into the intermediate species of animals or birds. Born human always, he attains to great beauty of person. Blessed with great prosperity, he acquires great fame as well.

I have thus told you, O king, all that need be said on the subject of abstaining from meat, together with the niyamas with respect to both the religion of pravritti and nivritti as framed by the Rishis.' "

"Yudhishtira says, 'Alas, cruel men, who, abjuring diverse kinds of fine food, covet only flesh, are really like great Rakshasas. They do not relish diverse kinds of paistika, cakes, haritas, vegetables, and various kinds of succulent and flavoursome handas, stems and roots, as much as they do flesh. I am bewildered by this. I must conclude that, this being so, there is nothing which can compare with meat. I wish, O mighty one, to hear what the merits are of refraining from meat, and the sins that attach to the eating of flesh. You are conversant with every duty. Tell me in full about this, agreeably to the laws of dharma. Tell me what may be eaten and what must not. Tell me, Pitamaha, what is flesh, of what substances it is, the merits that attach to not eating it, and what the sins are that attach to consuming meat.'

Bhishma says, 'It is even so, O Mahabaho, just as you say. There is nothing on earth that is superior to meat in taste. There is nothing that is more beneficial than meat to those who are thin, or weak, or afflicted by disease, or addicted to sexual congress or exhausted with travel. Flesh swiftly increases strength. It produces great growth and energy. There is no food, O Parantapa, which is superior to flesh. But, Kurunandana, the merits are great that attach to men that abstain from it. Listen to me as I speak of this.

That man who wishes to augment his own body with the flesh of another living creature is such that there is none meaner and more cruel than he. In this world there is nothing that is dearer to a creature than its life. Hence, instead of taking that invaluable possession, one should show mercy for the lives of others as one does to one's own life. Without doubt, O son, flesh has its origin in the vital seed. There is great sin that comes from eating it, as, indeed, there is equal merit in abstaining from it.

One does not, however, incur any fault by eating meat sanctified according to the laws of the Vedas. The Sruti says that animals were created for sacrifice. They who eat meat in any other way are said to follow the Rakshasa way. Listen to me as I tell you what the law is that has been laid down for the Kshatriyas. They do not incur any fault by eating meat that has been acquired through the expenditure of prowess. All deer of the wilderness were dedicated to the Devas and the Pitris in the days of old, O king, by Agastya. Hence, the hunting of deer is not forbidden or censured. There can be no hunting without risk to one's own life. There is an equal risk to the slayer and the slain. Either the animal is killed or it, or another wild beast, kills the hunter in the jungle. Hence, O Bhaarata, even Rajarishis betake themselves to hunting, and are not tainted by sin. Indeed, hunting is not regarded as sinful.

There is nothing, O joy of the Kurus, that is equal in punya, either here or hereafter, to the showing of karuna to all living creatures. The man of compassion has no fear. Such harmless men that are blessed with mercy have both this world and the next. Sages who know dharma say that the dharma is worthy of being called true dharma which has non-violence for its indication.

The man with a pure heart should only do such deeds as have compassion for their soul. That flesh which is dedicated in sacrifices performed in honour of the Devas and the Pitris is called havi, and is worthy of being eaten. The man who is devoted to compassion and who behaves with compassion towards others, has no fear to entertain from any creature. I have heard that all other creatures abstain from causing any fear to such a one. Whether he is wounded or has fallen down, or is weakened, in whatever state he may be, all creatures will protect him. Indeed, they do so, under all circumstances, and everywhere. Neither snakes nor wild animals, neither Pisachas nor Rakshasas, will ever kill him.

When danger threatens, he is freed from fear who frees others from situations of fear. There has never been, nor will there ever be, a gift that is superior to the gift of life. It is certain that there is nothing dearer than life itself. Death, O Bhaarata, is a calamity, an evil to all creatures. When the time comes for death, a trembling of the whole body is seen in every living creature.

Enduring birth in the womb, decrepitude and afflictions of diverse kinds, in this samsara, this ocean of the world, living creatures are seen to be continually going forth and returning. Every creature is overcome by death. While dwelling in the womb, all creatures are immersed in the uterine juices, which are alkaline and sour and bitter, and mixed with the essences of urine and phlegm and faeces—juices that cause pain and are difficult to bear. There in the womb, they have to dwell in a condition of utter helplessness and are even repeatedly stirred, tossed and scalded, frequently torn and aborted.

They that are covetous of meat are seen to be repeatedly plunged in diverse wombs in such helplessness. Attaining to myriad kinds of birth, they are cooked in the uterine hell called Kumbhipaka. They are assailed and killed, and in this way have to travel repeatedly. Thus, there is nothing so dear to one as one's life when one comes into this world. Hence, a man or woman with a pure soul should be compassionate, indeed, merciful to all living creatures. That man, O king, who refrains from every kind of meat from his very birth, without doubt, acquires a vast space in swarga.

They who eat the flesh of animals, who themselves wish to live, are themselves eaten by the animals they eat. Since he has eaten me, I shall eat him in return—even this, O Bhaarata, is the very character of flesh, mamsa as mamsa. The killer is always killed. After him the eater meets with the same fate.

He who shows violence and cruelty toward another in this life becomes the victim of similar violence and cruelty from his victim. Whatever one does in whatever bodies, one has to suffer the consequences in those bodies.

Non-violence, abstention from cruelty, is the highest dharma. Abstention from cruelty is the highest niyama. Abstention from cruelty is the highest dakshina. Abstention from cruelty is the highest tapasya. Abstention from cruelty is the highest yagna. Abstention from cruelty is the highest urjas. Abstention from cruelty is the highest mitra. Abstention from cruelty is the highest sukha. Abstention from cruelty is the highest satya. Abstention from cruelty is the highest Sruti.

Dakshinas given in all sacrifices, ablutions performed in all sacred tirthas, and the punya that one acquires from giving all kinds of dana enjoined in the scriptures—all these do not measure up to ahimsa in the merit that attaches to it. The penances of a man who abjures cruelty are inexhaustible. The man that is without violence and harm is regarded as always performing sacrifices. The man who renounces violence is the father and mother of all creatures. Even these, O Lord of Kuru's vamsa, are some of the merits of non-violence. Altogether, the punyas that attach to it are so many that they cannot be exhausted, even if one were to speak of them without pause for a hundred years.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Wishing to die or wanting to live, many men give up their lives in the great sacrifice of battle. Tell me, Pitamaha, what is the end to which these attain? To throw away life in battle is fraught with sorrow for men. O you of great wisdom, you know that to give up life is difficult for men whether they are in prosperity or adversity, in felicity or calamity. I do believe that you are possessed of omniscience. Do you tell me the reason why this is so.'

Bhishma says, 'In prosperity or adversity, in happiness or sorrow, living creatures, O king of the earth, coming into this world, live after a certain manner. Listen to me as I explain the reason to you. The question you have asked me is excellent, Yudhishtira. Let me explain to you the old narrative of the discourse that took place once between the island-born Rishi Vyasa and a crawling worm.

In the days of old, when that learned Brahmana, Krishna Dwaipayana, having identified himself with Brahman, roamed over the world, he saw, on a road over which carts used to pass, a worm moving along as fast as it could go. The Rishi knew the ways of every creature and the language of every animal. Possessed of omniscience, he addressed the worm he saw in these words.

Vyasa said, "O Krimi, you seem to be most alarmed, and to be in great haste. Tell me, where do you run, and why are you so afraid?'

The worm said, "Hearing the rattle of yonder large cart, I am filled with fear. O you of great intelligence, how fierce is the roar it makes. It is almost come! Will it not kill me? It is for this that I am flying as fast as I can. As it draws near, the sound I hear is of bulls. They are breathing hard under the whip of the driver, as they draw their heavy burden. I hear also the many voices of the men who drive the bulls. A creature like myself, born a worm, cannot bear to hear sounds. It is for this reason that I fly from this situation of great fright. Death is felt by all creatures to be fraught with pain. Life is an acquisition difficult to have. Hence do I fly in fear, for I do not wish to pass from a state of happiness to one of grief."

The island-born Vyasa said, "O worm, whence can be your happiness? You belong to a lowly order of being. I think death would be fraught with happiness to you. Sound, touch, taste, scent and diverse kinds of excellent enjoyments are unknown to you, O worm. I think, death will prove a benefit to you."

The worm said, 'A living creature, in whatever life or situation he may find himself, grows attached to it. Even as a worm I am happy, I think, O you of great wisdom. It is for this that I wish to live. In even this condition, every object of enjoyment exists for me according to the needs of my body. Humans and creatures that spring from immobile objects all have different enjoyments. In my past life I was a human. O mighty one, I was a Sudra possessed of great wealth. I was not devoted to the Brahmanas. I was cruel, vile in conduct, and a usurer. I was harsh in speech. I regard cunning as wisdom. I hated all creatures. Taking advantage of pretexts in compacts made between myself and others, I was always given to taking away what belonged to others.

Without feeding servants and guests arrived at my house, I used to fill, when hungry, my own belly, under the impulse of pride, and was always greedy for good food. Greedy I was for wealth; I never dedicated, with faith and reverence, any food to the Devas and the Pitris although dharma required me to offer food to them. Men that came to me, moved by fear, to seek my protection, I cut adrift without giving them any sanctuary. I did not extend my protection to those that came to me with prayers to dispel their fear. I used to feel unreasonable envy at seeing other people's wealth, and grain, and wives held dear by them, and fine spirits, and goodly mansions. Seeing the happiness of others, I was filled with envy and I always wished poverty upon them.

Following only that course which promised to crown my own wishes with fruition, I sought to destroy the virtue, wealth and pleasures of others. In that past life of mine, I committed diverse deeds largely laden with cruelty and other such dark passions. Recollecting those ways, I am filled with repentance and grief even as one is filled with grief at the loss of one's dear son. As a result of those actions of mine, I do not now know or enjoy the fruits of any good deeds.

However, I worshipped my old mother and on one occasion, worshipped a Brahmana. Endued with high birth and accomplishments, that Brahmana, in the course of his wanderings, came to my house once as a guest. I received him with reverent hospitality. In consequence of the punya attaching to that act, my memory has not forsaken me. I think that just because of that hospitality I shall succeed, some day, in regaining happiness.

O you of great tapodhana, you know everything. Do you in kindness tell me what will fetch me weal."'

CANTO 118

'Vyasa said, "It is indeed because of a good deed, O worm, that you, though born in this lowly species of being, are not stupefied in your mind. That blessing is mine, O Krimi, because of which you are not plunged in dark perplexity. Through the power of my tapasya, I am able to save a being of sin merely by granting him a sight of my person. There is no stronger might than the might that attaches to tapasya. I know, O worm, that you have been born in the order of Krimis through the evil karma of your past life. If, however, you think of attaining to dharma and punya, you may again attain to humanity.

The Devas, as well as others crowned with ascetic success, enjoy or endure the consequence of karma done by them in this kshetra, the field of deeds. Amongst men, also, when deeds of punya are performed, they are performed from the desire of reward and not otherwise. The very accomplishments that one seeks is sought from a desire for the happiness they will bring. The creature that is learned or ignorant of a former life, in this one, is without speech and understanding and hands and feet, why, is really destitute of everything.

He that becomes a superior Brahmana adores, while alive, the deities of the sun and the moon, uttering various sacred mantras. O worm, you shall attain to that state of existence. Attaining to that status, you will enjoy all the elements transformed into the objects of kama. When you have attained to that state, I shall impart to you the very Brahman. Or, if you wish, I can send you to any other order of existence."

The worm, acquiescing in what Vyasa proposed, did not leave the road, but remained on it. Meanwhile, the large cart arrived there. Crushed to pulp by the assault of its wheels, the worm gave up his life-breath. Born after many more intermediate births, next into the Kshatriya varna through the grace of Vyasa of immeasurable puissance, he went to see the great Rishi.

He had, before becoming a Kshatriya, to pass through diverse orders of being, such as a hedgehog and an iguana and a boar and a deer and a bird, and a Chandala and a Sudra and a Vaisya. Having given an account of his various transformations to the Rishi of truth, and remembering the Rishi's kindness towards him, the worm, now become a Kshatriya, fell with folded hands at the Rishi's feet and touched them with his head.

The worm said, "My present birth is a high one coveted by all and attained by the possession of the ten well-known attributes. Indeed, I who was once a worm have attained to the status of a prince. Elephants of great strength, decked with golden chains, bear me on their backs. To my chariots are yoked Kamboja steeds of high mettle. Grand carriages, yoked to camels and mules, bear me on my way. With all my relatives and friends I now eat food rich with meat. Worshipped by all, I sleep, O most blessed one, on costly beds in delightful rooms into which disagreeable winds cannot blow.

Towards the small hours of every night, Sutas and Magadhas and other encomiasts sing and chant my praises even as the Devas eulogise Indra, their king. Through your grace, who are firm in truth and imbued with immeasurable tejas, have I who was a worm now become a royal Kshatriya. I bow my head to you, O you of great wisdom. Do you command me what I should do now. Ordained by the power of your penances has this lofty condition become mine."

Vyasa said, "I have today been worshipped by you, O king, with many reverent words. Transformed into a worm, your memory had become clouded. That memory has appeared again. The sin you committed in a past life has not yet been destroyed—that sin earned by you while you were a Sudra covetous of wealth and cruel in behaviour and hostile to Brahmanas. But you were able to obtain a sight of my person. That was a blessing to you while you were a worm. And now, again, from your having saluted and worshipped me, you shall rise higher, for, from the Kshatriya varna you will become a Brahmana, if only you cast off your life on the field of battle for the sake of either holy kine or Brahmanas. O Kshatriya, enjoying great felicity and performing many sacrifices with copious dakshina, you will then attain to swarga, and transformed into eternal Brahman, you will have perfect and eternal beatitude.

Those that are born into the intermediate species of animals become Sudras when they evolve. The Sudra rises to the status of the Vaisya; and the Vaisya to that of the Kshatriya. The Kshatriya who takes pride in the discharge of his svadharma, succeeds in becoming a Brahmana. The Brahmana, by following righteous conduct, attains to swarga that is full of great bliss.'"

CANTO 119

Bhishma says, 'Having cast off the condition of being a worm and having been born a Kshatriya of great urjas, the one of whom I speak remembered his previous transformations, O Rajan, and began to perform severe austerities. Seeing that rigorous tapasya of the Kshatriya, who was well-conversant with dharma and artha, the island-born Krishna, Vyasa foremost of Brahmanas, went to him.

Vyasa said, "The penances that pertain, O worm, to the Kshatriya consist of the protection of all creatures. Do you regard these duties of the Kshatriya varna to be the tapasya laid down for you. You shall then attain to the status of a Brahmana. Ascertaining what is right and what is wrong, and cleansing your soul, do you duly cherish and protect all creatures, judiciously gratifying all goodly desires and correcting all that is unholy. Be you of pure soul, be you contented and be devoted to the practice of dharma. Conducting yourself in this way, you will, when you cast off your life, become a Brahmana."

Although he had in fact retired into the vana, yet, O Yudhishtira, having heard the words of the great Rishi he began to cherish and protect his subjects righteously. Soon, O best of kings, that worm, from the due discharge of the royal dharma of protecting his subjects, became a Brahmana after casting off his Kshatriya body. Beholding him transformed into a Brahmana, the celebrated Rishi, the island-born Krishna of great wisdom came to him again.

Vyasa said, "O Dvijottama, best of Brahmanas, O blessed one, be not troubled through fear of death. He who lives in dharma attains to an honourable birth. He, on the other hand, who sins attains to a low and vile birth, O you that know dharma well, and misery becomes his lot, in the measure of his sin. Therefore, O worm, do not be troubled through fear of death. The only fear you should entertain is about the loss of dharma. Do you, therefore, continue to live righteously."

The worm said, "Through your grace, O Holy One, I have evolved and risen from happy to happier births and lives. Having obtained such prosperity as has its roots in righteousness, I think, my sins have been lost."

Having, at the command of the holy Rishi, attained to the life of a Brahmana that is so difficult to have, the worm caused the earth to be marked with a thousand yupastambas, sacrificial stakes. That best of all men who know the Brahman then acquired a home in the realm of Brahma himself. Indeed, O son of Pritha, in time the worm attained to the highest condition, that of the eternal Brahman, as the result of his own actions done in obedience to the counsels of Vyasa. Those bulls among Kshatriyas, also, who have given up their lives on the field of Kurukshetra, exerting their Kshatriya energy the while, have all attained to an auspicious end. Therefore, O king, do not mourn on their account.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Which of these three is superior—gyana, tapasya or dana? I ask you this, O foremost of righteous men. Tell me this, Pitamaha.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the old story of the conversation between Maitreya and the island-born Krishna. Once upon a time, the island-born Krishna, O king, while wandering over the world in disguise, went to Varanasi and waited upon Maitreya who belonged by birth to a race of Munis. Seeing Vyasa arrive, that foremost of Rishis, Maitreya, gave him a seat and, after worshipping him with the due rites, fed him with excellent food. Having eaten that fare, which was most wholesome and produced every satisfaction, the high-souled Vyasa was quite delighted and as he sat there; he even laughed aloud.

Seeing Krishna Dwaipayana laugh, Maitreya said to him, "Tell me, O Dharmatman, why you laugh. You are an ascetic, and able to control your emotions. Great joy, it seems, has come over you! Saluting you, and worshipping you with head bent, I ask you this—what is the power is of my penances and what is the high blessedness that is yours? The karma that I do is different from yours. You are already emancipated though still with prana. I, however, am not yet free. For all that, I think that there is not much difference between you and me. I am, again, distinguished by birth."

Vyasa said, "This wonder that filled me arose from a law of the Vedas that seems exaggerated, and from its paradox, just for the comprehension of the people. The declaration of the Vedas seems to be untrue. But why should the Vedas proclaim an untruth? It has been said that there are three paths which constitute the best vows of a man—one should never injure, one should always tell the truth and one should give dakshina. The Rishis of old announced this, after the declarations of the Vedas. These injunctions were heard in days of old, and we must certainly follow them even in our times.

Even a small dakshina, given in accordance with the laws laid down, produces great fruits. To a thirsty man you have given a little water with a sincere heart. Yourself thirsty and hungry, you have, by giving me such food, conquered many high regions of grace, O mighty one, even as one does through many sacrifices. I am extraordinarily delighted with your most sacred gift, as also with your tapasya. Your might is that of dharma; your appearance is that of dharma. The fragrance of dharma is about you. I think that all your actions are performed in accordance with the laws.

O son, superior to ablutions in sacred waters, superior to the accomplishment of all Vedic vows, is charity. Indeed, O Brahmana, dana is more auspicious than all sacred rituals. It is more meritorious than all the holy karmas; there can be no question about its superiority.

All those rituals laid down in the Vedas which you laud do not measure up to dana, for giving is invested with the most transcendent punya.

The path that has been made by men who gave dana is the path trodden by the wise. They who give dana are regarded as givers of prana, life-breath. The karmas that constitute dharma are established in them. As the Vedas when well-studied, as the restraining of the senses, as a life of universal renunciation, even so is a gift which is full of great and unequalled punya. You, O son, will rise from joy to greater joy from having set yourself to the dharma of giving dana. The man of intelligence who practises this virtue certainly only rises from joy to greater joy. I have met with many direct instances of this.

Men blessed with prosperity succeed in acquiring wealth, making gifts, performing sacrifices, and earning happiness as the result of giving. It is always seen, O you of great wisdom, to occur naturally that happiness is followed by sorrow, and sorrow by happiness. Men of wisdom have said that human beings in this world possess three kinds of conduct. Some are righteous, some are sinful, and some are neither righteous nor sinful. The conduct of the one who is devoted to Brahman is not regarded either way. His sins are never regarded as sins. So also the man who is devoted to the duties ordained for him is regarded as neither righteous nor sinful for the observance of those duties.

Men who are devoted to yagna, dana and tapasya are regarded as righteous. Those, however, that injure other creatures and are hostile towards them, are regarded as sinful. There are some men who appropriate what belongs to others. These certainly fall into hell and meet with suffering and sorrow. All other karma that men do are indifferent, being neither righteous nor sinful. Do you sport and grow and rejoice and make gifts and perform sacrifices. Neither men of knowledge nor those endowed with penances will then be able to have the better of you.'"

CANTO 121

Bhishma says, 'Thus addressed by Vyasa, Maitreya, who was a worshipper of karma, who had been born into a clan blessed with great prosperity, who was wise and possessed of deep learning, said these words to him.

Maitreya said, "O you of great wisdom, without doubt it is as you have said. O mighty one, with your leave I wish to say something."

Vyasa said, "Whatever you wish to say, O Maitreya, say, O you of great wisdom, for I wish to hear you."

Maitreya said. "What you said on the subject of dana is faultless and pure. Without doubt, your soul has been purified by gyana and tapasya. And from your soul being purified, even this is the great advantage I reap from it. With my understanding I see that you are endowed with great tapasya. And as for me, I succeed in acquiring prosperity only through a sight of Mahatmans like you. I think that is due both to your grace and also flows from the nature of my own karma.

Penances, knowledge of the Vedas, and birth into a pure vamsa—these are the causes for which a man may be called a Brahmana. When a man has these three, then does he come to be called a true Brahmana. If such a Brahmana be gratified, the Pitris and the Devas are also gratified. There is nothing superior to a Brahmana possessed of Vedic lore. Without the Brahmana, all would be darkness. Nothing would be known. The four varnas would not exist. The distinction between dharma and adharma, satya and asatya would cease.

From a well-tilled field, an abundant harvest can be reaped. Even so, one may reap great merit by making gifts to a Brahmana possessed of profound learning. If there were no Brahmanas endowed with Veda gyana and good vyavahara, who accept dakshina from the wealthy, the wealth of the rich would be useless and in vain.

The ignorant Brahmana, by eating the food that is offered to him, destroys what he eats for it produces no punya to him that gives it. The food that is eaten also destroys the eater for the eater incurs sin by eating what is offered to him. Only that may be properly called edible which is given away to a deserving man; in all other cases, he that takes it makes the giver's gift refuse, and the receiver is ruined for improperly accepting it.

The Brahmana possessed of learning becomes the conqueror of the food that he eats. Having eaten it, he begets other anna of many kinds. The ignorant man who eats the food offered to him loses his right to the children he begets, for the latter become his whose food enabled the progenitor to beget them. Even this is the subtle fault that attaches to those who eat other men's food when they do not have the power to win that food.

The punya which the giver acquires by making the gift, is equal to what the taker acquires by accepting the food. Both the giver and the acceptor depend equally upon each other. Even this is what the Rishis have said. Where Brahmanas exist, who own Veda gyana and vyavahara, the people are enabled to earn the sacred fruits of dakshina and to enjoy them both here and hereafter.

Those men who are of pure lineage, who are entirely devoted to tapasya, and who give dakshina and study the Vedas, are regarded as worthy of the most reverent worship. It is such good men that have charted the path, which treading one does not become deluded. It is those men that are the leaders of others into swarga. They are the men who bear on their shoulders the burden of sacrifices and live for eternity.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Thus addressed, the holy Vyasa replied to Maitreya, saying "By good fortune, you are endowed with knowledge. Through good fortune, your understanding is of this kind. They that are good laud all righteous attributes. That personal beauty and youth and prosperity do not succeed in overwhelming you is through good fortune. This favour done to you is due to the grace of the gods. Listen to me as I tell you about what is superior even to dana.

Whatever shastras and Puranas and other scriptures there are, whatever righteous inclinations are found in the world, they have flowed in their due order from the Vedas. Following them I laud dana. You praise tapa and Vedic lore. Tapasya is sacred. Penance is the means by which one may acquire the Vedas and swarga as well. Through tapasya and gyana, one attains to the highest fruits, as I have heard. It is by tapasya that one destroys one's sins and all else that is evil.

With whatever purpose one undertakes penance, one attains one's goal. The same may be said of gyana. Whatever is difficult to accomplish, whatever is difficult to conquer, what is difficult to attain, and whatever is difficult to cross over, can all be achieved with the help of tapasya. Of all things, penance is imbued with great power.

The man who drinks alcohol, or he that takes by force what belongs to others, or he that is guilty of foeticide, or he that violates the bed of his guru, succeeds in absolving himself of his sins with tapasya. Indeed, one is cleansed of all sins through penance. One possessed of all knowledge and thus with true vision, and an ascetic of whatever kind, are equal. One should always bow to these two. All men should be worshipped who have Veda dhana, the Vedas for their wealth. Similarly, all men endowed with tapasya deserve to be worshipped.

Those who give dana gain happiness hereafter and great prosperity here. Righteous men of this world, by making annadana, obtain both this world and that of Brahma himself along with many other realms of transcendent felicity. Men who are revered by all, themselves revere him who gives dana. Men that are honoured everywhere themselves honour him who make gifts. Wherever the giver goes, he hears himself praised. He who performs karma and he who does not each gets what is proportionate to his deeds and omissions. Whether one dwells in the upper regions or in the nether, one always attains to those places to which one becomes entitled by one's karma.

As for yourself, you will certainly have whatever food and drink you may wish for, for you are blessed with intelligence, a good birth, Vedic knowledge, and compassion. You are possessed of youth, O Maitreya! You observe vratas. Be you devoted to dharma. Learn now from me of the dharma which you should first follow, the dharma of grihastas, householders. In that house in which the husband is gratified with his wife, and the wife with her husband, all auspicious results ensue. As filth is washed away from the body with water, as darkness is dispelled by the splendour of fire, even so is sin washed away by dana and tapasya.

Bless you, O Maitreya, let wondrous palaces be yours. I now depart hence in peace. Do you bear in mind what I have said, and you shall reap many rewards."

Maitreya then walked around his illustrious guest in pradakshina and bowed his head to him and, joining his hands in reverence, said, "Let blessing be on you also, O Holy One!"'

Yudhishtira says, 'O you that know every dharma, I wish to hear, in detail, how good and chaste women conduct themselves. Pitamaha, discourse to me on this.'

Bhishma says, 'Once upon a time, in the celestial realms, a woman called Sumana, of Kekaya's race, addressed Sandili of great tejas, knower of the truth of all things, and indeed omniscient, and she said, "With what vyavahara, O auspicious devi, by what course of actions, have you succeeded in attaining to swarga, rid of every sin? You blaze forth with your own lustre like a flame of Agni. You seem to be a daughter of Surya, the Lord of stars, come to heaven through your own radiance.

You wear raiment of pure white, and are joyful and at your ease. Seated on that celestial vimana, you shine, O auspicious devi, with your lustre increased a thousandfold. You have surely not attained to this world of bliss with any inconsiderable tapasya, dana and vratas. I beg you, tell me about yourself."

Thus questioned lovingly by Sumana, Sandili of sweet smiles, addressing her beautiful interrogatrix, answered her thus out of the hearing of others.

"I did not wear yellow robes, nor the bark of trees. I did not shave my head; nor did I grow jata, matted locks on my head. It is not through such means that I have attained to the condition of a devastri, a woman of heaven.

I never, even forgetfully, spoke in the least disagreeably, let alone evilly, to my husband. I was always devoted to the worship of the Devas, the Pitris and Brahmanas. Always heedful, I waited upon and served my mother-in-law and father-in-law, and I never behaved with deceit, for that was my vow. I would never lounge at the door of our home nor did I speak long with anybody. I never did anything malicious or otherwise sinful; I never laughed aloud; I never did any injury. I never disclosed any secret. Even thus did I bear myself always.

When my husband, having left home upon any work, returned, I always served him by giving him a comfortable seat, and worshipped him with reverence. I never ate food of any kind without my husband's knowledge and by which he might be displeased.

Rising at early dawn, I did and caused to be done whatever was needed for the sake and weal of relatives and kinsmen. When my husband left home to journey to distant parts on work, I remained at home and engaged myself in many kinds of auspicious karmas to bless his enterprise. Verily, during the absence of my husband I never used kohl, or wore jewellery; I never bathed myself thoroughly or wore garlands or used perfumes, fine pastes or lotions, or decked my feet with lac, or my person with ornaments.

When my husband slept peacefully I never awakened him even if important business required his attention. I was happy to sit by him lying asleep. I never urged my husband to exert himself to earn more wealth to support his family and relatives. I always kept his secrets without disclosing them to others. I would always keep our home clean. That woman who with dhyana adheres to this path of her true dharma, of serving her husband, always receives considerable rewards and honours in swarga, even like a second Arundhati."

The illustrious, righteous and blessed Sandili said this to Sumana on the subject of a woman's dharma towards her husband, and disappeared before her eyes. That man, O son of Pandu, who reads this tale on every full moon and new moon, succeeds in attaining swarga and enjoying great bliss in the Nandana vana.'

"Yudhishtira says, 'Which is greater, sama, conciliation, or dana? Tell me, Lord of the Bharata vamsa, which of these two is superior in efficacy to gain punya?'

Bhishma says, 'Some become gratified by conciliation, while others are gratified by gifts. Every man, according to his own nature, affects the one or the other. Listen to me, O king, as I explain to you the merits of sama, so that the most furious creatures may be appeased by it. Hear the ancient tale of how a Brahmana, who was seized in the forest by a Rakshasa, was freed by conciliation.

A certain Brahmana, possessed of eloquence and intelligence, fell into distress, for he was seized in a lone forest by a Rakshasa who wanted to feed on him. The Brahmana, who owned understanding and composure, was not in the least agitated. Without allowing himself to be affrighted at the sight of that dreadful fiend, he resolved to use conciliation and see what effect it had on the Rakshasa.

The Rakshasa, respectfully greeting the Brahmana, insofar as words went, said to him, "You shall escape, but you must tell me for what reason I am pale and so lean."

Reflecting for a moment, the Brahmana replied in calm, well-spoken words.

The Brahmana said, "Dwelling in a place that is distant from your home, moving in a world that is not your own, and deprived of the companionship of your friends and kinsmen, you are enjoying vast affluence. It is for this that you are so pale and lean. Verily, O Rakshasa, your friends, though well-treated by you, are yet not well-disposed towards you because of their own vicious natures. It is for this that you are pale and lean.

You are endowed with merit and wisdom and a well-regulated soul. Yet it is your lot to see others that are devoid of punya and gyana honoured above yourself. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Persons possessed of affluence much greater than yours but inferior to you in accomplishments do, verily, show scant regard for you. It is for this that you are pale and lean.

Though distressed through want of the means of support, you are led by the nobility of your soul to ignore such means as are open to you for your sustenance. It is for this that you are pale and lean. In consequence of your righteousness, you once deprived yourself to do good to another. This other, O righteous Rakshasa, thinks you deceived and vanquished by his superior intelligence. It is for this that you are pale and lean. I think that you grieve for those who, with souls overwhelmed by lust and wrath, are suffering misery in this world. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Though graced with the wealth that is wisdom, you are ridiculed by others who are entirely unwise.

Verily, those of evil ways condemn you. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Some enemy of yours, with a friendly tongue, came to you and behaved at first like a righteous one; and then he has left you, after deceiving you wretchedly. It is for this that you are pale and lean. You well know the ways of the world's affairs; you are knowing of all the mysteries. You are imbued with ability. Those who know you to be such yet do not respect and praise you. It is for this that you are pale and lean.

Finding yourself amongst evil men banded together in some enterprise, you discoursed to them, dispelling their doubts. For all that they did not admit your superior merits. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Verily, though without artha, Buddhi or the Vedas, you still wish, through your strength alone, to accomplish something great. It is for this that you are pale and lean. It seems that although you are resolved to undergo severe austerities by retiring into the forest, yet your kinsmen are not favourably inclined towards this decision. It is for this that you are pale and lean.

A friend of yours, who owns great wealth and is blessed with virile youth and handsome features, covets your wife. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Even the most excellent words you speak, in the midst of wealthy men, they do not regard as wise or timely. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Some dear but witless kinsman of yours, though repeatedly instructed in the scriptures, has become angry. You have not succeeded in pacifying him. It is for this that you are pale and lean.

Having first set you to the accomplishment of some object desirable to you, someone now seeks to snatch the fruit thereof from your grasp. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Indeed, though possessed of excellent accomplishments and worshipped by all on that account, you are yet regarded by your kinsmen as worshipped for their sake and not for your own. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Through shame, you cannot give out some purpose in your heart, moved also by the inevitable delay that must occur in its achievement. It is for this that you are pale and lean.

With your intelligence, you want to bring under your influence diverse persons with myriad kinds of understandings and inclinations. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Without true learning, without courage, and without much wealth, you seek such fame as is won by knowledge, prowess and gifts. It is for this that you have been pale and lean. You have not been able to acquire something upon which you have set your heart for a long time. Or that which you seek to do, another seeks to undo. It is for this that you are pale and lean.

Truly, without any fault on your part, you have been cursed by somebody. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Without both wealth and accomplishments, you seek in vain to dispel the grief of your friends and the sorrows of sorrowing men. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Beholding righteous men living in grihastasrama, and sinners living in vanaprastha, and muktas attached to domesticity and fixed homes, you have become pale and lean.

Your actions with regard to dharma, artha and kama, as also the well-timed words that you speak, do not bear fruit. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Though endowed with wisdom, yet desirous of living, you live with wealth gained from one of evil ways. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Watching adharma increase on every side and dharma languishing, you are filled with grief. It is for this that you are pale and lean. Urged by time, you seek to please all your friends even when they are disputatious and ranged on sides opposite to one another. It is for this that you are pale and lean.

Beholding men possessed of Vedic lore engaged in sinful deeds, and those of learning unable to keep their senses under control, you are filled with grief. It is for this that you are pale and lean."

Thus roundly praised, the Rakshasa worshipped that learned Brahmana, and making him his friend and bestowing sufficient wealth upon him in dakshina, did not eat him but allowed him to leave unharmed.'

CANTO 125

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, Pitamaha, how a poor man, wanting to achieve his own good, should bear himself after having acquired the condition of humanity and come into this field of karma that is so difficult to attain. Tell me also what the best of all gifts is, and what should be given under what circumstances. Tell me, O son of Ganga, who are truly deserving of honour and worship; it becomes you to discourse to me on these mysteries.'

Thus questioned by that famed monarch, the son of Pandu, Bhishma explains to that king these high and subtle mysteries of dharma.

Bhishma says, 'Listen to me with dhyana, O Rajan, as I explain to you the mysteries of dharma, after the same manner in which the holy Vyasa explained them to me in days of yore. This subject is a mystery to the very Devas, Yudhishtira. Yama of stainless deeds, with vows well-observed and yoga dhyana, acquired the knowledge of these mysteries as the high fruits of his tapasya. What pleases what Devas, what pleases the Pitris, the Rishis the Pramathas, who belong to Mahadeva, the Devi Sri, Chitragupta who records all things for Yama, and the mighty Diggajas, the elephants that support the world, what constitutes the religion of the Rishis—the dharma of many mysteries and which yields high fruits; the merits of what is called great dakshina, and the punya that attaches to all the sacrifices: he who knows these, O sinless one, and knowing, lives according to his knowledge, is freed from taint if he has sins and acquires the great rewards that are told of.

Equal to ten butchers is one oilman. Equal to ten oilmen is one drinker of alcohol. Equal to ten drinkers of alcohol is one courtesan. Equal to ten courtesans is a single chieftain. A great king is said to be equal to half of all these together. Hence, one should not accept gifts from these. On the other hand, one should attend to the vigyana, the science, which is sacred and has righteousness for its indications, of dharma, artha and kama. Amongst these, wealth and pleasure are naturally attractive. Hence, one should, with concentration, listen to the sacred expositions on dharma in particular, for the fruits are very great of listening to the mysteries of religion.

One must listen to everything that concerns dharma as ordained by the gods themselves. In it is contained the ritual in respect of the sraddha, in which have been declared the mysteries connected with the Pitris. The mysteries of all the Devas have also been explained there. It also includes the dharmas and karmas, which yield great merit, of the Rishis, together with the secrets that attach to them. It contains an exposition of the punya of great sacrifices and those that attach to all kinds of gifts.

Men who always read the scriptures on these subjects, those who bear them properly in their minds, and he who, having listened to them, follows them in practice, are all regarded to be as holy and sinless as the all-mighty Narayana himself. The merits that attach to the gift of kine, those that belong to the performance of ablutions in sacred waters, those that are won by the performance of sacrifices—all these are acquired by that man who treats his guests, Atithis, with reverence.

They who listen to these shastras, they who are invested with faith, and they who have a pure heart, it is well-known, conquer many regions of bliss. Righteous men of faith are cleansed of all stains and no sin can touch them. Such men always increase in dharma and attain to swarga.

Once upon a time, a celestial messenger, coming to the court of Indra of his own accord, but remaining invisible, addressed the king of the Devas in these words, "At the command of the Aswini Kumaras, those twin gods who are the foremost of all physicians, and who are blessed with every desirable attribute, have I come to this place where I behold Manavas and Pitris and the Devas assembled together. Why, indeed, is sexual congress forbidden to the man who performs a sraddha and for him also who eats at a sraddha, for the particular day? Why are three rice-balls offered separately at a sraddha? To whom should the first of those rice-balls be offered? To whom should the second one be offered? And whose has it been ordained is the third, remaining one? I wish to know all this."

When the celestial messenger had spoken these words about righteousness and duty, the Devas who were seated to the east, and the Pitris also, applauded that ranger of the sky, and began to answer him.

The Pitris said, "Welcome are you, and blessings upon you! Do you listen, O best of sky rangers. The question you have asked is a high one and full of deep meaning. The Pitris of that man who indulges in sexual congress on the day he performs a sraddha, or eats at a sraddha have to lie for a whole month on his loins' seed. As for the rice-balls offered at a sraddha, we will tell you what should be done with them one after another. The first rice-ball should be cast into water. The second ball should be given to one of the wives to eat. The third ball should be cast into the blazing fire. Even this is the law declared in regard of the sraddha. Even this is the law that is followed according to the rites of dharma.

The Pitris of that man who follow this injunction become gratified with him and remain always joyful. The progeny of such a man increases and inexhaustible wealth always remains at his command."

The celestial duta said, "You have explained the division of the rice-balls and their consignment one after another to the three—water, the wife and the fire, together with the reasons thereof. Whom does that rice-ball which is consigned to the waters reach? How does it, by being so consigned, gratify the Devas and how does it redeem the Pitris? The second ball is eaten by the wife. So has it been laid down in the law. How do the Pitris of that man whose wife eats the second rice-ball become the eaters thereof? The last ball goes into the fire. How does that final rice-ball succeed in finding its way to you, or who is he to whom it goes? I wish to hear this—what ends are attained by the rice-balls offered at sraddhas when cast into the water, given to the wife, and consigned to the fire?"

The Pitris said, "Great is this question which you have asked. It involves a rahasya, a secret mystery, and is fraught with wonder. We have been exceedingly gratified by you, O ranger of the sky! The very Devas and the Munis give praise to karmas done in honour of the Pitris. Even they do not know what the certain conclusions are of the laws in respect of the deeds done to honour the Manes. Excepting the high-souled, immortal and excellent Markandeya, most learned Brahmana of great fame, who is ever devoted to the Pitris, none amongst the Dvijas knows the mysteries of the laws in respect of the Pitris."

Having heard from the holy Vyasa what the end is of the three rice-balls offered at the sraddha, as explained by the Pitris themselves in reply to the question of the celestial messenger, I will explain that to you. Do you listen, O Yudhishtira, to what the conclusions are regarding the laws about the sraddha. Listen with attention, O Bhaarata.

That rice-ball which goes into water is regarded as gratifying Soma, the moon. That god, thus gratified, O you of great intelligence, gratifies in return the other Devas and the Pitris, also, with them. It has been enjoined that the second rice-ball should be eaten by the wife of the man that performs the sraddha. The Pitris, who are ever desirous of progeny, confer children on the woman of the house when she eats that second ball. Listen now to what becomes of the rice-ball that is cast into the fire. With that rice-ball, the Pitris are gratified and they grant the fruition of all his wishes to the one offering it.

I have told you everything about the three rice-balls offered at the sraddha and consigned to the holy three—water, the wife and the fire.

The Brahmana who becomes the ritwik at a sraddha embodies the Pitris of the person performing the sraddha. Hence, he should abstain that day from sexual intercourse even with his own wife. The man who eats at a sraddha should keep himself pure for that day. By doing otherwise, he surely incurs the sins I have spoken of. Hence, the Brahmana who is invited to a sraddha to eat the offerings should eat them after purifying himself with a bath and bear himself piously for that day by abstaining from every kind of injury or evil. The progeny of such a one multiply, and he who feeds him reaps the same reward.'"

"Bhishma continues, 'After the Pitris said what they did, a Rishi of austere penances, Vidyutprabha, whose form shone with splendour like that of the sun, spoke. Having heard those mysteries of dharma as propounded by the Pitris, he addressed Sakra, saying, "Stupefied by folly, men kill many different creatures born in the intermediate species, worms and ants and snakes and sheep and deer and birds. Heavy is the measure of sin they incur by this. What is the remedy?"

When this question was asked, all the Devas and Rishis endued with tapodhana and the highly blessed Pitris, applauded that ascetic.

Sakra said, “Thinking in one’s mind of Kurukshetra and Gaya and Ganga and Prabhasa and the lakes of Pushkara, one should immerse one’s head in water. By so doing one is cleansed of all one’s sins like Chandramas being freed from Rahu. One should bathe in this way for three days in succession and fast every day. Besides this, one should touch the back of a cow after bathing and bow one’s head to her tail.”

Vidyutprabha once more addressed Vasava, “I will declare a rite that is more subtle. Listen to me, O you of a hundred sacrifices. Rubbed with the astringent powder of the hanging roots of the banyan tree and anointed with the oil of priyangu, one should eat shashtika paddy mixed with milk. By doing this, one is washed of all one’s sins. Listen now to another rahasya unknown to many but which was discovered by the Rishis through dhyana. I heard it from Brihaspati while he recited it in the presence of Mahadeva. O king of the Devas, do you hear it with Rudra in your company, O Lord of Sachi.

If a man climbs a mountain, stands there on one foot, with arms upraised and palms joined together, and abstaining from food looks at a blazing fire, he acquires the merits of severe tapasya and obtains the rewards that attach to fasts. Seared by the rays of the sun, he is purified of all his sins. One who does this in both summer and winter, is freed from every sin. Exorcised, he acquires a splendour of complexion for all time. Such a man blazes with energy like the sun or shines in beauty like the moon.”

He of a hundred sacrifices, Indra seated in the midst of the gods, then sweetly addressed Brihaspati, saying these excellent words, “O Holy One, do you duly discourse on what those mysteries of dharma are which are full of happiness for human beings, and what the sins are which they commit, together with the mysteries that attach to them.”

Brihaspati said, “They who urinate facing the sun, they who do not show reverence for the wind, they who do not pour libations on the sacred fire, they who milk a cow whose calf is very young, from greed to get as much milk as they can from her, all sin. I will declare what those sins are, O Lord of Sachi. Do you listen to me.

Surya, Vayu, Agni the bearer of sacrificial oblations, O Vasava, and kine who are the mothers of all creatures, were created by the Self-born himself, to redeem all the worlds. These are the gods of humans. Listen all of you to the conclusions of dharma.

Those vile men and base women who urinate facing the sun, live in great infamy for eighty-six years. That man, O Sakra, who cherishes no reverence for the wind, has children that fall prematurely from the womb of his wife. Men who do not pour libations on the fire, find that the fire, when they do ignite it for rites they wish to perform, refuses to consume their libations. Men who drink the milk of kine whose calves are very young, are never blessed with any children to perpetuate their vamsas. Such men see their children die and their clans shrink. These are the consequences of those sins, as observed by enlightened souls venerable for age in their families. One should always avoid that which has been forbidden, and do only that which has been enjoined, if one wants to achieve prosperity. This that I say to you is the truth."

After the Devaguru had said this, the blessed Devas, with the Maruts, and the great Rishis questioned the Pitris, saying, "O Pitris, by what deeds of men, who are generally endowed with little understanding, do you become gratified? What gifts, made in course of sraddhas for the departed, become inexhaustible in punya? Through what karmas can men become free from the debt they owe to the Pitris? We wish to hear this. Great is the curiosity we feel."

The Pitris said, "Blessed ones, you have properly asked about the doubt in your hearts. Listen as we declare what righteous men do that gratify us. Bulls of blue complexions should be set free. Gifts should be made to us, on the day of the new moon, of sesame seeds and water. In the season of rains, lamps should be lighted. By doing these men can free themselves from the debt they owe to the Pitris. Such gifts are never in vain; indeed, they become inexhaustible and yield exalted rewards. For the satisfaction we derive from them is endless.

Besides these, men who, full of faith, beget offspring, save their departed ancestors from terrible hell."

Hearing these words of the Pitris, Vriddha-Gargya, possessed of tapodhana and great tejas, was so filled with wonder that the hair on his body stood on end. He said, "You that are all possessed of the wealth of tapasya, tell us what the merits are that attach to the setting free of blue bulls. What punya, again, attaches to the gift and lighting of lamps during the rains and the dakshina of water with sesame seeds?"

The Pitris said, "If a blue-complexioned bull, upon being set free, raises even a small quantity of water with its tail, the Pitris of the one who freed that bull are slaked with that water for full sixty thousand years. The mud such a bull raises with its horns from the banks of a river or lake, without doubt, sends the Pitris of him that set the animal free to the realm of Soma. By giving and lighting lamps in the season of rain, one shines with effulgence like Soma himself. The man who gives lamps is never subject to tamas, which is darkness. Men who make gifts on the day of the new moon of sesame seeds and water, mixed with honey and using a vessel of copper, O you of tapodhana, are regarded as duly performing a sraddha with all its deep and intricate mysteries. These men are blessed with children of sound health and cheerful hearts.

The punya acquired by the offerer of the pinda to the Pitris takes the form of the growth of his vamsa. Surely, he who performs these karmas with faith, is freed from the debt he owes to the Pitris.

Even thus have been ordained the proper time for the performance of a sraddha, the law in respect of the rites to be observed, the proper person that should be fed at the sraddha, and the merits that attach to it. I have declared everything to you in their due order.'"

Bhishma says, 'When the Pitris had finished, Indra addressed the puissant Hari, saying, "O Lord, what are those karmas by which you become pleased? How do men succeed in gratifying you?"

Vishnu said, "What I abhor is Brahmanas being spoken ill of or disrespected. Have no doubt that if Brahmanas are worshipped, I regard myself worshipped. All superior Brahmanas should always be reverenced, after feeding them with all sincere hospitality. One should also worship one's own feet in the evening. I am pleased with men who do this, as also with those who worship and make offerings to the whorl that is seen on cowpats when they first drop from the cow.

They who see a Brahmana who is dwarfish in stature, or a boar that has just risen from water and bears on his head mud from the bed or the bank, will never to meet with any evil. They are freed from every sin. The man who daily worships the Aswattha and Gorochana and the cow, is regarded as worshipping the whole universe with the Devas and Asuras and Manavas.

Verily, dwelling within these men, I myself accept the worship that is offered to them. Yes, the worship offered to these is worship offered to me. This has been the way since the worlds were first created. Men of small understanding that worship me otherwise, do so in vain, for worship of that kind I never accept; such worship does not gratify me."

Indra said, "Why do you laud the circular marks on cow-dung, one's own feet, the boar, the Brahmana who is a dwarf, and mud raised up from the earth? It is you who create and you who destroy all these. You are the eternal nature of all things mortal and transitory."

Hearing Indra, Vishnu smiled a little and said, "It was with my chakra that the Daityas were slain. It was with my two feet that the worlds were covered. Assuming the form of a boar, I slew Hiranyaksha. Assuming the form of a dwarf, I conquered the Asura King Bali. Those Mahatmans who worship these please me. Verily, they who worship me in these forms never meet with any discomfiture, let alone grief. If one sees a Brahmana who is a brahmachari arrived at one's house, and offers him the first portion of one's food, which belongs by right to a Brahmana, and eats what remains, one is regarded as eating amrita.

If, after adoring the dawn, the morning sandhya, one stands with face turned towards the sun, one reaps the punya that accrues from the performance of ablutions in all the tirthas and is purified of all sins. You Rishis possessed of tapodhana, I have told you in detail of what constitutes a great rahasya."

Baladeva said, "Listen now to another great mystery filled with happiness for men; the ignorant ones, who do not know it, meet with great distress at the hands of other creatures. That man who, rising before dawn, touches a cow, ghee and curds, as also mustard seeds and the larger variety called priyangu, is washed of all sin. As for Rishis possessed of tapodhana, they always avoid all creatures both ahead and behind them, as also all that is impure while performing sraddhas.

The Devas said, "If a man take a vessel of copper, fill it with water and, facing the east, resolves upon a fast or the observance of a particular vow, the gods become pleased with him and all his wishes are crowned with success. By keeping upavasa, or vratas in any other way, men of little understanding gain nothing. In uttering the resolution about the observance of fasts and in making offerings to the Devas, the use of a vessel of copper is preferred. In making the offerings to the deities, in giving and accepting alms, in offering arghya and in offering tarpana, oblations of water mixed with sesame seeds to the Pitris, also, a copper vessel should be used. By performing these rites in any other way, one acquires little merit. Even these mysteries have been declared as to how the Devas are gratified."

Dharma Deva said, "The offerings made in all rites in honour of the Devas and those in honour of the Pitris should never be given away to a Brahmana who has served under the king, or who rings the bell or attends to subsidiary duties in acts of worship or at sraddhas, or that keeps kine, or who is engaged in trade, or that follows some art as a profession, or that is an actor, or who quarrels with friends or who is without Vedic studies, or one that marries a Sudra woman. The performer of the sraddha who gives dakshina to such a Brahmana falls away from prosperity and begets no children. He fails, again, to satisfy his Pitris by what he does.

From the home of that person whence a guest returns unsatisfied, the Pitris, the Devas and the sacred fires, all turn away disappointed. That man who does not discharge the dharma of hospitality towards the guest arrived at his home comes to be regarded as equally sinful as those that are slayers of women or of cows, that are ungrateful towards benefactors, that are killers of Brahmanas, or violators of the beds of their gurus."

Agni said, "Listen with concentrated attention. I will name the sins of the man of evil heart who raises his foot to kick a cow, a most blessed Brahmana or a burning fire. The infamy of such a man spreads throughout the world and touches the confines of heaven itself. His Pitris become filled with fear. The Devas become wroth with him. Agni refuses to accept his libations. For a hundred lives he has to suffer and rot in hell. He is never saved. So, one should never touch a cow with one's feet, or a Brahmana of tejas, or a burning fire, if one has faith and desires one's own good, for terrible are the torments such a sinner has to endure."

Viswamitra said, "Listen to a deep and high rahasya of dharma unknown to most men. He who offers the Pitris rice boiled in sugared milk, sitting with his face turn to the south at noontide, in the shade of an elephant's body, in the month of Bhadrapada, under the Magha nakshatra, acquires untold punya. Listen to what that punya is. The man who makes such an offering to the Pitris in such circumstances, is regarded as performing a great sraddha each year for thirteen years in succession."

The cows said, "That man is washed of all his sins who adores a cow with these mantras: O Bahula, O Samanga, O you that are fearless everywhere, O you that are forgiving and full of auspiciousness, O friend, O source of all plenitude in the world of Brahma. In days of yore, you were present with your calf at the sacrifice of Indra, the wielder of the thunderbolt. You took your place in the firmament and in the path of Agni. The Devas with Narada among them adored you on that occasion by calling you Sarvamsaha, who endures all things and forgives.

Such a man attains to the realm of Purandara. He acquires, besides, the merits that attach to kine, and the splendour of Chandramas also. Such a man becomes freed from every sin, every fear, and every grief. Finally, he finds a home in the happy world of the thousand-eyed Indra!"

After this, the blessed and celebrated Saptarishis, with Vasishta at their head, rose, and circumambulating the Lotus-born Brahma stood around him with hands joined in reverence. Vasishta, that foremost of all who know the Brahman, became their spokesman and asked this question which is beneficial to every creature, but especially so to Brahmanas and Kshatriyas. "By doing what karma may men of righteous conduct who are, however, without the wealth of this world, succeed in acquiring the merits of performing sacrifices?"

Hearing this question of theirs, the Grandsire Brahma replied to them.

Brahma said, 'Excellent is this question, O most blessed ones. It is at once auspicious and high and laden with a secret. This question that you have asked is subtle and is full of profound weal to mankind. You tapodhana Rishis, I will answer you properly, in detail. Do you listen with attention to what I say about how men acquire the punya of sacrifices even when they are unable to perform them through being poor.

In the lighted fortnight of the month of Pausha, when the nakshatra Rohini is in conjunction with the moon, if one purifies oneself with a bath, lies under the canopy of heaven, clad in a single piece of raiment, with faith and fixed dhyana, and drinks the rays of the moon, one acquires the merits that attach to the performance of Mahayagnas, great sacrifices. You foremost of Dvijas, this is a high mystery that I declare to you in reply to your questions, you that are possessed of insight into the subtle truths of all subjects of enquiry."

Vibhavasu, otherwise called Surya, said, "There are two offerings. One of those consists of a palmful of water and the other called akshata consists of rice grains with ghrita. One should, on the day of the full moon, stand facing that bright orb and make to him the two offerings. The man who makes these offerings is said to adore his sacred fire. Verily, he is regarded as one that has poured libations on the three principal agnis.

That man of little understanding who cuts down a large tree on the day of the new moon, is stained with the sin of Brahmahatya. By killing even a single leaf one incurs that sin. The foolish man who chews a tooth-twig on the day of the new moon is regarded as injuring Soma Deva by what he does. The Pitris of such a person become wroth with him. The Devas do not accept the libations poured by such a man on days of the full and the new moon. His Pitris become enraged with him, and his race and family become extinct."

The Devi Sri said, "That sinful house, in which eating and drinking vessels and chairs and beds lie scattered, and in which women are beaten, the Devas and Pitris leave in disgust. Verily, without accepting the offerings made to them by the owners of such houses, the gods and the Manes fly away from such a sinful habitation."

Angiras said, "The children of that man increase who stands every night for a full year under a karanjaka tree with a lamp to cast light on it, and holds besides in his hand the roots of the suvarchala plant."

Gargya said, "One should always perform the dharmas of hospitality to one's guests. One should give lamps in the hall or shed where sacrifices are performed. One should avoid sleep during the day, and abstain from all kinds of flesh, why, all food. One should never injure cows and Brahmanas. One should always chant the names of the Pushkara lake and the other sacred tirthas. Such a course of dharma is the foremost. Even this constitutes a high religion with its mysteries. If observed, it is sure to yield great rewards. If a man performs even a hundred sacrifices, he is doomed to see the exhaustion of the punya attaching to the libations poured therein. The dharmas, however, which I have mentioned are such that when done by a man imbued with faith, their merit becomes inexhaustible.

Listen now to another high rahasya concealed from the view of many. The Devas do not accept the libations poured upon the fire on the occasion of sraddhas and rites in their honour, or during rituals that are performed on ordinary lunar days or on the especially sacred days of the Paurnima and Amavasya, if they behold a woman in her season of impurity or one that is the daughter of a mother afflicted with leprosy. The Pitris of the man who allows such a woman to come near the place where the sraddha is being performed by him, are never gratified with him for thirteen years.

Clad in white raiment, and becoming pure in body and mind, one should invite Brahmanas and cause them to utter their blessings and mantras when one performs the sraddha. On such occasions one should also recite the Mahabharata. It is by observing all these that the offerings made at sraddhas become inexhaustible."

Dhaumya said, "Broken utensils, broken bedsteads, roosters and dogs, as also such trees as have grown within dwellings, are all inauspicious. In a broken utensil is Kali himself, while in a broken bedstead is loss of wealth. When a cockerel or a dog is in sight, the Devas do not eat the offerings made to them. Under the roots of a tree, scorpions and snakes find shelter. Hence, one should never plant a tree within one's home."

Jamadagni said, "That man whose heart is not pure is sure to go to hell even if he adores the Devas in a horse sacrifice or in a hundred Vajapeya yagnas, or if he undergoes the severest austerities hanging by his feet. Purity of heart is regarded as equal to sacrifices and Truth. A very poor Brahmana, by giving only a prastha of powdered barley with a pure heart to another Brahmana, attained to the loka of Brahma himself. This is enough proof of the importance of purity of heart."'

'Vayu said, "I will recite some dharmas which are fraught with happiness to man. Do you listen also with attention to some sinful transgressions, along with the secret causes upon which they depend. That man who offers for the four months of the rains, sesame and water to the Pitris, and food, according to the best of his power, to a Brahmana well-conversant with the laws; who duly pours libations on the sacred fire, and makes offerings of rice boiled in sugared milk; who gives lamps in honour of the Pitris, with sesame and water—verily he who does all this with bhakti and dhyana acquires all the punya that attaches to a hundred sacrifices in which animals are offered to the gods.

Listen to this other high mystery that is unknown to all. That man who thinks it permissible when a Sudra ignites the fire upon which he is to pour libations, or who does not see any fault when women who are incompetent to assist at sraddhas and other rites are allowed to assist at them, truly becomes stained with sin. The three sacrificial fires become enraged with such a man. In his next life he has to take birth himself as a Sudra. His Pitris, together with the Devas, are never pleased with him.

I will now tell you what the expiations are for cleansing oneself from such sins. Listen to me with attention. By performing these expiatory karmas, one becomes happy and free from sin's fever. Fasting all the while, one should, for three days, with great dhyana, pour libation on the sacred fire of the urine of the cow mixed with cow-dung and milk and ghrita. The Devas accept the offerings of such a man upon the expiration of a full year.

His Pitris also, when the time comes for him to perform the sraddha, become gratified with him again.

I have thus said what is dharma and what adharma, with all their recondite details, as they pertain to human beings wanting to attain swarga. In truth, men who abstain from these transgressions or who, having committed them, undergo the expiatory rites indicated, succeed in attaining to paradise when they leave this world.”

CANTO 129

Lomasa said, “The Pitris of men who, without having wives of their own, betake themselves to the wives of others, become filled with disappointment when the time for the sraddhas comes. He who takes to himself the wives of other men, he who indulges in sexual union with a barren woman, and he who appropriates what belongs to a Brahmana, are equally sinful. There is no doubt that the Pitris of such men disown them entirely, and have nothing to do with them. The offerings they make fail to satisfy or please the gods and the Manes. Hence should one always abstain from sexual congress with women that are the wives of others, as also with women who are barren. The man who desires his own good should never take what belongs to a Brahmana.

Listen now to another rahasya, unknown to all, with regard to dharma. One should, with bhakti, always do the bidding of one’s acharya and other elders. On the twelfth day of the moon, as also on the day of the full moon, every month, one must give dakshina to Brahmanas, of ghee and the offerings that constitute akshata. Hear what the measure is of the punya that such a giver acquires.

By giving such dakshina, a man is said to augment the power of Soma and Varuna. Vasava confers upon such a one a fourth part of the punya of an Aswamedha yagna. By giving such dana, a man is blessed with great energy and prowess. The divine Soma, well-pleased with him, grants him the fruition of his wishes.

Listen now to another dharma, together with the foundation on which it rests, which yields great merit. In this age of Kali, that dharma fetches great happiness to men. The man who, rising before dawn and purifying himself with a bath, clothes himself in white clothes and with concentrated dhyana makes gifts to Brahmanas of vessels full of sesame seeds, who makes offerings to the Pitris of holy water with sesame seeds and honey, and who gives lamps as also krisara acquires substantial punya. I will tell you what this punya is.

Indra has ascribed these rewards to the gift of vessels of copper and brass filled with sesame seeds. He who makes gifts of kine, he who makes gifts of land that yield eternal punya, he who performs the Agnishtoma yagna with copious dakshina to Brahmanas, are all regarded by the gods as acquiring merits equal to those which one acquires by making gifts of vessels filled with sesame seeds. Gifts of water with sesame seeds are regarded by the Pitris is as giving eternal gratification to them. The ancestors all become delighted with gifts of lamps and krisara.

I have thus recited the ancient law laid down by the Rishis, which is eulogised by both the Pitris and the Devas in their respective worlds.'"

Bhishma says, 'Then, the Rishis there assembled, together with the Pitris and the Devas, with rapt dhyana, questioned Vasishta's wife Arundhati of great ascetic merit. Possessed of abundant tapodhana, Arundhati was equal to her husband, the Mahatman Vasishta, in tejas, for in both vratas and pravritti she was her husband's equal. Addressing her, they said, "We desire to hear from you the rahasyas, the arcane mysteries of kartavya and dharma, duty and religion. O chaste devi, tell us what you regard a deep and high mystery."

Arundhati said, "The great progress I have achieved in tapasya is due to your kindly consideration for me. With your gracious leave, I will now speak of duties that are eternal, on those that are high mysteries. I will speak of them with the causes on which they depend, and elaborately. A knowledge of these should be imparted to him that has a pure heart and is possessed of bhakti. These four—he that is bereft of faith, he that is full of pride, he that is guilty of Brahmahatya, and he that violates the bed of his guru—should never be spoken to at all. Dharma and kartavya should never be imparted to them.

The punya acquired by one who gives away a Kapila cow every day for two and ten years, or by one who adores the Devas every month with a sacrifice, or by him who gives away hundreds of thousands of kine at the great Pushkara, do not equal those that are his with whom an Atithi, a guest, is gratified.

Listen now to another kartavya whose observance invests happiness on a man. It should be undertaken, with its secret ritual, by one who owns bhakti. Its merits are exalted. Listen to what they are. If, rising at early dawn and taking with him a quantity of water and a few blades of kusa grass, a man goes into a cow-pen and washes a cow's horns, sprinkling on them pure water with the blades of kusa grass and then has the water drip down onto his own head, he is regarded, in consequence of such a snana, as one that has performed his ablutions in all the sacred tirthas that the wise have heard to exist in the three worlds and which are honoured and resorted to by Siddhas and Charanas."

When Arundhati said these words, all the Devas and Pitris applauded her, saying, 'Uttamam, most excellent!' Indeed, all that were present there were delighted and all of them worshipped Arundhati.

Brahma said, "O most blessed one, exceptional is the duty that you have told of, together with its secret ritual. Praise be to you. I grant you this boon—your tapasya will continually increase!"

Yama said, "I have listened with joy to your wonderful discourse. Listen now to what Chitragupta has said and what I myself find agreeable. This relates to kartavya with its secret ritual, and is worthy of being heard by the Maharishis, as also by men of bhakti who wish to achieve their own welfare. Nothing is lost of either dharma or adharma, piety or sin, which the living commit. On days of the full moon and the new moon, Purnima and Amavasya, both those are conveyed to the sun where they rest. When a mortal goes into the realm of the dead, the sun god bears witness to all his karma. He that is righteous acquires the fruits of his righteousness there.

I shall now tell you of some auspicious duties which are approved by Chitragupta. Water for drink, and lamps to light darkness, should always be given, as also sandals and umbrellas and Kapila kine, all with due rites. In Pushkara, especially, should one make the gift of a Kapila cow to a Brahmana who knows the Vedas. One should also always maintain one's agnihotra with great care.

Here is another dharma which was proclaimed by Chitragupta. It behoves them that are the best of creatures to listen separately to what the merits are of that dharma. In course of time, every creature is destined to die. They that are of little understanding meet with great distress in the regions of the dead, for they become terribly afflicted by hunger and thirst. Indeed, they have to rot there, burning in pain. There is no escape for them from such a fate. They have to enter into thick darkness.

I will now tell you of those kartavyas, by performing which one may succeed in crossing safely over such dire calamity. The performance of those karmas costs very little but is full of great punya, and confers untold bliss in the next world. Lofty are the merits that attach to the gift of water. In the next world, especially, that punya is truly transcendent. For them that make gifts of water is ordained in the other world a great river full of sublime water. Indeed, the water contained in that river is inexhaustible and cool, and sweet as amrita. He who makes gifts of water in this world drinks from that stream in the world hereafter.

Listen now to the abundant rewards that attach to the giving of lamps. The man who gives deepams in this world never so much as sees the foetid darkness of naraka. Soma and Surya and Agni always give him their light when he goes into the other world. Why, all the gods ordain that on every side of such a one there should be blazing light. Verily, when a giver of lights repairs to the world of the dead, he himself blazes forth in pure effulgence like a second Surya. Hence, one should give deepam while here and pavitra jala, pure water.

Listen now to what the rewards are of the person who makes the gift of a Kapila cow to a Brahmana who knows the Vedas, and especially if the gift be made in Pushkara. Such a man is regarded as having made a gift of a hundred cows with a bull, a gift that confers eternal punya. The gift of a single Kapila cow washes away whatever sins the giver may be guilty of, even if those sins be as grave as Brahmahatya. For, the gift of a single Kapila cow is regarded as equal in merit to that of at least a hundred other cows. Hence, one should give away a Kapila cow at the Pushkara which is regarded as the elder of the two tirthas known by that name, on the day of the full moon in the month of Karttika. Men that succeed in giving such a dakshina have never to encounter distress of any kind, or sorrow, or pain.

That man who gives away a pair of padukas or sandals to a superior Brahmana deserving of the gift, attains to similar punya. By giving away a chatra, an umbrella, a person obtains comfortable shade in the next world, and is never scalded by the sun. A gift made to a deserving person is never lost. It is certain to produce agreeable consequences to the giver."

Hearing these opinions of Chitragupta, Surya's hair stood on end. Of awesome splendour, he addressed all the Devas and the Pitris, saying, "You have heard the rahasyas relating to kartavyas, as propounded by the Mahatman Chitragupta. Those Manavas who, with devotion, make these gifts to high-souled Brahmanas, are freed from fear of every kind.

Five kinds of men stained with vicious deeds have no escape. Verily, of sinful conduct and regarded as the worst of men, they should never be spoken to. Indeed they should always be avoided. Those five are—he who kills a Brahmana, he who kills a cow, he who is addicted to sexual intercourse with other men's wives, he who is bereft of bhakti, and he who derives his sustenance by selling the virtue of his wife. These sinners, when they go to the land of the dead, rot in hell like worms that live upon pus and blood. These five are avoided by the Pitris, the Devas, the Snataka Brahmanas, and other regenerate ones that are devoted to the practice of tapasya.'"

Bhishma says, 'Then, all the most blessed Devas and the Pitris, and the great Rishis, addressing the Pramathas, said, "You are all highly blessed ones. You are invisible wanderers of the night. Why do you afflict such men that are vile and impure? What karmas are impediments to your power? What are those deeds through which you become unable to inflict your torments on men? What are those actions that destroy Rakshasas and that prevent you from asserting your power over the habitations of men? Wanderers of the night, we wish to hear all this from you."

The Pramathas said, "Men are rendered unclean by acts of sexual congress. They who do not purify themselves after intercourse, they who insult their elders, they who from dullness of mind eat different kinds of meat, the man who sleeps at the foot of a tree, he who keeps any animal matter under his pillow while lying down to sleep, and he who lies down or sleeps setting his head where his feet should be, or his feet where his head should be—these men we regard as unclean. Verily, these men have many weaknesses.

Those who expectorate their phlegm and cast other unclean secretions into water are the same. Without doubt such men deserve to be killed and eaten by us, and we prey upon them. But listen now to what those kriyas are which are remedies because of which we are rendered powerless to do any harm to men. Those men whose bodies are marked with streaks of gorochana, or who hold vachas in their hands, or who make gifts of ghrita with those ingredients that go by the name of akshata, or who place ghee and akshata on their heads, or those who abstain from meat—all these we are helpless to attack.

That man in whose house the sacred fire burns day and night without ever being put out, or who keeps the skin or teeth of a wolf in his home, or a hill-tortoise, or from whose habitation the sacrificial smoke is seen to curl up, or who keeps a cat or a goat that is either tawny or black in hue, is free from our power.

Verily, those grihastas who keep these things in their homes always find them free from the inroads of even the fiercest Pisachas that live on carrion. Other spirits also, that like us range through different worlds in pursuit of pleasure, cannot do the least harm to such dwellings. Hence, you gods, should men keep such things in their homes, for these keep Rakshasas and other such dark spirits away in mortal fear.

We have thus told you everything about which you had great doubts.'"

CANTO 132

Bhishma says, 'After this, the Grandsire Brahma, born from the primeval lotus and resembling the lotus in his splendour, majesty and fragrance, addressed the Devas with Vasava, the Lord of Sachi, at their head, "Yonder sits the mighty Naga who is a dweller of the nether realms. Endowed with great strength and energy, and with great prowess, also, his name is Renuka. He is a great being. Ask this mighty Renuka to question the Diggajas of fathomless strength and power, who support the very earth with her hills, rivers, oceans and lakes. Let Renuka go to them and ask them about the mysteries of dharma."

At these words of the Grandsire, the Devas, with well-pleased minds, commissioned Renuka to go where those holders of the world stand.

Going to those elephants, Renuka addressed them, saying, "You mighty ones, I have been commanded by the Devas and the Pitris to question you about the mysteries of dharma and kartavya. I wish to hear you discourse on that subject in detail. Most blessed ones, do you speak to me of dharma as your wisdom may dictate."

The eight elephants standing in the eight quarters said, "On the auspicious eighth day of the dark fortnight in the month of Karttika, when the Aslesha nakshatra is in the ascendant, one should make gifts of payasa and rice. Casting aside wrath, and living on a strictly regulated diet, one should make these offerings at a sraddha, uttering these mantras the while—Let Baladeva and other Nagas possessed of great strength, let other mighty snakes of huge bodies that are indestructible and eternal, and let all the other great snakes that have taken their birth in their race, make bali offerings to me for the enhancement of my strength and energy. Verily, let my strength be as great as that of the blessed Narayana when he raised up the submerged earth.

Uttering these mantras, one should make balidana upon an ant-hill. When the maker of day retires to his chambers in the west, upon the chosen ant-hill should offerings be made of raw sugar and rice. The ant-hill should previously be scattered with gajendra flowers. Offerings should also be made of blue cloths and fragrant unguents. If offerings be made in this way, those beings that live in the Patalas, bearing the weight of the upper regions upon their heads or shoulders, become well-pleased and gratified.

As for ourselves, we also do not feel the labour of holding the earth because of such offerings being made to us. Weighted by the burden we bear, even this is what we think, without any selfish concerns. Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and Vaisyas and Sudras, by observing this rite for a full year, fasting on each occasion, acquire great punya from such dakshina. We know that making such bali offerings on the valmikyam, the ant-hill, is truly fraught with the highest punya. By making such offerings, one is regarded as performing the dharma of atithya, hospitality, for a hundred years to all the elephants that exist in the three worlds."

The mighty Diggajas, the Nagas, the Devas and the Pitris and the blessed Rishis, all applauded Renuka.'

Bhishma says, 'Maheswara said, "Searching your memories, excellent are the dharmas and kartavyas that you have all recited. Listen, all of you, now to me as I declare some rahasyas relating to dharma and kartavya. Only to those whose hearts have been set on dharma and who are possessed of bhakti may those secret mysteries be divulged of duty and religion, which are full of high punya.

Hear what the regards are that become his who, with heart free from anxiety, gives food every day, for a month, to kine and contents himself with one meal a day throughout this period. Dhenus, cows, are highly blessed. They are regarded as the most sacred of all sacred things. Verily, it is they that support the three worlds with the Devas, the Asuras and Manavas. Respectful services rendered to them are rewarded with exalted punya and hallowed results. That man who every day gives food to dhenus advances every day in religious merit. Of old, in the Krita yuga, I declared my approval of these creatures. Afterwards, Brahma, born in the primeval lotus, solicited me to show kindness towards kine. It is for this reason that a bull to this day stands as the device on my standard. I always sport with gavyas, and even so should kine be worshipped by all. Kine are possessed of great power. They are givers of boons. If worshipped, they do surely grant boons. The person who gives food to cows for even a single day receives from those benign creatures a fourth part of the punya he would win by all his good karma throughout his life."'

'Skanda said, "I shall now declare a dharma of which I approve. Do you listen to it with dhyana. That one who takes a little earth from the horns of a blue bull, smears his body with it for three days, and then performs his ablutions, acquires untold punya. Hear what those merits are. By doing this he washes away every stain and evil, and attains to sovereign sway hereafter. As many times he is born into this world, so many times does he become celebrated for his heroism.

Listen now to another mystery unknown to all. Taking a copper vessel and placing therein some cooked food after having mixed it with honey, one should offer it as a bali to the rising moon on the evening of the purnima day. Do you learn, with bhakti, what the merits are of the man that does this. The Sadhyas, the Rudras, the Adityas, the Viswedevas, the twin Aswins, the Maruts and the Vasus, all, accept that offering. By such an offering Soma waxes as also Varuna, vast repository of waters. This dharma that I have declared and which is unknown to all, if performed, is certainly fraught with mighty happiness."

Vishnu said, "That man who, endowed with faith and free from malice, listens every day with attention to the rahasyas in respect of religion and duty that are preserved by the Devas and those mysteries, also, which are preserved by the Rishis, has never to succumb to any evil. Such a one also is freed from every fear. That man who, with his senses under perfect control, reads these cantos which treat of these auspicious and meritorious duties, together with their secrets—duties that have been declared here today by all—acquires all the punya that attaches to their actual performance. Sin can never master him. Verily, such a man can never be stained with faults of any kind. Indeed, one wins superabundant merits by reading these rahasyas, or by reciting them to others, or by hearing them recited. The Devas and the Pitris eat, for ever, the havya and the kavya offered by such a one. Both these, in consequence of the virtues of the offerer, become inexhaustible.

Even such is the punya that comes to the man who, with bhakti and dhyana, recites these rahasyas to righteous Brahmanas on days of the full moon or the new moon. Such a man grows steadfast in the observance of all his duties. Beauty of form and prosperity also become his. He succeeds, besides this, in becoming the favourite, for all time, of the Rishis and the Devas and the Pitris. If a person becomes guilty of all sins, save those which are classed as grave or heinous, he is cleansed of them all merely by listening to the recitation of these mysteries about dharma and karma."'

Bhishma continues, 'Even these, O king of men, are the rahasyas of religion and duty that dwell in the breasts of the gods. Held in high regard by all the gods and promulgated by Vyasa, I have now declared them to you for your benefit. One who is conversant with dharma and kartavya thinks that this knowledge is superior in worth to even the very earth full of every kind of wealth. This knowledge should not be imparted to one that is bereft of devotion, or to an unbeliever, or to one that has fallen away from his svadharma, or to one that is without compassion, or to one that is devoted to the science of empty disputations, or to one that is hostile to his gurus, or to one that thinks all creatures to be different from himself.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Who are those, O Bharata, from whom a Brahmana in this world may accept food? From whom may a Kshatriya, a Vaisya and a Sudra take food?'

Bhishma says, 'A Brahmana may take his food from another Brahmana or from a Kshatriya or a Vaisya, but he must never accept food from a Sudra. A Kshatriya may have his food from a Brahmana, a Kshatriya or a Vaisya. He must, however, eschew food given by Sudras, who are addicted to evil ways and who partake of all manner of food without scruple. Brahmanas and Kshatriyas can partake of food given by such Vaisyas as tend the sacred fire every day, as are faultless in character, and as keep the Chaturmasya vrata. But the man who takes food from a Sudra swallows the very abomination of the earth, and drinks the excretions of the human body, and eats the filth of all the world. If one engages in the service of a Sudra, one is doomed to perdition even though one may duly perform all the rites of one's varna. A Brahmana, a Kshatriya, or a Vaisya who engages the services of a Sudra is doomed, although they be devoted to the performance of every religious rite.

It is said that a Brahmana's dharma consists in studying the Vedas and seeking the welfare of the human race; that a Kshatriya's duty consists in protecting men, and that a Vaisya's is in promoting their material prosperity. A Vaisya lives by distributing the fruits of his own actions and by farming. The breeding of cows and trade are the legitimate work in which a Vaisya may engage without fear of censure. The man who abandons his own ordained occupation and betakes himself to that of a Sudra, should be considered as a Sudra and on no account should any food be accepted from him.

Professors of the healing art, mercenary soldiers, the priest who acts as warder of the house, and persons who devote a whole year to study without any profit, are all considered Sudras. And those who impudently partake of food offered at ceremonies in a Sudra's house are visited by terrible calamity. Because of partaking of such forbidden food, they lose their family, strength and vitality, and attain to the condition of animals, devolving into being dogs, fallen in virtue and devoid of all religious observances.

He who takes food from a physician takes that which is no better than excrement; the food of a harlot is like urine; that of a skilled mechanic is like blood. If a Brahmana approved by the good takes the food of one who lives by his learning, he is regarded as accepting the food of a Sudra. All good men should abjure such food. The food of a person who is censured by all is said to be like a draught from a pool of blood. The acceptance of food from an evil man is considered as reprehensible as killing a Brahmana.

One should not accept food if one is slighted and not received with due honour by the giver. A Brahmana who does so is soon overtaken by disease, and his kula soon becomes extinct. By accepting food from the warden of a city, one descends to the status of the lowest outcaste. If a Brahmana accepts food from one who is guilty of killing either a cow or a Brahmana or from one who has committed adultery with his preceptor's wife, or from a drunkard, he helps promote the race of Rakshasas.

By accepting food from a eunuch, or from an ingrate, or from one who has misappropriated wealth entrusted to his charge, one is born in the country of the Savaras situated beyond the precincts of the middle kingdom.

I have thus recited to you those from whom food may be accepted and those from whom it may not. Now tell me, O son of Kunti, what else you wish to hear from me today.'"

CANTO 136

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have told me in full of those from whom food may be taken and of those from whom it should not be taken. But I have grave doubts on one matter. Do you, O Sire, enlighten me; tell me what expiation a Brahmana should make upon accepting the different kinds of food, those especially offered in honour of the Devas and the tarpana made to the Pitris.'

Bhishma says, 'I will tell you, O prince, how mahatman Brahmanas may be absolved from all sin incurred by accepting food from others. For accepting ghrita, the expiation is made by pouring oblations on the fire, while reciting the Savitri mantra. For accepting sesame, O Yudhishtira, the same expiation must be performed. For accepting meat, or honey, or salt, a Brahmana is purified by standing through the night until the sun rises. If a Brahmana accepts gold from anyone, he is cleansed of all sin by silently reciting the great Vedic prayer, the Gayatri mantra, in a public place while holding a piece of iron in his hand.

For accepting money or clothes or women or gold, the purification is the same.

For accepting food, or rice boiled in milk and sugar, or sugar cane juice, or sugar cane, or oil, or any sacred thing, one is purified by bathing thrice in the day, during the morning, noon and twilight sandhyas. If one accepts paddy, flowers, fruits, water, half-ripe barley, milk, or curdled milk, or anything made of meal or flour, the expiation is done by reciting the Gayatri mantra a hundred times. For taking shoes or clothes at obsequial ceremonies, the sin is destroyed by devoutly chanting the same mantra a hundred times. The acceptance of the bhudana, the gift of land, at the time of an eclipse or during any inauspicious time, is expiated by observing a fast for three successive nights.

The Brahmana who partakes of oblations offered to departed ancestors during the dark fortnight is purified by fasting for a full day and night. Without performing his ablutions, a Brahmana should not say his sandhya vandana, nor betake himself to religious dhyana, nor eat a second meal. By this he is purified. For this reason, the sraddha for deceased ancestors has been ordained to be performed in the afternoon and then the Brahmana who has been invited should be fed amply, served a feast.

The Brahmana who partakes of food in the house of a dead person on the third day after the death, is purified by bathing three times daily for twelve days. After the twelve days, and then undergoing the purification ceremonies duly, the sin is destroyed by giving ghrita to other Brahmanas. If a man takes any food in the house of a dead person, within ten days after the death, he should go through all the expiations I have mentioned, and should recite the Savitri mantra and perform the sin-destroying Ishti and Kushmanda penances.

The Brahmana who eats in the house of a dead person for three nights is purified by performing his ablutions thrice daily for seven days, and thus attains all the objects of his desire, and is never troubled by any misfortune.

The Brahmana who eats in the company of Sudras is purged from all impurity by duly observing the same purificatory rites. The Brahmana who eats in the company of Vaisyas is absolved from sin by living on alms for three successive nights. If a Brahmana eats with Kshatriyas, he should make expiation by bathing in his clothes.

By eating with a Sudra from the same plate, the Sudra loses his family honour; the Vaisya by eating from the same plate with a Vaisya, loses his cows and friends. The Kshatriya loses his prosperity, and the Brahmana his splendour and vitality. In such cases, expiations should be performed, and propitiatory rites observed, and oblations offered to the gods. The Savitri mantra should be recited and the Revati rites and Kushmanda penances should be observed to destroy the sin.

If any of the above four varnas partake of food partly eaten by a person of any other order, the expiation is done by smearing the body with auspicious substances like rochana, durva grass, and turmeric.'"

Yudhishtira says, 'O Bhaarata, of charity and devotion, dana and bhakti, which is the better in this world? Do you resolve yet another great doubt that is in my mind.'

Bhishma says, 'Do you listen to me as I recite the names of the great men who, having been devoted to virtue, and having cleansed their hearts with tapa, dana and other acts of piety, undoubtedly attained to the different celestial realms.

Rishi Atreya, revered by all, attained, O monarch, to swarga by imparting the knowledge of the Nirguna Brahman to his sishyas. King Sibi, the son of Usinara, offered the life of his own beloved son, for the sake of a Brahmana, and was transported from this world into heaven. And Pratardana, the king of Kasi, by giving his son to a Brahmana, secured for himself unique and undying fame in this as well as in the other world. Rantideva, the son of Sankriti, attained to the highest heaven by giving dakshina to the high-souled Vasishta. Devavriddha, too, found swarga by giving a hundred-ribbed and magnificent golden chatra to a Brahmana at a yagna.

The revered Ambarisha has also attained to Devaloka by making a gift of all his kingdom to a Brahmana of great power. King Janamejaya of the Suryavamsa found the highest heaven by making a gift of golden kundalas, majestic rathas and gentle cows to Brahmanas. The Rajarishi Vrishadarbhi attained swarga by making gifts of various jewels and beautiful homes to Brahmanas. King Nimi of Vidarbha attained to heaven, with his sons, friends and kine, by giving his daughter and kingdom to Agastya Mahatman.

The far-famed Rama, the son of Jamadagni, attained to eternal regions, far beyond his expectation, by giving bhudana to Brahmanas. Vasishta, the prince of Brahmanas, preserved all the creatures during a time of great drought when the god Parjanya, Indra, did not bestow his grateful showers upon the earth, and for this he has secured eternal bliss for himself. Rama, the son of Dasaratha, whose fame echoes throughout this world, attained to the eternal regions by making gifts of wealth at sacrifices.

The renowned Rajarishi Kakshasena went into swarga by duly making over to the high-souled Vasishta the wealth which he had kept with him. Marutta, the son of Parikshita and the grandson of Karandhama, gave his daughter in marriage to Angiras, and instantly attained Swargaloka. The most devout king of Panchala, Brahmadatta, attained the blessed realm by giving away a precious sankha, a conch shell. King Mitrasaha, by giving his favourite wife Madayanti to the mighty Vasishta, found paradise. Sudyumna, the son of Manu, meted out the proper punishment to the high-souled Likhita, and attained to the most blessed regions.

The celebrated Rajarishi Saharachitta went to the transcendent places by sacrificing his life for the sake of a Brahmana. King Satadyumna found heaven by giving Maudgaya a golden mansion replete with all the objects of desire. In ancient times, King Sumanyu gave Sandilya a heap of food piled high as a hill, and gained swarga. The Salwa prince Dyutimat of great splendour attained to the highest regions by giving his kingdom to Richika. The royal sage Madiraswa gave his slender-waisted daughter to Hiranyahasta, and went to the realm of the gods. The lordly Lomapada attained all the vast objects of his desire by giving his daughter Santa in marriage to Rishyasringa.

The Rajarishi Bhagiratha gave his famed daughter Hansi to Kautsa for his wife, and went to the eternal regions. King Bhagiratha also gave hundreds of thousands of kine with their young ones to Kohala and attained to further blessed realms.

These and many other men, O Yudhishtira, have found swarga for themselves, through the punya of their merit of their charities and penances, and they have also returned from those heavens again and again. Their fame will endure as long as the world will last.

I have related to you, O Yudhishtira, this story of those good grihastas who attained to realms of eternal felicity by dint of their dana and tapasya, and by begetting many children. O foremost scion of the Kuruvamsa, by always giving dana these men also applied their virtuous minds to the performance of yagnas and to tapasya.

O mighty prince, as night has approached, I will answer for you in the morning whatever other questions may arise in your heart.'"

CANTO 138

"The next morning, Yudhishtira says, 'I have heard from you, Pitamaha, the names of those kings that have ascended into heaven. O you whose power is great in the observance of the satyavrata, the vow of truth, by following the dana dharma. How many kinds of gift are there that should be given? What are the fruits of the several kinds of gifts? For what reasons do, which gifts, made to what persons, yield punya? Indeed, to whom should dakshina be given? For what reasons and of how many kinds, are gifts to be made? I wish to hear all this in detail.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O sinless son of Kunti, as I speak on the subject of dana and dakshina to you, in detail. I will tell you, O Bhaarata, how dakshina should be given to all the orders of men.

From desire of punya, from wanting artha, from bhaya, from ichcha, free choice, and from daya, pity, are gifts given. Dana, therefore, is of five kinds.

Listen now to the reasons for which gifts are divided into five kinds. With the mind free of malice, one should give dakshina to Brahmanas, for by giving to the Dvijas, one acquires fame here and great felicity hereafter. Such dana is given out of the desire to earn punya. He is in the habit of giving dana; or he has already given gifts to me: hearing these words from solicitors, one gives away all kinds of wealth to a particular one. Such dana is given out of the desire for artha.

I am not his, nor is he mine. If disregarded, he may injure me. From such motives of fear, even a man of learning and wisdom may make gifts to an ignorant wretch. Such gifts are made from bhaya. This one is dear to me, and I am also dear to him. Influenced by these considerations, a man of intelligence, freely and with alacrity, gives gifts to a friend. Such gifts are regarded as made out of ichcha, choice. The one that solicits me is poor. He is, again, satisfied with a little. From these considerations, one should always make gifts to the poor, moved by pity. Gifts made like this are regarded as made from daya.

These are the five kinds of gift. They enhance the giver's punya and kirti, his merits and his fame. The Lord of all creatures, Brahma himself, has said that one should always give charity according to one's means.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'O Grandsire, you are possessed of great wisdom. Indeed, you fully know every branch of learning. In our great vamsa, you are the only individual that dwells with all the vigyanas. I want to hear from you about dharma and artha, righteousness and profit, which lead to felicity hereafter, and that are full of wonder to all creatures.

The time that is upon us is full of great distress. The like of it hardly ever overtakes kinsmen and friends. Indeed, other than you, O greatest of men, we now have none else that can take the place of an acharya. If, O sinless one, my brothers and I deserve the favour, it befits you to answer the question I want to ask.

This one here is Narayana, who is endowed with every prosperity and is honoured by all the kings. Even he waits upon you, showing you every indulgence and revering you greatly. From your love for me, and for my weal as well as that of my brothers, in the presence of this Vasudeva Krishna himself and of all these kings, I humbly ask you to tell us about dharma and artha.'" Vaisampayana continued, "Hearing these words from Yudhishtira, Bhishma, the son of the river named after Bhagiratha, is full of joy out of his overflowing love for the Kuru king and his brothers, and he speaks thus to them.

Bhishma says, 'Rajan, I will surely narrate for you some delightful and ancient discourses on the subject of the puissance of this Vishnu as displayed in days of yore and as I have heard them from my great gurus. Listen to me, also, as I describe the infinite powers of Mahadeva Siva, who is Vrishabhdhvaja, the Great God who has a bull for his emblem. Listen to me and I will tell you of the doubt that filled the mind of the great Rudra's wife, and that of Rudra himself.

Once on a time, the Dharmatman Krishna kept a vrata for ten and two years. To look upon him who had undergone the rite of initiation for the observance of his great vow, there came to that place Narada and Parvata, and the island-born Krishna, and Dhaumya, that foremost of japis, and Devala, and Kasyapa, and Hastikasyapa. Other Rishis, also, endowed with diksha and niyama, followed by their disciples, and accompanied by many Siddhas, and many ascetics of great punya, came there.

The son of Devaki offered them such honours of hospitality as are deserving of the highest praise and as are offered to the gods alone. Those great Rishis sat themselves down upon fine seats, some of which were green and some golden and some that were embellished with the plumes of the peacock, and some that were perfectly new and fresh.

Thus seated, they began to converse sweetly with one another on subjects connected with dharma and karma, as well as those pertaining to many Rajarishis and Devas. At that time Krishna's blazing tejas, in a terrifying form of fire, Narayana rising from the fuel that consisted of the rigid observance of his vow, issued fulminant from the mouth of Krishna of wondrous feats. That fire began to consume those mountains with their trees and vines and little plants, their birds and deer and snakes and beasts of prey. Soon the summit of that mountain presented a scorched and dismal appearance. Beasts of every species gave throat to cries and screams of fear and pain, as they perished, and in moments the mountain summit was bereft of every living creature.

That fire of towering, raging flames, having consumed everything leaving no remnant, then returned to Vishnu and touched his feet like a docile disciple. That scorcher of his enemies, Krishna, saw that mountain burnt, cast a benign look upon it and brought it back to its former condition. The mountain was again adorned with flowering trees and creepers, and once more echoed with the notes and cries and other sounds of birds and deer and predators and serpents. Seeing that wonderful and inconceivable sight, all the Rishis were astounded. Their hair stood on end and their eyes were full of tears.

Seeing the sages wonderstruck, Narayana, most eloquent of all that speak, addressed them in sweet and refreshing words, "Why has wonder filled the hearts of this conclave of Rishis, you that are always free from attachment of every kind, that are divested of the very idea of ahamkara, and that are absolutely knowing of every sacred vigyana? It befits these Rishis of tapodhana and free from every stain of sin, to explicate to me this doubt that has arisen in my heart."

The Rishis said, "It is you that creates all the worlds, and it is you that destroys them again. It is you that are winter, it is you that are summer, and it is you that are the season of rains. Of all the creatures, mobile and immobile, that are found on the earth, you are the father, you are the mother, you are the master, and you are the origin. Even this, O slayer of Madhu, is a matter of wonder and doubt with us. O source of all auspiciousness, it befits you to resolve for us the fear and wonder in our minds with regard to the fire that sprang from your mouth. Once our fears are dispelled, we shall then, O Hari, recite to you what we have heard and seen."

Krishna said, "The fire that issued from my mouth and that resembles the all-consuming yuga-fire in splendour, and by which this mountain was devastated, is nothing less than the tejas of Vishnu. You Rishis, you are men who have conquered wrath, have brought your senses under complete control, O tapodhanas, and who are very gods in puissance. Yet you have suffered yourselves to be agitated and distressed.

I am now entirely absorbed with the observances of my vrata. Verily, because of my vow, a fire issued from my mouth. You must not allow yourselves to be agitated. It is for keeping a stern vrata that I came to this auspicious mountain. The object that brought me here is to acquire through tapasya a son who will be my equal in might and energy. From my tapa, the Atman in my body became transformed into fire and issued forth from my mouth.

That fire emerged to behold the boon-giving Grandsire of the universe. The Pitamaha Brahma, you foremost of ascetics, told my soul that half the tejas of the Great God who has the bull for his emblem will be born as my son. Returning from its mission, the Agni has come back to me and approached my feet like a sishya desirous of serving me dutifully. Indeed, casting off its fury, it has come back to me and to its own proper nature. I have told you, in brief, a mystery appertaining to him who has the lotus for his origin and who is endowed with Mahabuddhi.

Rishis, tapodhanas, you should not give way to fear. You all do own far-reaching vision. You can travel everywhere without being constrained or impeded. Blazing with vows that sannyasis keep, you are adorned with gyana and vigyana. And I now ask you to tell me of something wonderful which you have heard of or seen on earth or in heaven. I feel an eagerness to taste the honey of the speech from your lips, the honey that will, I am sure, be as sweet as a jet of amrita.

If I see anything on earth or in heaven, which is of exceptionally delightful and wonderful aspect, but which is unknown to all of you, O you Rishis that look like so many Devas, I say that that is because of my own Supreme Nature which cannot be obstructed by anything. Anything wonderful of which the knowledge dwells in me or is acquired by my own insight or inspiration ceases to appear wonderful to me.

Anything, however, that is recited by pious sages, men of great dharma and goodness, must be listened to with respect and devotion. Such discourses exist in this world since time out of mind and are as durable as characters engraved on rocks. I wish, therefore, to hear at this meeting something from the lips of you who are such very good men, and cannot fail to be bestow punya on others."

Hearing these words of Krishna, all those Rishis were filled with surprise. They began to gaze at Janardana with those eyes of theirs that were as beautiful and large as the petals of the lotus. Some of them began to glorify him and some began to worship him with reverence. Indeed, all of them then hymned the praises of the slayer of Madhu with words whose meanings were adorned with the eternal Riks. All those sages then appointed Narada, foremost of all who know speech, to satisfy what Krishna asked.

The Munis said, "It falls to you, O Narada, to describe in full, from the beginning, to Hrishikesa, that wonderful and inconceivable incident which occurred, O mighty one, on the mountains of Himavat and which was witnessed by those of us that had gone there in course of our pilgrimage to the sacred tirthas. Verily, for the benefit of all the Rishis assembled here, you should indeed relate that incident."

Thus addressed by those Munis, the Devarishi, the divine Narada, narrated this tale of the incidents which had occurred some time by.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Narada, that holy Rishi, friend of Narayana, told of the discourse between Sankara and his consort Uma.

Narada said, "Once upon a time, the righteous-souled Lord of all the gods, Mahadeva Vrishabhdhvaja, practised the most severe tapasya on the sacred mountains of Himavat that are the resort of Siddhas and Charanas. Those enchanting mountains are overgrown with diverse kinds of the finest plants and adorned with various flowers. At that time, they were peopled by the different tribes of Apsaras and hosts of ghostly beings. There the Great God sat, filled with bliss, and surrounded by hundreds of Pramathas who presented myriad and strange aspects to the eye of any beholder. Some of them were ugly and awkward, some were of dazzling handsome features, and some presented the most wonderful appearances altogether. Some had faces like the lion's, some like the tiger's and some like the elephant's. In fact, those ghostly Ganas presented every kind of animal face. Some had faces of the jackal, some faces resembled the leopard's; some were like the ape's, some like the bull's. Some of them had faces like the owl's; some like the hawk's; some had faces like those of deer of many species.

Mahadeva was also surrounded by Kinnaras and Yakshas and Gandharvas and Rakshasas and various other created beings. The asrama to which Mahadeva had betaken himself abounded with unearthly flowers and blazed with celestial rays of light. It was perfumed with unearthly sandalwood, and heaven's incense was burnt on every side. And it echoed with the strains of divine instruments. Indeed, it resounded with the beat of mridangas and panavas, the boom of sankhas, and the sound of bheris. It teemed with Ganas of diverse tribes who danced in joy, and with peacocks that also danced with fans unfurled. Forming as it did the resort of the Rishis of heaven, the Apsaras danced there in joy. The whole place was exceedingly fascinating to the eye. It was of unworldly beauty, truly like swarga itself. Its entire aspect was passing wonderful and, indeed, it is indescribable for its grace and sweetness.

Verily, with the tapasya of that Great Deity who sleeps on mountain breasts, that prince of mountains shone with ineffable loveliness. It resounded with the chant of the Vedas uttered by learned Brahmanas devoted to Vedic recitation. Echoing with the hum of bees, O Madhava, the mountain became incomparable in beauty. Seeing the Great God who is endued with a fierce form and who looks ever like a Mahotsava, a great cosmic festival, all were filled, O Janardana, with joy. All of them, the Siddhas who have drawn in their vital seed, the Maruts, the Vasus, the Sadhyas, the Viswedevas, Vasava himself, the Yakshas, the Nagas, the Pisachas, the Lokapalas, the several sacred fires, the winds, and all the great creatures dwelt on that mountain with minds concentrated in yoga, and were awash on a tide of bliss.

All the seasons were present there and scattered those realms with all kinds of wonderful flowers. Diverse kinds of lustrous plants illuminated the woods and forests on that mountain. A myriad species of birds, all brimful with joy, hopped about and sang merrily on that enchanting mountain, and their songs were mellifluous and full of adoration.

The Mahatman Mahadeva sat, displayed in ineffable beauty, on one of the peaks that shone with precious minerals, as if it served as his grand bedstead. Round his loins was a tiger-skin, and a lion-skin across his breast. His sacred thread was a snake. His arms were decked with a pair of red angadas; his beard was green. He had matted jata on his head. Of terrible features, he it is that strikes fear in the hearts of all the enemies of the gods. It is he, again, that reassures all creatures by dispelling their fears. He is adored by his worshippers as Vrishabhdhvaja, the bull-bannered.

Looking at Mahadeva, the great Rishis bowed down to him touching the ground with their heads. Of forgiving souls, they were all instantly freed by this sight of Siva from every sin and entirely purified. The asrama of the Pasupati, that Lord of all creatures, he of many terrible forms, shone with strange and uncanny beauty. Covered by many great serpents, it was unapproachable and unbearable for ordinary men to gaze upon.

Then, in the twinkling of an eye, O Madhusudana, everything there became marvellously wonderful. Indeed, the abode of that Greatest God began to blaze with a most terrible beauty. To Mahadeva seated there, perfectly serene, came his consort Parvati, the daughter of Himavat, surrounded by the wives of the Ganas, the weird and ghostly beings who are the companions of Siva. Her attire was like that of her lord and the vows she observed were like his. She held a jar at her waist that was filled with the waters of every tirtha, and was accompanied by the Devis of all the mountain rivers and streams. Those auspicious goddesses walked in her train. They came raining flowers on every side and exuding all kinds of unearthly fragrances. She who loves to dwell on the breast of Himavat advanced towards her Great Lord.

The beautiful Uma, smiling and wanting to be playful, covered her Lord Mahadeva's eyes from behind with her two exquisite hands. As soon as Siva's eyes were covered, all the worlds fell into darkness and life seemed extinct everywhere in the universe. The homa rites ceased. The akhanda was suddenly deprived of the sacred vashat also. All living creatures were dismayed and filled with dread. Indeed, when Uma shut the eyes of the Pasupati, the universe was without all its countless suns.

However, quickly that overspreading darkness disappeared. A mighty flame flared forth from Mahadeva's forehead. A rutilant third eye, another sun, appeared upon his brow. That eye began to blaze forth like the yuga-fire and to consume that mountain. The large-eyed daughter of Himavat, seeing what occurred, bowed her head to Mahadeva of that eye of the fire of the Pralaya. She stood there with her gaze fixed on her lord.

The mountain forests burned on every side, with their vaas and other trees of straight trunks, and their fragrant sandalwood trees and myriad oshadhis, and herds of deer and other animals, filled with fright, ran in panic to the place where Hara sat and sought his protection. With those creatures thronging it to bursting, the asrama of Siva shone forth with a most wondrous and exceptional beauty. Meanwhile, that fire, swelling and billowing wildly, soared up into the very heavens and, with the brilliance and electric volatility of lightning, brighter than a dozen suns in potency and refulgence, covered every side like the all-destroying yuga-fire of the Pralaya.

In a moment, the Himavat mountains were consumed, with their metal, rock, minerals and summits and shining plants and herbs. Seeing Himavat consumed, the daughter of that prince of mountains sought the protection of the Great God, her husband, and stood before him with her hands joined in reverence. Then Sarva, seeing Uma overcome by an accession of womanly mildness and finding that she was stricken to have her father Himalaya reduced to that plight, cast a benign look upon the mountain. In a moment, Himavat was restored to his old condition and was as handsome and magnificent to behold as ever. Indeed, the mountain put forth a cheerful aspect. In a trice, all his trees bloomed with flowers. Seeing Himavat returned to his natural condition, the Goddess Uma, who has no fault, addressed her lord, that master of all creatures, the divine Maheswara, in these words.

Uma said, 'O Holy One, O Lord of all creatures, O Trisulin, god that are armed with the trident, O you of the highest vows, a great doubt has filled my mind and you must resolve it for me. For what reason has this third eye appeared on your forehead? Why was the mountain consumed with his forests and all that belonged to him? Why also, O Illustrious God, have you restored Himavan to his former self? Indeed, having burned him once, why have you again covered him with trees?'

Maheswara said, 'O flawless devi, you covered my eyes in jest and all the universe was plunged in darkness. When the universe became dark, O Parvati, I created the third eye for the protection and light of all creatures. The fire of that eye consumed this mountain. And to please you, O devi, I once more made Himavat what he was.'

Uma said, 'Swami, why are your faces which look at the east, the north and the west, so handsome and so agreeable to look at like the very moon? And why is that face which is turned to the south so terrible? Why are your matted locks tawny in hue and so stiff and erect? Why is your throat as blue as the peacock's feathers? Why, O Lustrous God, is the pinaka always in your hand? Why are you always a brahmacharin with jata? O Lord, explain all these to me. I am your wife who seeks to follow the same dharma as you. And I am your devoted bhakta, O Siva Vrishabdhvaja!'

Narada continued, "Thus addressed by the daughter of the Prince of All Mountains, the illustrious wielder of the pinaka, the powerful Mahadeva, became so very pleased with her. The Great God said to her, 'Blessed devi, listen to me as I explain why my forms are so, and the reasons for them being thus.'"

CANTO 141

"The Blessed and Holy One said, 'In days of yore, Brahma created a most wonderful and auspicious Apsara called Tilottama; he did this by culling seeds of beauty from every beautiful object in the universe. One day, that devi of face and form unrivalled in the universe, came to me, O Parvati, on the pretext of walking around me in pradakshina but in truth, impelled by the desire to tempt me. In whatever direction that woman of beautiful teeth turned, a new face of mine instantly appeared, so eager did I become to watch her. All those faces of mine were handsome. Thus, in consequence of the desire to look at Tilottama, I became four-faced, through my yoga shakti. With my face the one which is turned towards the east, I exercise the sovereignty over the universe. With my face turned towards the north, I sport with you, O you of faultless form and features. That face of mine which is turned to the west is gentle and auspicious. With it I ordain the happiness of all creatures. My face which is turned towards the south is terrible. With it I destroy all creatures.

I live as a brahmacharin with matted locks on my head, impelled by the desire of doing good to all creatures. The bow pinaka is always in my hand to accomplish the purposes of the Devas. In days of antiquity, Indra, who wanted to acquire my power and prosperity, cast his vajra at me. That weapon scorched my throat. It is for this that I became blue-throated.'

Uma said, 'When, O first of all, there are so many excellent vahanas of great beauty, why is it that you have a bull for your mount?'

Maheswara said, 'In the days of old, the Pitamaha Brahma created the celestial cow Surabhi and she yielded abundant milk like amrita. From her there came a large number of gavyas, all of which gave copious milk sweet as nectar. Once upon a time, some froth fell from the mouth of one of her calves on my body. I was enraged at this and my wrath singed all the cows, which then became of many hues. I was pacified by Brahma, master of all the worlds, who knows all things. It was he who gave me this bull both as a mount to bear me where I will go and to be a device on my banner.'

Uma said, 'You have many abodes in heaven, of diverse forms and possessed of every comfort and luxury. Why, O Holy One, do you reside in the smasana, the cremation grounds, abandoning all those mansions of every delight? The smasana is full of the burnt hair and bones of the dead; it abounds with vultures and jackals, and is marked with countless funeral pyres. Full of carrion and slick with fat and blood, with entrails and bones strewn all over it, and always echoing with the howls of jackals, it is an unclean place.'

Maheswara said, 'I always wander over all the earth in search of a sacred place. I do not, however, ever find any place that is more sacred than the smasana. Hence, of all abodes, the burning ghat pleases my heart most, shaded that it generally is by branches of the banyan and adorned with torn and burnt garlands of flowers. O you of sweet smiles, the multitudes of bhutas and pramathas that are my companions love to dwell in the grounds of cremation. I do not like, O devi, to live anywhere without them being by my side. Hence, the smasana is a sacred home to me. Indeed, auspicious Parvati, it seems to me to be swarga. Most sacred and of great punya, the smasana is always eulogised by those that wish for holy abodes.'

Uma said, 'Swami, O Lord of all creatures, O foremost of all observers of dharma, I have a great pang of doubt, O Pinakapani, O granter of boons. These ascetics, my mighty Lord, have undergone many kinds of austerities. In the world, ascetics are seen wandering everywhere in diverse forms and clad in motley attire. To bless this great gathering of Rishis, as also myself, I implore you to resolve, O chastiser of all foes, this doubt of mine. What indications is dharma said to possess? How, indeed, do men come to know the intricacies of dharma, so they succeed in observing them? Omnipotent Lord, O great knower of dharma, I ask you this.'

When the daughter of Himavat asked this question, the conclave of Rishis worshipped the goddess and adored her with eulogies adorned with Riks and with hymns of deep import.

Maheswara said, “Non-violence, truthfulness of speech, compassion towards all beings, tranquillity of soul and the giving of charity to the best of one’s power, are the foremost duties of the grihasta. Abstention from sexual congress with the wives of other men, protection of the wealth and the woman committed to one’s charge, unwillingness to appropriate what is not given to one, and avoidance of honey and meat—these are the five chief kartavyas. Indeed, dharma has many branches, all of which are full of happiness. But these are the kartavyas which embodied creatures who regard dharma as the most superior path should observe and practise. Even these are the fonts of punya.’

Uma said, ‘Swami, I wish to ask you about another matter on which I have great doubts. It behoves you to answer me and dispel my doubts. What are the punya dharmas of the four varnas? What duties pertain to the Brahmana? What to the Kshatriya? What are the indications of those that belong to the Vaisya? And what of duties of the Sudra?’

The Holy One said, ‘Blessed Devi, the question you have asked is a most proper one. Brahmanas are regarded as being most blessed, and are, indeed, gods on earth. The observance of fasts, the subjugation of all the senses is always the svadharma of the Brahmana. When the Brahmana succeeds in properly performing his dharma in every way, he attains to identity with Brahman. The observance of brahmacharya, O goddess, is his main ritual. The observance of vratas and upanayana, the investiture with the sacred thread, are his other duties. It is through these that he becomes truly regenerate. He becomes a Brahmana for worshipping his preceptors and other elders as also the deities. Verily, the dharma which has for its soul the study of the Vedas is the source of all piety. That is the religion which the embodied who are devoted to piety and duty must observe and practise.’

Uma said, ‘Swami, all my doubts have not been dispelled. Explain to me in detail what the duties are of all the four orders of men.’

Maheswara said, ‘Listening to the mysteries of dharma and karma, the keeping of the vratas indicated in the Vedas, attention to the sacred fire, and the accomplishment of the work of the guru, leading a mendicant life, always bearing the sacred thread, constant recitation of the Vedas, and rigid adherence to brahmacharya, are all part of the svadharma of the Brahmana. When the time of study is over, the Brahmana, receiving the command of his guru, should leave his preceptor’s house and return to his father’s home. Upon his return, he should marry a wife who is suitable for him. Another dharma of the Brahmana consists in avoiding food prepared by a Sudra. Walking the path of righteousness, always observing fasts and the practices of brahmacharya, are his other duties.

The householder, the grihasta, should keep his domestic fire kindled for daily worship. He should study the Vedas. He should pour libations in honour of the Pitris and the Devas. He must keep his senses under control. He should eat what remains after serving the gods and guests and all his dependants. He should be abstemious in food, truthful in speech, and pure both in body and mind, outwardly and inwardly. Attending to guests is another dharma of the householder, as also the maintaining of the three sacrificial fires.

The grihasta must also attend to the ordinary sacrifices that go by the name of ishti and should also dedicate animals to the Devas according to the scriptural laws. Indeed, the performance of sacrifices is his highest dharma as also a complete abstention from injury to all creatures. Never to eat before serving the deities and guests and dependants is another duty of the householder. The food that remains after serving gods and guests and dependants is called vighasa. The householder should eat vighasa. Indeed, to eat after the members of one's family, including servants and other dependants, is regarded as one of the special duties of the regenerate householder, who should be ever knowing and observant of the Vedas. The vyavahara, conduct, of husband and wife, in the household, should be equal. He should every day make offerings of flowers and other auspicious things to those deities that rule over domesticity.

The grihasta should take care that his house is every day properly rubbed and washed with cow-dung and water. He should also daily observe fasts. Well-cleaned and well-rubbed, his home must be fumigated every day with the smoke of clarified butter poured onto his sacred fire in honour of the Devas and the Pitris. Even these are the karmas which apply to the grihastasrama, the householder's life for a Brahmana. This dharma of the Dvija truly upholds the world. It flows always and eternally from the righteous among the Brahmanas that lead a life of domesticity.

Do you listen to me with attention, O goddess, for I will now tell you what the svadharma is of the Kshatriya, about which also you have asked me. From the beginning, it has been said that the first duty of the Kshatriya is to protect all creatures. The king is the acquirer of a fixed share of the punya earned by his subjects. Through this the king becomes endowed with dharma. The king of men who rules and protects his subjects righteously acquires, by virtue of the protection he offers to others, many realms of prosperity in the world to come.

The other duties of a Kshatriya consist of self-restraint and Vedic study, the pouring of libations on the sacred fire, the giving of charity, the bearing of the sacred thread, sacrifices, the performance of other religious rites, the support of servants and dependants, and perseverance in and completion of acts that have been begun. It is also his duty to perform sacrifices and other religious rites according to the laws laid down in the Vedas.

Another dharma of the Kshatriya is to mete out punishments according to offences committed. Adherence to the practice of properly judging the disputes of litigants before him, and a devotion to truthfulness in speech, and intercession to help the distressed, are the other kartavyas by discharging which the king acquires great glory both here and hereafter.

He should also willingly lay down his life on the field of battle, having displayed great prowess on behalf of kine and Brahmanas. Such a king acquires in swarga such regions of grace as are won by the performance of Aswamedha yagnas.

The duties of the Vaisya consist of the keeping of cattle and farming, the pouring of libations on the sacred fire, the making of gifts and study. Trade, walking in the path of dharma, hospitality, peacefulness, self-restraint, the welcoming of Brahmanas and renunciation are the other eternal duties of the Vaisya. The Vaisya, engaged in trade and walking in the path of righteousness, should never sell sesame and perfumes and wine or spirits. He should discharge the duties of hospitality towards all. He is at liberty to pursue dharma, artha and kama or pleasure according to his means and to the extent that is judicious for him.

Service of the three regenerate varnas constitutes the high dharma of the Sudra. That Sudra who is truthful in speech and who has subdued his senses is regarded as having acquired punya tapa. Verily, the Sudra who on being visited by a guest discharges the kartavya of hospitality towards him, is regarded as acquiring the punya of high penances. That intelligent Sudra whose conduct is righteous and who worships the Devas and Brahmanas is blessed with the rewards of dharma.

O beautiful devi, I have thus told you of the svadharmas of the four orders of men. What else do you wish to hear?'

Uma said, 'You have told me of the separate svadharmas of the four orders, auspicious and beneficial for them. Do you now tell me, O Swami, what the common duties are of all the varnas.'

Maheswara said, 'The foremost of all beings in the universe, the Creator Brahma, ever wishing for accomplishments, created the Brahmanas to save all the worlds. Among all created beings, they are, truly, gods on earth. I will first tell you what the religious karmas are that they should perform and what the rewards are which they win through them. That dharma ordained for the Brahmanas is the foremost of all religions. For the sake of righteousness in the world, three dharmas were created by the Self-born One. Whenever the world is created, those are also created by the Grandsire. Do you listen.

These are the three eternal dharmas. The dharma propounded in the Vedas is the highest; that which is expounded in the Smritis is the next; the third is that which is based upon the practices of those who are regarded as men of dharma. The Brahmana possessed of learning should have the three Vedas. He should never make the study of the Vedas or recitation of the scriptures the means of his livelihood. He should devote himself to the three well-known karmas of making gifts, studying the Vedas and performing sacrifices. He should transcend lust, wrath and greed. He should be a friend to all creatures. A person who owns these attributes is called a Brahmana. The Lord of the universe further declared six karmas for the Brahmanas. Listen to those eternal duties.

The performance of sacrifices, officiating at the sacrifices of others, the making of dana, the acceptance of dakshina, teaching, and study are the six karmas by accomplishing which a Brahmans wins punya. Indeed, the daily study of the Vedas is a sacred duty. Sacrifice is another eternal duty. The making of gifts according to the measure of his means and in accord with the law is much lauded in the Brahmana. Tranquillity of mind is a high dharma that has always been with righteous men.

Pure-hearted grihastas can always earn great merit. Indeed, he who cleanses his soul by the performance of the five sacrifices, who is truthful in speech, who is free from malice, who makes gifts, who treats with hospitality and honour all regenerate guests, who lives in well-cleaned homes, who is free from pride, who is always sincere in his dealings, who speaks sweet and assuring words, who takes pleasure in serving guests and others arrived at his home, and who eats the vighasa, the food that remains after all the members of his family and dependants have eaten, wins great punya.

That man who offers water to his guests to wash their feet and hands, who gives the arghya to honour his guest, who duly offers seats, and beds, and lamps to light the darkness, and shelter to those that come to his house, is regarded as a most righteous one. The householder who rises at dawn and washes his mouth and face, and serves food to his guests, and having honoured them duly gives them leave to depart, and follows them as a mark of honour for a short distance, acquires eternal merit. Hospitality towards all, and the pursuit of dharma, artha and kama are the duties of the householder.

The dharma of the Sudra also consists in the pursuit of dharma, artha and kama. The dharma ordained for the grihasta is said to have pravritti for its chief indication. Auspicious, and beneficial to all creatures, I will tell you about it. The householder should always make gifts according to the measure of his means. He should also perform frequent sacrifices, as best he can afford. Indeed, he who wishes to achieve his own good should always seek to gain punya. The householder should acquire wealth by righteous means. The wealth thus acquired should be carefully divided into three portions, keeping the requirements of dharma in view. With one of those portions, he should perform all auspicious karmas. With another he should seek to gratify his cravings for pleasure. The third portion he should set aside to increase.

The dharma of nivritti is different. It exists for mukti from re-birth by absorption into Brahman. I will tell you in detail of the conduct that constitutes it. Listen to me well, O devi. One of the duties inculcated by the nivritti marga is compassion towards all creatures. The man that follows it should not dwell in one place for more than a single day. Wishing to achieve emancipation, the followers of this nivritti dharma free themselves from the bonds of hope and desire. They have no attachment to home, to the kamandalu they bear for water, to the cloths that cover their loins, or the seat whereupon they rest, or the triple stick, the tridanda they bear in their hands, or the bed they sleep on, or the sacred fire they worship, or the chamber that houses them.

A follower of nivritti sets his heart upon the workings of his soul. His mind is devoted to the Supreme Brahman. He is filled with the idea of attaining to Brahman. He is always devoted to Yoga and the Samkhya philosophy. He desires no other shelter than the foot of a tree. He sleeps in empty and abandoned houses of men. He sleeps on the banks of rivers. He takes pleasure in staying on such banks. He is free from every attachment, and from every tie of affection. He merges the existence of his own soul into the Supreme Soul, his Atman into the Paramatman.

Standing like a wooden post, and abstaining from all food he does only such karma as point to mukti. Or, he may wander about, devoted to yoga. Even these are the eternal ways of a follower of the dharma of nivritti. He lives aloof from his species. He is free from all attachments. He never remains in the same place for more than a day. Free from all bonds, he roves over the world. Emancipated from all ties, he never sleeps on even the same river bank for more than a night. Even this is the religion of those who seek and know moksha as declared in the Vedas. Even this is the righteous path that is trodden by the wisest. He who follows this path leaves no trace or vestige of himself behind.

Bhikshus or followers of the way of mukti are of four kinds. They are Kutichakas, Bahudakas, Hamsas and Paramahamsas. The second is superior to the first, the third to the second, and the fourth to the third. There is nothing superior to the Paramahamsa; nor is there anything inferior to him or beside him or before him. His is a condition that is divested of sorrow and happiness, that is auspicious and free from decrepitude and death and that knows no change.'

Uma said, 'You have described the dharma of the grihasta, that of mukti, and that upon the observances of the righteous is founded. These paths are exalted and exceedingly beneficial to the world of living beings. O you that know all about every dharma, I wish now to hear what is the high dharma of the Rishis. I always have a liking for those that dwell in asramas. The fragrance of the smoke of the libations of ghrita poured on the sacred fire pervades holy asramas and makes them so delightful. O Mahadeva, when I inhale this fragrance, my heart is always filled with such joy. O Mighty God, I have questions about the dharma of the ascetics. You know every nuance of all dharmas. Do you enlighten me, O God of gods, in detail, on this subject.'

The Blessed and Holy One said, 'I will tell about the most high and great dharma of the Rishis. By following that religion, O Auspicious Devi, the sages attain to success, through the severe tapasya that they practise. Most blessed one, do you hear from the beginning what the duties are of those righteous Rishis who are conversant with every dharma and that are known by the name of Phenapas.

The Pitamaha Brahma, during the days he devoted to the observance of tapa, drank some amrita in the form of water. That water had flowed in heaven from a great sacrifice. The froth of that water is most auspicious and because of Brahma's having drunk it, it partook of his own nature. Those Rishis that subsist upon the measure of froth that thus issued from the pavitra jala are called Phenapas, froth-eaters. Even this is the vyavahara of those Shuddhatman Rishis, O devi of tapodhana.

Listen now and I will you who the Balakhilyas are. The Balakhilyas are ascetics that have won success through their penances. They dwell in the disc of the sun. Adopting the means of subsistence of birds, those Rishis, knowers of every ritual and way of dharma, live by the Unchha vrata. Their attire consists of deer-skins or barks of trees. Freed from every pair of opposites, joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain and the rest, the Balakhilyas walk in this path of righteousness.

They are as big as a digit of the thumb. Distributed into various classes, each class lives in the practice of the duties assigned to it. They desire only to perform tapa. High, indeed, is the punya they win through their righteous conduct. They are regarded as having attained to equality with the gods and exist for the accomplishment of the purposes of the gods. Having burnt away all their sins by severe penance, they blaze forth in effulgence, illuminating all the points of the compass.

Others, called Chakracharas, are endowed with purified souls and devoted to the practice of compassion. Righteous in their conduct and possessed of great sanctity, they live in the world of Soma. Thus dwelling near enough to the region of the Pitris, they live by drinking the rays of Soma. There are others called Samprakshalas and Asmkuttas and Dantolukhalas. These live near the Soma-drinking deities and others that drink flames of fire. With their wives, and with passions under complete control, they too subsist upon the rays of Soma. They pour libations of ghrita on the sacred fire, and adore the Pitris with the due rites. They also perform the best-known sacrifices. Even this is said to constitute their dharma.

The Rishi dharma, O goddess, is always observed by those who are homeless and who are free to rove through every realm including that of the gods. There are, again, other classes of Rishis, of whom I will tell you. Do you listen. It is needful that they who observe the different dharma of the Rishis should subjugate their passions and know the Soul. Indeed, in my opinion, lust and wrath must be completely conquered. With corn acquired through the Unchha vrata, they should pour libations on the sacred fire, sitting on a fixed seat engaged the while in the yagna called Dharmaratri, the performance of the Soma yagna, acquisition of especial and arcane knowledge, the giving of sacrificial dakshina, which forms the fifth, the daily performance of yagnas, devotion to the worship of the Pitris and the Devas, hospitality towards all. Abstention from all luxurious food prepared from cow's milk, taking pleasure in tranquillity of heart, lying on bare rocks or the earth, devotion to yoga, eating herbs and leaves of trees, and subsisting upon fruits and roots and wind and water and moss, are some of the ways of the Rishis by which they attain to the end that belongs to free souls unsubdued by the world.

When the smoke has ceased to curl upwards from a house, when the husking machine has ceased to ply, when the hearth-fire has been extinguished, when all the inmates have eaten, when dishes are no longer carried from room to room, when mendicants have ceased to walk the streets, it is then that the man who is devoted to the religion of truth and peace of soul, wishing still for a guest but finding his desire unsatisfied, should eat whatever vighasa he may still find in the house. Through such conduct, one becomes a practiser of the Muni dharma.

One should not be arrogant, nor proud, nor cheerless and discontented; nor should one wonder at anything. One should behave equably towards friends and foes. Verily, he who is the foremost of all persons who know dharma should also be friendly towards all creatures.'"

"Uma said, 'Forest recluses live in the most beautiful wild places, among the springs and fountains of rivers, in bowers by the sides of streams and rills, on hills and mountains, in woods and forests, and in sacred places full of fruits and roots. With concentrated dhyana and observant of vratas and niyamas, they dwell in such places. I want, O Sankara, to hear the sacred laws which they follow. These Munis, O God of all gods, depend for protection upon themselves alone.'

Maheswara said, 'Do you hear with dhyana what the duties are of vanaprasthas. Having listened to them with one mind, O goddess, do you set your heart upon dharma. Listen then to what should be the karmas of righteous hermits crowned with success, who keep rigid vows and follow stringent laws, and dwell in wild vanas.

Bathing thrice a day, worshipping the Pitris and the Devas, pouring libations on the sacred fire, performing those sacrifices and rites that go by the name of ishti homa, picking up the grains of nivara paddy, eating fruit and roots, and using oil pressed from inguda and castor-seeds are their karmas. Having gone through the practices of yoga and being crowned with ascetic success, and freed from lust and anger, they should seat themselves in the posture called Virasana. Indeed, they must live in such places where cowards never go.

Observing the excellent injunctions relating to yoga, sitting in summer in the midst of four fires on four sides with the sun overhead the fifth, practising what is called Manduka yoga, of the frog, and either always seated in Virasana, or lying on bare rocks or the earth, these men, with hearts set upon dharma, must expose themselves to cold and water and fire. They subsist upon water or air or river moss. They use two pieces of stones only for husking their corn. Some of them use just their teeth. They do not keep utensils of any kind for provender. Some clothe themselves in rags and barks of trees or deer-skins. Even thus do they pass their lives for the measure of time allotted to them, according to the laws set forth in the scriptures.

Remaining in woods and forests, they wander within these places of untamed nature, live within them, and are always to be found within them. Indeed, these forest recluses enter into woods and forests and, after finding a guru, first live with him as his sishyas. The performance of the rites of homa is their duty, as also the observance of the five sacrifices. A meticulous observance of the rules about the division of time for the fivefold sacrifices as laid down in the Vedas, devotion to other sacrifices forming the eighth, the observance of the Chaturmasya, performance of the Paurnamasya, and still other homas and yagnas, and the performance of the nitya, the daily sacrifices, is the dharma of these men without wives, free from every attachment, and washed of every sin.

Indeed, thus must they live in the vana. The sruva, the sacrificial ladle, and the kamandalu water-vessel are their main wealth. They are always devoted to the three fires. Righteous in their conduct and adhering to the path of virtue, they attain to the highest end. These Munis, crowned with ascetic success and ever devoted to the religion of Truth, attain to the sacred region of Brahma or the eternal realm of Soma. O Auspicious Goddess, this briefly is the dharma followed by forest recluses.'

Uma said, 'Swami, Pasupati, O you who are worshipped by all beings, I want to hear what the dharma is of those Munis that are followers of the scriptures which deal with ascetic success. Do you tell it to me. Living in woods and forests, and well-accomplished in the scriptures of spiritual success, some amongst them live and do as they like, without being restrained by particular practices; others have wives. How, indeed, have their laws been laid down?'

Mahadeva said, 'O goddess, the shaving of the head and the wearing of ochre robes are the indications of those recluses that rove about in freedom; while the indications of those that dally with wives consist in passing their nights at home. Performing ablutions three times a day is the dharma of the unrestrained ones, while the homa with water and fruits from the wilderness, belongs to the married recluses. Absorption, yoga dhyana, and adherence to those duties that constitute piety and that have been laid down as such in the shastras and the Vedas are some of the other duties prescribed for them. All the duties of which I have spoken to you before as they pertain to forest hermits, are also the dharmas of the married ones. Indeed, if those kartavyas are observed, they that observe them attain to the rewards that come from the severest tapasya.

Those forest Rishis that lead married lives should confine the gratification of their senses to their wives. By indulging in sexual congress with their wives at only those times when their seasons come, they conform to the laws that have been laid down for them. The dharma which these virtuous men are to follow is the same dharma that has been declared and is followed by the Rishis. With their hearts set upon the acquisition of righteousness, they must never pursue any other object of desire from unrestrained caprice.

That man who makes the gift to all creatures of an assurance of perfect harmlessness and innocence, freed as his soul then is from the stain of malice or violence, becomes endowed with dharma. Verily, he who shows compassion to all creatures, who adopts as a vow a show of perfect honesty towards all creatures, and who becomes himself the soul of all creatures, is then blessed with dharma. A bath in all the Vedas, and conduct which includes compassion and sincerity towards all creatures are looked upon as equal in punya; or, perhaps, the latter is a little distinguished above the other in merit.

Honesty, it has been said, is dharma; while crookedness is the reverse. That man who conducts himself with sincerity becomes naturally imbued with righteousness. The man who is always devoted to honesty of conduct, succeeds in attaining to a dwelling among the Devas. Hence, he who wishes to achieve the merit of righteousness should invest himself with honesty and sincerity.

Possessed of a forgiving disposition and of self-restraint, and with anger under complete subjection, one should transform oneself into an embodiment of dharma and become free from malice. Such a man, who becomes devoted, besides, to the discharge of all the duties of dharma, is indeed endowed with the merit of righteousness. Freed from torpor and procrastination, the pious man, who adheres to the path of dharma to the best of his power, and becomes possessed of pure conduct, and who is venerable in years, comes to be regarded as equal to Brahman himself.'

Uma said, 'By what course, O Lord, do those Munis who are attached to their respective asramas and who own tapodhana, the wealth of penances, succeed in becoming endowed with great splendour? By what acts, again, do kings and princes, Kshatriyas of great wealth, and others who are poor, succeed in acquiring high rewards? By what karma, O Siva, do denizens of the forest succeed in attaining to that place which is eternal and in adorning their persons with celestial sandalwood paste? O Tryambaka of three eyes, O Tripurahara, destroyer of the triple city, do you answer this question of mine regarding tapasya by telling me everything in detail.'

The lustrous Mahadeva said, 'Those who keep the vratas of upavasa, fasts, and restrain their senses, who abstain from injury of any kind to any creature, and who practise truthfulness of speech, attain to success and, freed from every kind of evil, ascend into swarga and sport in felicity with the Gandharvas for their companions.

The Dharmatman who lies down in the attitude of Manduka yoga, and who properly and according to the law performs auspicious karmas after having taken diksha, lives in bliss in the next world in the company of the Nagas. That man who lives in the company of deer and subsists upon such grass and vegetables as fall from their mouths, and who has undergone the diksha and attends to the duties attached to it, succeeds in attaining to Amaravati, and the mansions of Indra.

The man who subsists upon the moss he gathers and the fallen leaves from trees that he picks up, and endures all the severities of cold, attains to an exalted place. The man who subsists upon either air or water, or fruits and roots, attains in the afterlife to the affluence that belongs to the Yakshas and sports in felicity in the company of diverse tribes of Apsaras.

Having practised for two and ten years, according to the rites laid down in the laws, the vow relating to the endurance of the five fires in the summer, one becomes in one's next life a king. That man who, having observed vratas with regard to food, practises tapasya for two and twelve years, carefully abstaining from all forbidden food, taken at the forbidden hours, becomes in his next life a ruler of the earth.

That man who sits and lies on the bare ground with the canopy of the firmament alone for his shelter, observes the course of dharmas that attach to diksha, and then casts off his body by renouncing all food, attains to great felicity in Swargaloka. The rewards of one who sits and lies down upon the bare ground with the welkin alone for his shelter, are said to be excellent vahanas and shayanas, beds, and magnificent mansions possessed of the resplendence of the moon.

That man who, having subsisted upon the most frugal diet and observed diverse excellent vows, lives depending upon his own self and then casts off his body by abstaining from all food, succeeds in ascending into heaven and enjoying all its rewards. That man who, having lived in entire dependence upon his own self, observes for two and ten years the karmas that pertain to diksha, and at last casts off his body in the great ocean, succeeds in attaining to the realms of Varuna.

That man who, living in entire dependence upon himself observes the dharmas that attach to diksha for two and ten years, and pierces his own feet with a sharp stone, attains to the transports of the region that belongs to the Guhyakas. He who cultivates Atman with the help of Atman, who frees himself from the influence of all pairs of opposites—as heat and cold, joy and sorrow, and the rest—who is freed from every kind of attachment, and who mentally observes for two and ten years such a way of life after diksha, attains to swarga and enjoys every transport with the Devas as his companions. He who lives in entire dependence upon himself and observes for two and ten years the duties that attach to diksha and finally casts off his body in fire as an oblation to the gods, attains to the world of Brahma and is held in high respect there.

That regenerate man, O devi, who keeps his senses under subjugation, and, wishing to attain to dharma, sets his Atman upon the Atman, frees himself from the sense of ahamkara and sets out naked, digambara, without any covering for his body other than the sky, after the due observance of the duties of diksha for two and ten years, and after having consigned his sacred fire to a tree, walks along the path that belongs to Kshatriyas and lies down, when the need for lying down comes, in the attitude of heroes, and conducts himself always after the manner of heroes, certainly attains to the end that is reserved for great Kshatriyas. Such a man repairs to the eternal region of Sakra where he is crowned with the fruition of all his wishes and he sports in joy, his person decked with garlands of celestial flowers and perfumes. Indeed, that Dharmatman lives happily in swarga, with the gods for his companions. The Kshatriya, observant of the dharma of Kshatriyas devoted to that yoga which belongs to Kshatriyas, living in dharma, having renounced everything, having undergone the diksha and subjugated his senses, and observing purity of both body and mind, is sure to attain to the path which is reserved for Kshatriyas. Eternal regions of happiness are his. Riding in a vimana that moves at the will of the rider, he ranges through all those happy realms as he pleases. Indeed, dwelling in the world of Sakra, that blessed one always sports in joy, free from every sorrow and disaster.’

Uma said, ‘Swami, O you who gouged out the eyes of Bhaga and pulled out the teeth of Pushan, O destroyer of the sacrifice of Daksha, O three-eyed Lord, I have another great query. In days of yore, the Self-born One created the four varnas. Through what sins does a Vaisya become a Sudra? Through what does a Kshatriya become a Vaisya and a Brahmana a Kshatriya? By what means may such devolution of castes be prevented? Through what karma is a Brahmana born into the Sudra varna in his next life? Through what, O puissant Mahadeva, does a Kshatriya descend to being a Sudra? O sinless one, O Lord of all created beings, do you, O illustrious one, answer this question of mine. How, again, can the three other varnas naturally succeed in attaining to Brahmanatva, the status of a Brahmana?’

The radiant Siva said, ‘Brahmanatva, O devi, is most difficult to attain. O auspicious Uma, one becomes a Brahmana through original creation or birth. After the same manner the Kshatriya, the Vaisya and the Sudra, all become so through original creation. He, however, that is born a Brahmana falls away from his status through his own evil actions. Hence, the Brahmana, after having attained to the status of the first order, should always protect it. If a Kshatriya or Vaisya lives in the svadharma of the Brahmana, after the manner of a Brahmana he becomes a Brahmana in his next life.

That Brahmana who abandons the dharma of his order to follow those of the Kshatriya, is regarded as one that has fallen away from being a Brahmana and has become a Kshatriya. That Brahmana of little understanding, who, impelled by greed and folly, follows the dharma of Vaisyas, forgetful of his Brahmanatva that is so difficult to attain, comes to be regarded as a Vaisya. Similarly, one that is a Vaisya by birth may, by following the ways of a Sudra, become a Sudra.

Indeed, a Brahmana, falling away from his svadharma may devolve to becoming even a Sudra, Such a Brahmana, falling away from the varna of his birth and turned out of it, without attaining to the realm of Brahma, which is his goal if he duly observes his own duties, sinks into naraka and in his next birth is born as a Sudra. A highly blessed Kshatriya or a Vaisya, who abandons his svadharma, and follows the dharma ordained for the Sudra, falls away from his own varna and becomes a person of mixed caste.

It is in this way that a Brahmana, a Kshatriya, or a Vaisya sinks into becoming a Sudra. That man who has attained to clarity of vision through the practice of his svadharma, who is endowed with gyana and vigyana, who is pure in body and mind, who is conversant with every duty and devoted to the practice of all his own natural duties, is sure to enjoy the rewards of righteousness. I will recite for you, O goddess, something that Brahma the Self-born declared on this subject.

Those that are righteous and desirous of acquiring punya always pursue with firmness the culture of the Soul. The food that comes from cruel and fierce persons is forbidden. So also is the food cooked to serve a large number of men. The same is said of the food cooked for the first sraddha of a dead person. So also is the food that is stained in consequence of the common impurities and also the food that is given by a Sudra. These should never be eaten by a Brahmana at any time.

The food of a Sudra, O devi, the Mahatman Devas ever censure. Even this, I believe, is the law pronounced by the Grandsire with his own mouth. If a Brahmana, who has kindled the sacred fire and who performs sacrifices, were to die with any portion of a Sudra's food remaining undigested in his stomach, he is certain to born in his next life as a Sudra, for the undigested food in his body makes him fall away from Brahmanatva. This Brahmana, in his next life, is invested with the status of that varna whose food he eats through his life or with the undigested portion of whose food in his stomach he breathes his last.

That man who, having attained to the auspicious status of a Brahmana which is so difficult to have, disregards it and eats forbidden food, surely falls away from his high birth. That Brahmana who drinks alcohol, who becomes guilty of Brahmahatya or is vile and base in his ways, or a thief, or who breaks his vows, or is impure, or unmindful of his Vedic studies, or otherwise sinful, or greedy, or guilty of cunning or cheating, or who does not keep vratas, or who marries a Sudra woman, or who derives his subsistence by pandering to the lusts of other people, or who sells the Soma plant, or who serves a person of a varna beneath his, falls away from his Brahmanatva. The Brahmana who violates the bed of his preceptor, or who cherishes malice towards him, or who takes pleasure in speaking ill of him, falls away from being a Brahmana even if he be conversant with Brahma himself.

Through punya karma, again, O Parvati, a Sudra becomes a Brahmana, and a Vaisya becomes a Kshatriya. The Sudra should perform all the duties enjoined for him, properly and according to the law. He should always wait, with obedience and humility, upon persons of the three other varnas and serve them heedfully. Always adhering to the path of dharma, the Sudra should do all this cheerfully. He should honour the Devas and the Dvijas. He should honour the vow of hospitality to all that come to him. With senses firmly restrained and becoming abstemious in food, he should never approach his wife except in her season. He should always seek out such men that are holy and pure. As for food, he should eat the vighasa which remains after all others have eaten. If, indeed, the Sudra desires to be a Vaisya in his next life, he should also abstain from the meat of animals not slain in sacrifices.

If a Vaisya wishes to be a Brahmana in his next life, he must be truthful in speech, and free from pride or arrogance. He should rise above all the pairs of opposites—heat and cold, joy and sorrow, and the rest. He should observe the dharma of peace and tranquillity. He should worship the Devas in sacrifices, attend with devotion to the study and recitation of the Vedas, and purify himself in body and mind. He must keep his senses under subjection, honour Brahmanas and seek the welfare of all the varnas. Leading the life of a grihasta, and eating only twice a day at the prescribed hours, he should satisfy his hunger with only vighasa which remains after all the members of his family, his dependants and guests been fed. He should be frugal in what he eats, and perform nishkama karma, always acting without being impelled by the desire for reward. He should be free from egotism.

He should adore the Devas in the agnihotra and pour libations according to the law. Observing the dharma of atithya, hospitality towards all, he should unvaryingly eat only vighasa, the food that remains after serving those for whom it has been cooked. He should, according to the law, worship the three fires. Such a Vaisya of pure vyavahara is born in his next life into a high Kshatriya family.

If after having been born as a Kshatriya, a Vaisya goes through the usual rites of purification, and is invested with the sacred thread, and betakes himself to the observance of vratas, he becomes, in his next life, an honoured Brahmana. Indeed, after his birth as a Kshatriya, he should give dana in plenty, adore the gods in great sacrifices with plentiful dakshinas, study the Vedas, and always seeking to attain to swarga worship the three fires.

He should intercede to dispel the sorrows of the distressed, and must always righteously cherish and protect his subjects that own his sway. He must be truthful, and perform all karmas that have truth in them, and seek happiness in such conduct. He should award punishments that are righteous, without setting aside neeti danda, the rod of chastisement, for good. He should induce men to do righteous deeds. Guided by considerations of policy in the matter of swaying his people, he should take a sixth of the produce of the fields. He should never indulge in excessive sexual pleasure, but live cheerfully and in independence, always with the vigyana of artha, the science of wealth.

Of righteous soul, he should seek his wife only in her season. He should always keep fasts, with his soul under firm control, devote himself to the study of the Vedas, and be chaste in body and mind. He should sleep on blades of kusa grass spread out in his fire chamber. He should pursue the way of dharma, artha and kama, and be always serene and cheerful.

To Sudras who come asking for food, he should always reply that it is ready. He should never wish for anything from motives of gain or pleasure. He should worship the Pitris and Devas and Atithis. In his own house he must live the life of a sannyasi. He should duly worship the Devas in his agnihotra, morning, noon and evening, the three sandhyas of every day, by pouring libations in accord with the law.

With his face turned towards the enemy, he should gladly cast off his life and prana in battles fought for the weal of kine and Brahmanas. Or he may enter the triple fires sanctified with mantras and quit his body.

By pursuing this pravritti, he will be born in his next life as a Brahmana. Endowed with gyana and vigyana, purified from all dross, and fully knowing the Vedas, a pious Kshatriya, through his own actions, becomes a Brahmana. It is with the help of such karma, O goddess, that one who has sprung from a lower varna, a Sudra, can become a Brahmana refined of all stains and possessed of Vedic lore. A Brahmana, when he becomes vile and evil in conduct and observes no distinction with regard to food, falls away from Brahmanatva and becomes a Sudra. Even a Sudra, O devi, who has purified his soul by punya karmas and that has subdued all his senses, deserves to be waited upon and served with reverence even as a Brahmana. This has been said by the Self-born Brahma himself.

When a pious nature and pious deeds are noticeable in even a Sudra, he should, in my opinion, be held superior to a man of the three higher orders. Neither birth, nor the purificatory rites, nor learning, nor offspring, can be regarded as grounds for conferring upon a man the status of a Dvija. Verily, vyavahara, conduct, is the only ground. All Brahmanas in this world are Brahmanas in consequence of conduct. A Sudra, if he is established in good conduct, must be regarded as being possessed of the status of a Brahmana. The condition of Brahmanatva, auspicious Parvati, is equal wherever, in whomsoever, it truly exists. This is my firm opinion.

He, indeed, is a Brahmana in whom Brahmanatva exists—that condition which is bereft of attributes and which has no sin or stain attached to it. The boon-giving Brahma, when he created all the creatures, himself said that the distribution of human beings into the four varnas dependent on birth is only for common identification

The Brahmana is a great kshetra in this world—a field with feet, for it moves from place to place. He who plants seeds in that field, O beautiful devi, reaps the harvest in the next world. That Brahmana who wishes his own weal should always live upon vighasa. He should always adhere to the path of dharma. Indeed, he should tread the path that belongs to Brahma. He should live engaged in the study of the Samhitas and, remaining at home, discharge all the duties of a grihasta. He must always devote himself to the study of the Vedas, but he should never derive the means of livelihood from such study. That Brahmana who always conducts himself thus, staying always on the narrow path of dharma, worshipping his sacred fire, and engaged in the study of the Vedas, is truly regarded as Brahma himself.

Once gained, the status of a Brahmana must always be protected with care, O you of sweet smiles, by avoiding the taint of contact with those born into inferior orders, and by abstaining from the acceptance of dana.

I have thus revealed you a great mystery—the manner in which a Sudra may become a Brahmana, or that by which a Brahmana falls away from his own pure condition and becomes a Sudra.'"

CANTO 144

"Uma said, 'Swami, Lord of all beings, O you who are worshipped by the Devas and Asuras equally, tell me what are the duties and the derelictions of men. Indeed, O puissant one, resolve all my doubts. It is by these three—thought, word and deed—that men become bound. It is by the same three that they are set free from those bonds. By pursuing what conduct, O Mahadeva, indeed, through what manner of karma, through what behaviour and attributes and speech, do men succeed in attaining to swarga?'

The Devadeva said, 'Devi, you well know the true import of dharma. You are ever devoted to righteousness and self-restraint. The question you have asked me is fraught with the welfare of all creatures. It enhances the intelligence of all. Do you, therefore, listen to the answer. Those that are devoted to the Satya dharma, the religion of Truth, that are righteous and without the indications of the several asramas of life, and who enjoy the wealth earned by righteous means, succeed in attaining to swarga. Those men that are free from all doubts, that are possessed of omniscience, and that have the transcendent vision to see all things, are never shackled by either punya or paapa, virtue or sin. Men that are free from all attachments can never be bound by the chains of karma. They who never cause any injury to anyone, in thought, word or deed, and who never attach themselves to anything, can never be bound by karma. They who never take the life of any creature, who are pious in conduct, who have compassion, who regard friends and foes in an equal light and who are self-restrained, can never be bound by karma.

Men that are imbued with compassion towards all beings, who succeed in inspiring the confidence and faith of all living creatures, and that have cast off malice, succeed in attaining swarga. Men who have no desire to appropriate what belongs to others, who keep themselves aloof from the wives of others, and that enjoy only such wealth as has been earned by righteous means, succeed in attaining to swarga.

Men who behave towards the wives of others as towards their own mothers and sisters and daughters, succeed in attaining swarga. Men that abstain from taking what belongs to others, that are perfectly contented with what they possess, and that live depending upon their own destiny, succeed in finding swarga for themselves. Men who always shut their very eyes against association with other men's wives, who are masters of their senses, and devoted to righteous conduct, surely ascend into swarga.

Even this is the path created by the gods that the righteous should follow. This is the path, free from passion and aversion, laid down for men of dharma to follow. Men who are devoted to their own wives and who seek them only in their seasons, and who turn themselves away from indulgence in other sexual indulgence, succeed in attaining to swarga. Conduct marked by dana and tapa, and characterised by dharma of deeds, and purity of both body and heart, do the wise adopt in order to increase their punya or to earn their means of livelihood. Those who wish to enter into Swargaloka follow this path and not any other.'

Uma said, 'Tell me, O illustrious Lord, O sinless Pasupati, what are the words by which one is bound and what are they by uttering which one is liberated from one's bonds?'

Maheswara said, 'Men who never lie either for themselves or for others, or in jest or to provoke laughter, succeed in attaining swarga. They who never lie to earn their living or to garner merit, or through mere caprice, succeed in attaining swarga. They who speak words that are eloquent, pleasing and faultless, and who welcome all whom they meet with sincerity, succeed in finding heaven. They who never utter words that are harsh, bitter and cruel, and who are free from deceitfulness and evil of every kind, succeed in finding swarga. Men who never speak deceitfully, or through what they say cause a breach between friends, and who always speak the truth and what promotes good feelings, succeed in finding heaven.

Men who avoid harsh words and abstain from altercations, who are impartial in their behaviour to all creatures, and who have subjugated their souls, succeed in rising into swarga. They who abstain from evil talk or sinful converse, who avoid hurtful, even disagreeable talk, and who speak such words as are auspicious and agreeable, succeed in rising into swarga. They who never speak in anger, words as wound the hearts of others, and who, even when infuriated, speak only peacefully and agreeably, succeed in attaining heaven.

The dharma, O goddess, which pertains to speech, must men always follow, for it is auspicious and characterised by truth. They that are possessed of wisdom should always avoid asatya, untruth.'

Uma said, 'Do you tell me, O Devadeva, Pinakapani, O you who are most highly blessed, what the thoughts are by which a person becomes darkly bound.'

Maheswara said, 'Endowed with the punya that arises from pure thoughts, O devi, one goes into swarga. Listen to me, O auspicious one, as I tell you what those deeds of the mind are. Listen also to me, O you of the exquisite face, how an ill-regulated mind is enshackled by wild and evil thoughts.

Those men who do not think to take what belongs to others, even when they see it lying in a forest, succeed in finding heaven. Men who care not to have for themselves what belongs to others even when they see it lying in a deserted house or village, ascend into Swargaloka. Men that do not even think of having for themselves the wives of others, not when they see them in deserted places and under the influence of desire, succeed in attaining to heaven. Men who, meeting with friends or foes, behave in the same amiable way towards all, succeed in entering heaven.

Men that are possessed of learning and compassion, that are pure in body and mind, that are firm in their adherence to truth, and that are contented with what belongs to them, find swarga for themselves. Men who bear no ill-will to any creature, who do not feel in need to labour for their livelihood, who bear friendly hearts towards all beings, and entertain compassion towards all, succeed in attaining heaven.

Men who are imbued with faith, that have compassion, that are holy, that seek the company of holy men, and know well the distinctions between right and wrong, find heaven for themselves. Men, O goddess, that know clearly what the consequences are of good and evil deeds, succeed in attaining to swarga. Men who are just in all their dealings, who are endowed with all worthy accomplishments, that are devoted to the Devas and the Brahmanas, and that are endued with perseverance in the performance of good deeds, succeed in ascending to heaven.

All these men, O devi, succeed in attaining to swarga through the punya of their karma. Tell me, what else do you wish to hear?'

Uma said, 'I have a question, O Maheswara, connected with Manavas, human beings. I beg you, explain it to me carefully. By what actions does a man succeed, all mighty Lord, in acquiring a long life? Through what penances also does a man acquire a long life? By what deeds does a man become short-lived on earth? O you that are perfectly stainless, tell me what the consequences are of different actions in the matter of bestowing a long or a short life on the doer.

Some men are seen to be possessed of great good fortune and some weighed down with misfortune. Some are of noble birth while others of base birth. Some are of such coarse and repulsive features that they might be made of wood, while others are of very fine and handsome features even from the first sight. Some appear to be without wisdom while others are possessed of it. Some, again, are seen blessed with high intelligence and wisdom, both, enlightened by Buddhi and gyana. Some have to endure little pain, while others there are who are stricken by heavy calamities.

Even such diverse conditions are seen among Manavas. O Lustrous Lord, tell me the reason for all this.'

The God of gods said, 'Verily, O devi, I will tell you about the manifestation of the fruits of karma. It is through the laws of that manifestation that all human beings in this world enjoy or endure the consequences of their actions.

The man who assumes a fierce aspect to take the lives of other creatures, who arms himself with stout sticks to injure other creatures, who is seen with weapons raised, who kills living creatures without mercy, who always causes agitation to living beings, who refuses to grant protection to even worms and ants, who is full of cruelty—such a man sinks into naraka.

The one who has an opposite disposition to this, who is righteous in his deeds, is born as a handsome man. The man who is savage and cruel, goes to terrible hell, while he that is merciful and compassionate finds blissful heaven.

The man who goes into hell has to endure excruciating misery and torments. One who, having plunged into naraka, rises therefrom, is born as a man with a short life. The man who is addicted to violence and killing, O devi, becomes, through his sinful deeds, liable to destruction. Such a one becomes abominable to all creatures and short-lived.

That man who belongs to what is called the Sweta varna, the white class, who abstains from the slaughter of living creatures, who has put away from him all weapons, who never inflicts any pain or punishment on anybody, who never injures any creature, who never causes anyone else to kill living creatures for him, who never kills or strikes even when struck or attempted to be slain himself, who never sanctions or approves a slaughter, who is invested with compassion towards all creatures, who behaves towards all others as towards his own self—such a superior man, O devi, succeeds in attaining to the status of a Deva. Filled with joy, he enjoys diverse kinds of luxurious raptures.

If such a one is ever born in the world of men, he is long-lived and enjoys great happiness. Even this is the way of those that are of righteous conduct and righteous deeds and hence blessed with longevity, the way that was indicated by the Self-born Brahma himself and which is characterised by abstaining from the killing of living creatures.'"

"Uma said, 'Through what disposition, what conduct, what acts, and what charity, does a man succeed in attaining to heaven?'

Maheswara said, 'He who is endowed with a liberal disposition, who honours Brahmanas and treats them with hospitality, who makes gifts of food and drink, clothes and other articles of enjoyment to the destitute, the blind and the distressed, who makes gifts of houses, erects halls for public use, digs wells, constructs shelters whence pure and cool water is made available during the hot months to thirsty travellers, excavates tanks, makes arrangements for the free distribution of gifts every day, gives to all seekers what each solicits, who makes gifts of seats and beds and conveyances, wealth, ornaments and gemstones, homes, all kinds of grain, kine, fields, and women—verily, he who always makes these gifts with a cheerful heart, becomes a denizen, O goddess, of swarga. He resides there for a long time, enjoying a myriad of supernal pleasures and joys.

Passing his time happily in the company of the Apsaras, he dallies in the woods of Nandana and other enchanted places. After the exhaustion of his punya, he falls again from heaven and takes his birth in the order of humanity, in a family possessed of wealth in abundance and that has a large command of every item of enjoyment. In that life he is able to gratify all his wishes and appetites. Indeed, he is blessed with affluence of every kind and a well-filled treasury. The Svayambhuva Brahma himself declared it in days of old that it is even such souls, O devi, that become highly blessed and possessed of liberal natures and handsome forms and features.

There are others, O Parvati, that are incapable of giving charity or gifts of any kind. Endowed with small minds, little understanding, they cannot make gifts even when they own abundant wealth and are solicited by deserving Brahmanas. Seeing the destitute, the blind, the distressed and mendicants, and even guests arrived at their homes, such men, always filled only with the desire to satisfy their own taste and appetite, turn away, yes, even when expressly solicited by the truly needy. They never give wealth or clothes, or food, gold, or kine, or anything at all. Such men who are disinclined to relieve the distress of others, who are full of greed, who have no faith in the scriptures, and who never give dana—verily, these men of little understanding must perforce sink down into hell.

In the course of time, when their sufferings in naraka come to an end, they are born in the order of humanity, in families that are entirely impoverished. Always suffering from hunger and thirst, excluded from all noble and decent society, hopeless of ever enjoying themselves, they lead lives of utter wretchedness. Born into families that are without all things of pleasure, these men never enjoy the good things of the world.

Indeed, O Uma, it is through their own deeds that men and women become wretched and poor. There are others who are full of arrogance and pride caused by the possession of riches. Those senseless wretches never offer seats to those that deserve to be seated. Having little understanding, they do not respect or honour them that deserve both. Nor do they give padya, water to wash their feet, to those to whom it should be given. Indeed, they do not honour, agreeably to the laws, with offerings of the arghya, such as deserve to be honoured therewith. They do not offer water to wash their mouths to such as deserve to have that honour. They do not treat their very preceptors, when these arrive at their homes, in the manner in which gurus should be treated.

Living in greed, lust and arrogance, they refuse to treat their elders and aged and wise men with love and affection, even insulting those that should be honoured and asserting their superiority over them without showing reverence and humility. Such men, O Goddess, sink into hell. When their sufferings come to an end after a long course of years, they rise from naraka, and are born into the order of humans, in low and wretched families. Indeed, they who humiliate their preceptors and elders, have to take their birth in such castes as those of Swapakas and Pukkasas who are exceedingly vile and bereft of intelligence.

He who is not arrogant or filled with pride, who is a worshipper of the Devas and Brahmanas, who enjoys the respect of the world, who bows to everyone that deserves his reverence, who speaks kind and sweet words, who benefits persons of all varnas, who is always devoted to the good of all beings, who does not feel aversion for anybody, who is soft-spoken, who is an utterer of agreeable and soothing words, who gives way to one that deserves to have way, who adores his preceptors in the manner in which preceptors deserve to be adored, who welcomes all creatures with proper courtesy, who does not bear ill-will towards any creature, who lives worshipping elders and guests with such reverence as they deserve, who is ever bent upon having as many guests as possible, and who worships all who honour his home with their presence, succeeds, O devi, in finding swarga.

Upon the exhaustion of his merit, he is born among men again, into a high and most respectable family. In that life, he is possessed of all enjoyments in abundance and jewellery and gems and every other kind of wealth in profusion. He gives to deserving persons what they deserve. He is devoted to the observance of every duty and every act of righteousness. Honoured by all creatures and receiving their reverence, he obtains the fruits of his own karma. Even such a one acquires a high lineage and birth in this world.

This that I have said to you was declared by Brahma, the Ordainer himself, in days of old. That man who is fierce in conduct, who inspires terror in all creatures, who injures other beings with his hands or feet, or ropes or sticks, or bricks or clods of hard clay, or other means of wounding and causing pain, O loveliest one, who practises diverse kinds of deceit even to kill living creatures or to vex them, who pursues animals in the hunt and causes them to tremble in fear—verily, that man who conducts himself in this way is certain to sink into hell. If in the course of time, he is born again among humans, he is born into a low and wretched race or family that is afflicted with hardships and impediments of every kind on every side. He becomes an object of aversion to all the world. Wretched among men, he becomes so through his own actions.

Another, who is possessed of compassion, casts his equal eye on all creatures. Blessed with a kind and friendly vision, behaving towards all creatures as if he were their father, divested of every hostile feeling, with all his passions under complete control, he never vexes any creature and never inspires them with fear with any means in his control. He inspires the confidence of all beings. He never afflicts any creature with either ropes or clubs, or stones or weapons of any kind. His deeds are never fierce or cruel, and he is full of kindness. One who is given to such practices and conduct certainly attains to swarga.

There he lives like a god in a celestial mansion abounding in every comfort. If, upon the exhaustion of his merit, he has to be born among men, he is born as a man that has never to face difficulties or hardships of any kind or to encounter any fear. Indeed, he enjoys great happiness in the world as well. Possessed of felicity, without the obligation of undergoing distressing labour for his living, he lives free from every kind of anxiety. Even this, O goddess, is the path of the righteous. In it there are no obstacles or afflictions.'

Uma said, 'In the world some men are seen to be well-versed in inferences and the premises leading to them. Indeed, they are possessed of gyana and vigyana, knowledge and science, have many children, and are blessed with learning and wisdom. Others, O Lord, are without wisdom, science and knowledge, and are full of folly. Through what particular actions does a person become wise? By what acts, again, does one become possessed of little wisdom and distorted vision? Do you dispel this doubt of mine, O you who are the greatest knower of dharma. Others there are, O Siva, who are blind from the moment of their birth. Yet others are that diseased and otherwise afflicted or impotent. Do you, Mahadeva, tell me the reason for this.'

Maheswara said, 'Those men that always enquire about what is for their weal and what is to their detriment, Brahmanas learned in the Vedas, crowned with success, and conversant with all duties, who avoid all kinds of evil deeds and do only what is righteous and good, find swarga after they depart this world and enjoy great joy as long as they live here. Upon the exhaustion of their punya, when they are born among humans, they are born as men of great intelligence. Every kind of felicity and auspiciousness becomes theirs because of that Buddhi with which they are born.

Men of foolish minds, who cast lustful gazes upon the wives of other men, are born cursed with blindness due to that sin of theirs. Those men who, impelled by desire in their hearts, cast their eyes on naked women, those men of vile deeds take birth in this world to pass their whole lives in one continuous disease. Those foolish and wicked men who indulge in sexual congress with women of varnas different from their own, are cursed to be born impotent in their next lives. Men who cause animals to be slain, and those who violate the beds of their preceptors, and those who are promiscuous, are born in their next lives as men without virility.'

Uma said, 'What karma, O Maheswara, is flawed, and what acts are faultless? What, indeed, are those karmas by doing which a man succeeds in attaining to his highest good?'

Maheswara said, 'That man who wants to know what dharma is, and who wishes to acquire prominent virtues and accomplishments, and who always puts questions to Brahmanas with a view to discover the path that leads to his highest weal, succeeds in attaining to swarga. If, after exhaustion of his merit, he is born among men, he is blessed with great intelligence and memory and deep wisdom. This, O goddess, is the conduct that the righteous follow and which is full of great benefits. I have told you this for the good of all Manavas.'

Uma said, 'There are men who hate dharma and who have little understanding. They never wish to even approach Brahmanas who know the Vedas. There are others who are observant of vratas and who are devoted to performing sraddhas. Others, again, are devoid of all vows. They are unmindful of observance and are like Rakshasas in their ways. Some there are who are devoted to the performance of sacrifices and some who are unmindful of the homa. Through the consequences of what karma do men become possessed of these different natures?'

Maheswara said, 'Through the Vedas, the limits have been assigned to all the pravritti of Manushyas. Those men that conduct themselves according to the authority of the Vedas, are seen in their next lives to become devoted to the observance of vows. Those men, however, who having become subject to the sway of folly take adharma to be dharma, become without holiness, transgress all restraints, and come to be regarded as Brahmarakshasas. Indeed, it is these men that become unmindful of the homa, that never utter the vashat and other sacred mantras, and become known as the lowest and vilest of men. Thus, O devi, have I explained to you the entire ocean of dharma in respect of Manavas, for the sake of removing your doubts, and not omitting the sins of which they become guilty.'"

"Narada said, 'Having said all this, the powerful Mahadeva himself became desirous of listening to what his beloved consort, the devi Uma, seated beside him, could tell him and she was inclined to satisfy his desire.'

Mahadeva said, 'You, O devi, know well what Supreme is and what is not. You know all dharma, O you that love to dwell in the asramas of Rishis. You are imbued with every virtue, O you of beautiful brows and hair ending in the fairest curls, O Hymavati, daughter of the king of mountains. You are skilled in all things. You are endowed with self-restraint and you look impartially upon all creatures. Divested of all ego, you are devoted to the practice of every dharma. O you of beautiful features, I wish to ask you something, and I wish that you discourse to me on that subject.

Savitri is the chaste wife of Brahma. The chaste Sachi is the wife of Indra. Dhumrorna is the wife of Markandeya, and Riddhi of Vaisravana. Varuna has Gauri for his consort, and Surya has Suvarchala. Rohini is the chaste wife of Sasin, and Swaha of Vibhavasu. And Kasyapa has Aditi. All these regard their husbands as their gods.

You have, O devi, conversed and associated with all of them. It is for this reason, O you who know all dharma, that I want to ask you about the kartavyas of women, and because everything you say is consistent with dharma. I want to hear you discourse on this subject from the beginning. You practise all the duties of dharma with me. Your conduct is exactly like mine, and the vows you observe are the same that I keep. Your power and energy are equal to mine, and you have undergone the austerest penances.

The subject, when discoursed upon by you, will become invested with great punya. Indeed, that discourse will then become scripture and the authority in the world. Women, in special, are the highest refuge of women. O you of beautiful hips, among human beings the pravritti which you lay down will be followed from generation to generation.

Half of my body is half your body. You are always engaged in doing the work of the Devas, and it is you that are the cause of the peopling of the earth. O auspicious goddess, you do for certain know all the eternal duties of women. Do you, therefore, tell me in detail what the dharmas are of your sex.'

Uma said, 'Swami, Lord of all created things, source of all that is past, present and in the future, it is through your grace that the words that I speak arise in my mind. All these rivers that are of my sex, Devadeva, flowing with the waters of all the tirthas, approach your presence to enable you to perform your ablutions in them. After consulting them, I will speak upon the subject you have asked about, in due order.

That man who, though mighty and able, is still free from egotism, is rightly called a purusha. As regards woman, Lord of all beings, she follows those of her sex. By consulting these foremost of rivers shall I honour them. The sacred Saraswati is the foremost of rivers. She courses towards the ocean and is truly the first of all sacred streams. Vipasa also here, and Vitasta, and Chandrabhaga, and Iravati, and Satadru, and the Devika river, and Kausiki, and Gomati. And this celestial river who has in her all the sacred tirthas, the devi Ganga, who having her font in swarga has descended on the earth and is the greatest and best of all sacred streams.'

Having said this, the consort of that God of gods smilingly addressed all those river goddesses. The devi Uma, devoted to the performance of every dharma, questioned those sacred rivers about the dharma of women, for verily, those best of rivers, having Ganga for their first, are all conversant with the duties of women.'

Uma said, 'The illustrious Siva has asked a question about the dharma of women. I wish to answer Sankara after having consulted with you. I do not see any branch of knowledge on earth or heaven that can be mastered by anyone without your help. You rivers that flow towards the ocean, it is for this that I seek your opinions.'

Thus were those greatest of rivers, all of whom were auspicious and most sacred, questioned by Siva's consort. Then the celestial Ganga, who worshipped the daughter of the prince of mountains in return, was chosen to answer the question. For, indeed, she of sweet smiles is held as swelling with diverse kinds of understanding and deeply knowing of the dharma of women. The sacred river, who can dispel all fear of sin, who is possessed of humility because of her intelligence, who is well acquainted with every dharma, and enriched with an intelligence of unequalled comprehensiveness, replied thus to Uma.

Ganga said, 'Devi, you are always devoted to the performance of every dharma. You have shown me your favour by questioning me. O sinless one, you are honoured by all the universe, yet you ask me that am just a river. I believe that one who, though entirely competent to discourse on any subject, yet asks another, or who pays a graceful tribute to another, certainly deserves to be regarded as a Mahatman. Such a one deserves to be called learned and wise. Such a one never falls into disgrace who consults such others as are endued with gyana and vigyana, and as are knowing of vastus, premises, and anumanas, inferences. By speaking in the midst of an assembly, relying upon his own powers alone and without consulting with others, a proud man, even when endowed with intelligence finds himself uttering only words of weak import.

You are possessed of spiritual insight; you are the foremost of all those that dwell in swarga. You have arisen here accompanied by diverse kinds of exalted punya. You, devi Uma, are absolutely competent to discourse on the dharma of women.'

In this way, the goddess Uma was worshipped by Ganga and honoured with the ascription of many high merits. Thus praised, the beautiful goddess then began to discourse upon all the duties of women in full.

Uma said, 'I shall, according to the law, speak on the subject of women's dharma as far as it is known to me. Do you all listen with attention. The dharma of women arises as created at the outset by kinsmen during the rites of marriage. Indeed, a woman becomes, in the presence of the nuptial fire, the partner of her lord in the performance of all punya karmas. Possessed of a good disposition, blessed with sweet speech, sweet conduct and sweet features, and always looking at the face of her husband and deriving as much joy from it as she does from looking at the face of her child, the chaste woman who regulates her pravritti by observing the prescribed restraints, comes to be regarded as truly righteous in her conduct.

Listening with reverence to the dharma of married life as expounded in the scriptures, and accomplishing all those auspicious duties, the woman who regards dharma as the foremost of all objects of pursuit; who observes the same vows as her husband; who, adorned with chastity, looks upon her husband as a god; who waits upon and serves him as if he is a god; who surrenders her own will completely to that of her lord; who is calm and cheerful, who keeps excellent vratas; who is blessed with gracious and goodly features, and whose heart is so completely devoted to her husband that she never even thinks of any other man, is regarded as truly righteous in her conduct.

The wife who, even when addressed harshly and looked upon with angry eyes by her lord, presents a cheerful aspect to him, is said to be truly devoted to her husband. She who does not cast her eyes upon the moon or the sun or even a tree that has a masculine name, who is adored by her husband and who is possessed of beautiful features, is regarded as truly righteous. The woman who treats her husband with the affection which she shows towards her child, even when the husband happens to be poor or diseased or weak or worn out with the toil of travelling, is regarded as truly righteous in her conduct.

The woman who is endued with self-control, who has given birth to children, who serves her husband with devotion, and whose whole heart is devoted to him, is regarded as truly righteous in her conduct. The woman who waits upon and serves her lord with a cheerful heart, who indeed is always cheerful of heart, and who is possessed of humility, is regarded as truly righteous in her vyavahara. That woman who always supports her kinsmen and relatives by giving them food, and whose relish in gratifying her desires or for articles of enjoyment, or for the affluence of which she is mistress, or for the happiness with which she is surrounded, falls short of her relish for her husband, is regarded as truly righteous in her pravritti.

That woman who always takes pleasure in rising early, before dawn, who is devoted to the discharge of all her household duties, who always keeps her home clean, who anoints her home daily with cow-dung, who always attends to the domestic fire, who never neglects to make offerings of flowers and other auspicious things to the gods, who with her husband gratifies the deities and guests and all servants and dependants of the family with that share of food which is theirs by the law, and who always takes, according to the law, for herself, what food remains in the house only after the needs have been met of the gods and guests and servants; who gratifies all who come in contact with her family and feeds them to their fill, succeeds in acquiring great punya.

That woman who is accomplished, who worships the feet of her father-in-law and mother-in-law, and who is always devoted to her father and mother, is regarded as possessed of tapodhana, ascetic wealth. That woman who supports with food Brahmanas that are weak and helpless, that are distressed or blind or destitute, comes to be regarded as entitled to share the punya of her husband. That woman who always observes, with a light heart, vows that are difficult of observance, whose heart is entirely devoted to her lord, and who always seeks the good of her lord, is regarded as entitled to share the punya of her husband.

Devotion to her lord is a woman's merit; it is her penance; it is her eternal heaven. Punya, tapasya, and swarga itself become hers who looks upon her husband as her all, and who, with perfect chastity, seeks to devote herself to her lord in all things. The husband is the god that women have. The husband is their friend; the husband is their highest refuge. Women have no refuge that can compare with their husbands, and no god that can compare with him. The husband's grace and heaven are equal in the estimation of a woman; or, if unequal, the inequality is trivial.

Maheswara, my Lord, I do not desire swarga itself if you are not satisfied with me. If the husband that is poor, or diseased or distressed or fallen among foes, or afflicted by a Brahmana's curse, were to command the wife to do something that is improper or unrighteous or that may lead to destruction of life itself, the wife should, without any hesitation, do it.

And so have I, Siva, my Lord and only God, expounded, at your command, what the dharma of women is. The woman who conducts herself in this way becomes entitled to a share of all the punya won by her husband.'

Narada continued, 'Thus addressed, Maheswara applauded the daughter of the king of mountains and then dismissed all those holy ones that had assembled there, together with his own ganas, his bhutas and pramathas. The diverse tribes of ghostly beings, as also all the embodied rivers, and the Gandharvas and Apsaras, all bowed their heads low to Mahadeva and returned to where they had all come from."

CANTO 147

"The Rishis said, 'Wielder of the Pinaka, gouger of the eyes of Bhaga, you that are worshipped by all the universe, we desire to hear the glory of Vasudeva.'

Maheswara said, 'Hari is superior to the Grandsire Brahma himself. He is the Eternal Purusha. Otherwise called Krishna, he is endowed with the splendour of gold, and shines with effulgence like a second sun. Possessed of ten arms, he is of infinite tejas, and is the slayer of the foes of the gods. Having a whorl, the srivatsa, on his breast, he has curly locks of hair on his head. He is worshipped by all the deities.

Brahma came from his navel. I have sprung from his head. All the stars and luminaries in the firmament have sprung from his hair. From the bristles on his body have sprung all the Devas and Asuras. From his body have come the Rishis as also all the eternal worlds. He is the abode of the Pitamaha and the abode of all the gods besides. He is the Creator of this whole earth, and he is the Lord of the three worlds. He is also the destroyer of all creatures, chala and achala. He is truly the foremost of all the gods. He is their master. He is the chastiser of all foes. He is omniscient. He exists in everything. He goes everywhere at will.

He is of universal extent, pervading as he does everything. He is the Supreme Soul. He is the mover of all the senses. He covers the universe. He is the Supreme Lord. There is nothing in the three worlds that is superior to him. He is eternal. He is Madhusudana, the slayer of Madhu, and is otherwise called Govinda. The giver of honours, he comes in human form and causes all the kings of the earth to be killed in battle, to achieve the purposes of the Devas. If they are abandoned by him, the Devas are cannot accomplish their purposes on earth. Indeed, without having him as their Lord they cannot do anything. He is the Lord of all creatures and is adored by all the gods. Within the belly of this sovereign of the gods, who is ever devoted to the accomplishment of their purposes, of this One who is identical with Brahman and who is always the refuge of regenerate Rishis, dwells Brahma the Grandsire. Indeed, Brahma dwells happily in Hari's body which is his home. I myself, that am called Sarva, also dwell joyfully in that blissful abode which is Narayana. All the gods, as well, reside in perfect happiness in his body.

Endowed with great refulgence, he has eyes that resemble the petals of the lotus. Sri dwells within him and he dwells always in union with her. The bow called Saranga and the chakra called Sudarsana are his weapons, together with a sword. He has the enemy of the snakes, Garuda, on his standard. He is distinguished by immaculate pravritti, by purity of both body and mind, by self-restraint, by prowess, by energy, by the handsomest form, by being tall and of perfectly proportioned limbs, by patience, by sincerity, by affluence, by compassion, by excellence of form, and by might. He shines forth, endowed with all celestial weapons of wonderful form and craft.

He has yoga for his illusion. He is possessed of a thousand eyes. He is free from every stain or fault. He is high-minded. He is invested with heroism, virya, which he embodies. He is an object of pride with all his friends. He is dear to all his kinsmen and relatives and they are dear to him. He is forgiving. He is entirely free from pride or egotism. He is devoted to the Brahmanas and is their Lord. He dispels the fears of all afflicted with fear. He enhances the joys of all his friends. He is the refuge of all creatures.

He is ever engaged in protecting and cherishing the distressed. Possessed of a thorough knowledge of all the scriptures, and every kind of affluence, he is worshipped by all beings. Absolutely conversant with all dharma, he is a great benefactor of even enemies and fallen men when they seek his protection. The master of policy and indeed policy embodied, he is a Brahmavadi, an utterer of Brahman, and has all his senses under perfect control.

For doing good to the Devas, Govinda will be born in the race of the Mahatman Manu. Verily, endued with Mahabuddhi, he will be born into the auspicious and righteous vamsa of that Prajapati. Manu will have a son named Anga. After Anga will come Antardhaman. From Antardhaman will spring Havirdhaman, that Lord of all creatures, free from every stain. Havirdhaman will have an illustrious son of the name of Rachinavarhi. He will have ten sons, with Prachetas the first. Prachetas will have a son named Daksha who will be regarded as a Prajapati. Daksha will beget a daughter who will be named Dakshayani.

From Dakshayani will spring Aditya, and from Aditya will spring Manu. From Manu will be born a daughter named Ila and a son named Sudyumna. Ila will have Budha for her husband, and from Budha will spring Pururavas. From Pururavas will come Ayu. From Ayu will spring Nahusha, and Nahusha will beget a son named Yayati. From Yayati will come a mighty son of the name of Yadu; Yadu will beget Kroshtri. Kroshtri will beget a great son to be named Vrijinivat. From Vrijinivat will come Ushadgu the unvanquished. Ushadgu will beget a son of the name of Chitraratha. Chitraratha will have a younger son of the name Sura.

Indeed, in the race of these mighty men, of tejas celebrated the world over, possessed of excellent conduct and diverse accomplishments, devoted to the performance of sacrifices and of pure karmas, in the pure race honoured by the Brahmanas, Sura will take his birth. He will be a great Kshatriya, endowed with untold energy, and possessed of great fame. Sura, that giver of honours, will beget a son, the perpetuator of his race, name Vasudeva, otherwise called Anakadundhubhi.

Vasudeva will have a son of the name of Vaasudeva. He will have four arms. He will be exceedingly liberal, and will honour the Brahmanas greatly. Identical with the Brahman, he will love the Brahmanas, and the Brahmanas will love him. That scion of Yadu's race will liberate a hundred great kings immured in the prisons of the ruler of the Magadhas, after vanquishing Jarasandha in his capital hidden among mountains.

Of untold energy and might, this Krishna will be rich with the jewellery and gems of all the rulers of the world. Indeed, in tejas he will be unrivalled on earth; possessed of great prowess, he will be the Lord of all kings of the world. Foremost among all the Surasenas, the puissant one, dwelling in Dwaraka, will rule and protect all the earth after vanquishing all her kings, for he will have the vigyana of polity.

Assembling together, do you all adore him, as you worship the Eternal Brahman, with speech, flower garlands and the best incense and perfumes.

He who wishes to see me or the Grandsire Brahma should first see the illustrious Krishna Vaasudeva of great puissance. If he is seen I am seen, as also the Pitamaha Brahma. There is no difference between us three. Know this, you Rishis of tapodhana!

With that person with whom the lotus-eyed Krishna becomes gratified, all the Devas with Brahma amongst them will also be pleased. That man who seeks the protection of Kesava will succeed in earning great achievements and victory and heaven itself. He will be a teacher of dharma and karma, and will earn untold punya. All those that know dharma and karma should, with alacrity, bow down to that Lord of all the gods. By adoring that mighty one, you will acquire great merit.

Of infinite tejas, that Hari, from the desire to benefit all creatures, created millions of Rishis, for the sake of dharma. Those millions of Rishis, thus created by that great Ordainer, now dwell on the mountains of Gandhamadana, led by Sanatkumara and engaged in awesome tapasya. Hence, Dvijottamas, must the righteous Krishna Vaasudeva be adored by all.

The illustrious Hari, the almighty Narayana, is, verily, the foremost of all beings in heaven. Adored, he adores, and honoured he honours; to them that make offerings to him, he makes offerings in return. Worshipped, he worships in return; if seen always, he sees the seers always. If one seeks his refuge and protection, he seeks the seeker as his refuge in return. You foremost of all righteous ones, if adored and worshipped, he adores and worships in return, without fail.

Even this is the high pravritti of the faultless Vishnu. Even this is the vow that all the righteous observe, of that first of all Gods, that omnipotent Lord of all creatures. He is always worshipped in the world. Verily, that Eternal Being is worshipped by even the Devas. Those that are devoted to him, with the steadfastness of a vrata, become liberated from fear and misfortune in proportion to their bhakti. The regenerate ones should always worship him in thought, word and deed. The son of Devaki should be looked upon by them with reverence and in order to see him with reverence, they should address themselves to the performance of penances.

You foremost of ascetics, even this is the path that I reveal to you. By seeing him, you will behold all the greatest gods. I, too, bow my head in reverence to that Lord of the universe, that Grandsire of all the worlds, that mighty and vast blue Varaha. By seeing him one beholds the Trimurtis, the Trinity. All the gods dwell in him.

He will have an elder brother who will become known over the world as Balarama. Having a plough for his weapon, he will look like a white hill in form. Indeed, he will be endowed with might that can lift the very earth. Upon the chariot of that divine person a tall palmyra, three-fronded and golden, will form his proud standard. The head of that mighty-armed hero, that Lord of all the worlds, will be shaded by many high-souled snakes of vast bodies. All the divine weapons will also come to him as soon as he thinks of them. He is called Ananta, the Infinite. That illustrious one is identical with the immutable Hari.

Once on a time, the mighty Garuda, the son of Kasyapa, was addressed by the Devas in these words, “Do you, O mighty one, see if this One has any end!” Though possessed of untold energy, Garuda failed to discover any end to this illustrious Ananta who is identical with the Paramatman. Supporting the whole world on his head, he dwells in the Patalas. He ranges through the universe as Sesha, always filled with great joy. He is Vishnu; He is the illustrious Ananta. He is the supporter of the earth. He that is Balarama is Hrishikesa. He that is Achyuta is Ananta, the bearer of the earth.

Both those foremost of all beings are divine and endowed with divine prowess. One of them is armed with the chakra and the other with the halayudha. They deserve every honour and a vision of them must be eagerly sought.

I have, through my affection for you, thus declared to you the nature of Krishna Narayana. Even this, you tapodhanas, is dharma. I have declared all this to you so that you may, with reverence and care, worship Krishna, that greatest of Yadu’s vamsa.’” Narada said, "At the conclusion of Mahadeva's discourse, loud roars were heard in the firmament. Thunder bellowed, with flashes of lightning. The welkin was enveloped with thick blue clouds. The god of the clouds then poured down purifying deluges as he does in the monsoon. A heavy darkness set in. The points of the horizon could no longer be distinguished. Then on that delightful, sacred and eternal breast of that celestial mountain, the assembled Rishis no longer saw the multitude of ghostly beings that associate with Mahadeva.

CANTO 148

Soon, however, the sky cleared. Some of the Rishis set out for the sacred tirthas. Others returned from whence they came. Verily, beholding that wonderful and inconceivable sight, they were filled with amazement. The discourse, as well, between Sankara and Uma filled them with awe and wonder. You, O Lord, are that foremost of all beings, of whom the Mahatman Sankara spoke to us on that mountain. You are the Eternal Brahman.

On that occasion, also, Mahadeva burnt Himavat with his tejas. You have also shown us a similar spectacle. Indeed, today we have been put in remembrance of that time. O mighty-armed Janardana, I have thus, O almighty one, recited to you the glory of that God of gods, him that is called Kapardin or Girisa!"' Bhishma continues, 'Thus addressed by those denizens of ascetic retreats, Krishna, the delighter of Devaki, paid due honour to all those Rishis. Filled with delight, those Rishis once more addressed Krishna, saying, "Madhusudana, do you repeatedly show yourself to us at all times!

O almighty one, swarga cannot give us such bliss as does the sight of you. Everything that the illustrious Bhava said about you is true. O Parantapa, we have told you all about that mystery. You yourself well know the truth of all things. Since, however, questioned by us, it pleased you to question us in return, we have narrated everything about the discourse of Bhava with Uma, only to please you.

There is nothing in the three worlds that is unknown to you. You know the birth and origin of all things, indeed, you know everything that are a Cause of causes. Being ourselves of light natures, we are unable to bear within us such tremendous mysteries without speaking of them in wonder. Indeed, in your presence, O Greatest, we indulge in incoherencies from the lightness of our hearts. There is no wonderful thing that is unknown to you. Whatever is on earth, and whatever is in heaven, is all known to you.

We take our leave of you, Krishna, to return to our various homes. May you increase in intelligence and prosperity. O Lord, O Sire, You will soon have a son like yourself, or even more distinguished than you. He will be imbued with great energy and splendour. He will achieve tremendous feats, and become possessed of power as great as yours."'

Bhishma continues, 'After this, the great Rishis bowed to that God of gods, that scion of Yadu's race, that foremost of all great Beings. They then circumambulated him in pradakshina and, taking his leave, departed. As for Narayana, who is endowed with prosperity and blazing effulgence, he returned to Dwaraka after having duly completed that vrata of his. His wife Rukmini conceived, and on the expiration of the tenth month, a son was born of her, possessed of heroism and honoured by all for his utterly wonderful accomplishments. He, Pradyumna, is that Kama, the god of love, who exists in every creature and who pervades every existence. Indeed, he moves within the hearts of both Devas and Asuras.

And this Krishna is the foremost of all purushas. Even he of the hue of clouds is that four-armed Vaasudeva. Through affection, he has attached himself to the Pandavas, and you also, you sons of Pandu, have attached yourselves to him. Achievements, prosperity, intelligence and the path that leads to swarga, are all there where this One, Trivikrama, the illustrious Vishnu of three steps, is. He is the three and thirty gods with Indra at their head. There is no doubt about this. He is the One Ancient God. He is the first of all the gods. He is the refuge of all creatures. He is without beginning and without end. He is Avyakta, unmanifest.

He is the high-souled Madhusudana, the slayer of Madhu. Endowed with infinite tejas and urjas, he has been born among men to accomplish the purpose of the gods. Verily, this Madhava is the expounder of the most difficult truths which relate to artha, and he is also their achiever. O son of Pritha, the victory you have won over your enemies, your unrivalled achievements, the dominion you have acquired over the whole earth, are all due to this Narayana having taken your part. Your having got the inconceivable Narayana for your protector and refuge enabled you to become a terrible Adhvaryu, a sacrificer to pour multitudes of kings as libations into the raging fire of war. This Krishna was your great Sruva, your sacrificial ladle, resembling the all-consuming fire that appears at the end of the yuga. Duryodhana, with his sons, brothers and kinsmen, was much to be pitied, for, moved by wrath, he made agaisnt with Hari and the wielder of the Gandiva. Many sons of Diti, many foremost Danavas, of great bodies and vast strength, have perished in the flames of Krishna's chakra like insects in a forest fire. How then will Manavas, mere mortal men, do battle against that Krishna, ah, human beings who, Purushavyaghra, have hardly any strength or prowess?

As for Jaya, this Arjuna, he is a mighty yogin resembling the all-destroying yuga-fire in urjas. Drawing his bow equally with both hands, the Savyasachin is always in the van of battle. With his irresistible energy, O king, he has slain all the heroes and legions of Suyodhana.

Listen to me as I tell you what Mahadeva who has the bull for the device on his standard, once said to the Rishis, upon the breast of the Himavat. His utterances constitute a Purana. The advancement of greatness, energy, strength, prowess, puissance, humility and lineage that are in Arjuna can come up to only a third part of the measure in which those attributes reside in Krishna. Who is there that can equal, let alone surpass, Krishna in these qualities? Whether that is possible or not, listen and judge.

There where the illustrious Krishna is, there is unrivalled vishishtatha, excellence. As for myself, I am one of little understanding. Dependent upon the will of others, I am unfortunate. Knowingly, I set myself on the eternal path of death. You, however, are devoted to sincerity of conduct. Having once pledged yourself not to take back your kingdom, even when you might have done so, you did not take it, for you were determined to keep your oath. O Yudhishtira, king, you make too much of the slaughter of your kinsmen and friends in battle. You must remember that it is never right to break a sworn oath.

All those who have fallen on the field of battle have actually been slain by Time. Verily, all of us have been slain by Time. Time is, indeed, all-powerful. You know full well the inexorable puissance of Time. Afflicted by Kaala, it does not become you to grieve. Know that Krishna himself, otherwise called Hari, is that same Kaala, with blood-red eyes and with cudgel in hand. For these reasons, O son of Kunti, it does not befit you to grieve for your slain kinsfolk. Be you always free, Kurunandana, from grief.

You have heard of the glory and greatness of Madhava Krishna. That is sufficient to enable a good man to understand him. Having heard the words of Vyasa, as also of Narada Mahabuddhi, I have spoken to you about Krishna, the most Adorable Lord. I have myself added, from my own knowledge, something to Narada's discourse. I have also spoken of the surpassing might of Krishna as recited by Mahadeva to the conclave of Rishis upon the breast of the Himavat. The converse between Maheswara and the daughter of Himavat, also, Bhaarata, have I narrated to you.

He who will bear in his heart that discourse when coming from a great and righteous person, he who will listen to it, and he who will recite it for others to hear is sure to win the highest, most auspicious punya. That man will find all his wishes fulfilled. Leaving this world, he will ascend into swarga. There is no doubt of this. That man who wants to attain to his own great weal should devote himself to Krishna Janardana.

King of the Kurus, you must also always bear in mind those revelations about dharma and kartavya which were declared by Maheswara. If you conduct yourself according to those precepts, if you bear the rod of chastisement justly and rightly, if you protect your subjects properly, you may be sure of attaining to Swargaloka. It is your solemn duty, O Rajan, to protect your subjects always according to the dictates of dharma. The stout neeti danda, the staff of punishment, which the king bears, has been said to be the embodiment of his dharma and his punya.

Hearing the discourse, fraught with deepest dharma, between Sankara and Uma, which I have recited in this righteous conclave, you should worship with utmost reverence that God who has the bull for the emblem on his banner. He who grows even desirous of listening to that paribhasa should worship Mahadeva with utmost reverence. Verily, the one who wishes his own weal should adore Mahadeva with a pure heart. Even this is the command of the faultless Narada. Even he has commanded such worship of the Great God, O son of Pandu; do you obey that command of Narada.

O most powerful king, even these are the wondrous events that transpired on the sacred breast of the Himavat, with regard to Vishnu and Sthanu. Those events flowed from the very nature of those Mahatman Deities. Krishna, accompanied by the wielder of Gandiva, practised eternal tapasya in the Badarikasrama for ten thousand years. Verily, Krishna and Dhananjaya, who are the ancient Narayana and Nara, both of eyes like lotus-petals, underwent severe austerities for the duration of three whole yugas. I learnt this from Narada and Vyasa, O king.

The lotus-eyed Mahabaho Krishna, while yet a boy, achieved the great feat of killing Kamsa for the relief of his kinsmen. I do not venture, son of Kunti, to enumerate the feats of this Ancient and Eternal Being, O Yudhishtira. Without doubt, son, you will have high and great rewards who own that foremost of all persons, Krishna Vaasudeva, for your friend.

I grieve for the evil Duryodhana even in respect of the next world to which he has gone. It was for him that all the earth has been razed of her people, along with her elephants and steeds. Indeed, through the folly and sins of Duryodhana, of Karna, of Sakuni and of Dusasana as the fourth, the Kurus have perished.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "While that foremost of men, the son of Ganga, speaks to him in this strain, the Kuru King Yudhishtira remains entirely silent in the midst of the Mahatmans who have gathered to listen to the wisdom and discourses of Bhishma. All the kings, with Dhritarashtra amongst them, are filled with profound wonder upon hearing the words of the Kuru Grandsire. In their hearts they worship Krishna and then turn towards him with hands joined in reverence. The Rishis, also, with Narada at their head, accept and laud the words of Bhishma and approve of them joyfully. These are the wonderful Paribhashas of Bhishma which Pandu's son Yudhishtira with all his brothers hear with deep gratitude and joy.

Some time after, when Yudhishtira sees that Ganga's son, who had given away abundant wealth as dakshina and dana to the Brahmanas at the sacrifices performed by him, has rested and become refreshed, the intelligent king once more questions him."

Vaisampayana said, "Having heard of all the kartavyas in their entirety and all those sacred karmas and vastus, objects, that cleanse human beings of their sins, Yudhishtira once more addresses the son of Santanu.

Yudhishtira says, 'Who may be said to be the One God in the world? Who may be said to be the One Vastu which is our sole refuge? Who is he by worshipping whom and hymning whose praises men acquire what is most beneficial to them? What dharma is that which, in your judgment, is the foremost of all dharmas? What are those mantras by reciting which in japa a living creature is freed from the bonds of birth and life?'

Bhishma says, 'One should always, with alacrity and casting aside all languor, hymn the praises of that Lord of the universe, that God of gods Vasudeva, who is Infinite and Eternal, who is Sanctity Itself, the Most Auspicious, the foremost of all Beings, the Mahateja, the One God, by uttering his thousand names, the Vishnu Sahasranamam. By always worshipping with sraddha and bhakti that immutable Being, by meditating on him, by singing his praises and bowing one's head to him, and by performing sacrifices to him, indeed by always glorifying Vishnu, who is without beginning and without end or death, who is the Supreme Lord of all the worlds, the Parabrahman, and who is the Master and Controller of the universe, a man succeeds in transcending all sorrow.

Verily, he is devoted to the Brahmanas, conversant with all dharmas and karmas, the enhancer of the fame and achievement of all persons, the Master of all the worlds, absolutely wonderful, and the Prime Cause of the origin of all creatures. Even this, in my judgment, is the foremost Dharma of all dharmas—that one should always worship and hymn the praises of the lotus-eyed Krishna with devotion. He is the highest Tejas. He is the highest Tapasya. He is the highest Brahman. He is the highest Asrama. He is the Holiest of all holies, the most Auspicious of all things auspicious. He is the God of all the gods and he is the immutable Father of all creatures.

At the advent of the primal yuga, the Satya or Krita yuga, all creatures issue from him. At the end, again, of a yuga, all things disappear into him. Hear, O king, the thousand names, possessed of great efficacy in destroying sins, of that foremost One in all the worlds, that Master of the universe, Vishnu Narayana. All the names derived from his attributes, secret and well-known, of the Mahatman Vasudeva, which were sung by Rishis, I shall recite to you for the good of all. I invoke that Lord with this dhyanam:

Shantakaram Bhujagasayanam Pamdanabham Suresam; Viswadharam Gaganasadrisham Meghavarnam Subhangam; Lakshmikantam Kamalanayam Yogihrid-dhayanagamyam; Vande Vishnum Bhavabhayaharam Sarvalokaikanatham.

AUM Namo Bhagavate Vasudevayah!

The thousand names of that Vishnu, the Vishnusahasranamam, are: AUM!

'Even thus have I recited to you, without any exception, the thousand excellent names of the Mahatman Kesava whose glory should always be sung. The man who listens to the names every day or who recites them every day, never meets with any evil either here or hereafter. If a Brahmana does this, he succeeds in mastering the Vedanta; if a Kshatriya does, he is always victorious in battle. A Vaisya, by doing it, becomes possessed of great affluence, while a Sudra earns great happiness.

If one wishes to earn the punya of dharma, one succeeds by hearing or reciting these names. If it is wealth that one desires, one succeeds by reciting or listening to the Vishnusahasranamam. So also the man who wishes for kama, the pleasures of the senses, succeeds in enjoying all manner of pleasures, and the man wanting children acquires offspring.

That man who, with devotion and perseverance and his heart wholly turned towards him, recites these thousand names of Vishnu every day, after having purified himself, succeeds in acquiring great fame, a position of pre-eminence among his kinsmen, enduring prosperity, and lastly, that which is of the highest benefit to him—mukti itself. Such a man never meets with fear at any time, and acquires great urjas and tejas, prowess and glory. Disease never afflicts him; splendour of complexion, strength, beauty and accomplishments become his. The sick become hale, the afflicted are freed from their afflictions; the affrighted are freed from fear, and he that is plunged in calamity is freed from all trouble.

The man who hymns the praises of that foremost of Beings by reciting his thousand names with devotion succeeds in quickly crossing over all difficulties. That mortal who takes refuge in Vasudeva and who becomes devoted to him, is freed of all sins and attains to eternal Brahman. They who are devoted to Vasudeva have never to encounter any evil. They become free from the fear of birth, death, decrepitude and disease.

That man who with bhakti and sraddha recites this Vishnusahasranamam acquires grace of soul, forgiveness of disposition, prosperity, intelligence, memory and fame. Neither wrath nor jealousy, or greed, or evil thoughts ever appear in those men of dharma who are devoted to that Foremost of beings. The firmament with the sun, moon and stars, the sky, the points of the compass, the earth and the ocean, are all held and supported by the prowess of the Mahatman Vishnu. The whole mobile and immobile universe, with the Devas, Asuras, and Gandharvas, Yakshas, Uragas and Rakshasas, is under the sway of Krishna.

The senses, mind, intellect, life, energy, strength and memory, it has been said, have him for their soul. Indeed, this body that is called kshetra, and the intelligent soul within, called the kshetrajna, also have Krishna for their soul. Pravritti is said to be the foremost of all subjects treated of in the scriptures. Righteousness has conduct for its basis. The unfading Narayana is said to be the Lord of dharma.

The Rishis, the Pitris, the Devas, the Mahabhutas, indeed, the entire mobile and immobile Akhanda, have sprung from Narayana. Yoga, the Samkhya philosophy, knowledge, all mechanical arts, the Vedas, the diverse scriptures, and all learning, have issued from Janardana. Vishnu is the One Great Element, the Single Substance which has spread itself out into multifarious forms. Covering the three worlds, he, the soul of all things, enjoys them all. His glory knows no diminution, and he it is that is the Enjoyer of the universe. This hymn in praise of the illustrious Vishnu composed by Vyasa, should be recited by that person who wishes to acquire happiness and that which is the highest and ultimate benefit—moksha.

Those that worship and adore the Lord of the universe, that God who is Unborn and of blazing effulgence, who is the origin, the cause of the universe, who knows no decay, and who has eyes that are as large and beautiful as the petals of the lotus, have never to meet with any distress.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha of great wisdom, O you who know all the branches of knowledge, what is japa, silent chanting, by doing which, every day, one acquires the reward of righteousness in a large measure? What is that mantra which bestows success if recited on the occasion of setting out on a journey or entering a new home, or at the commencement of any undertaking, or on the occasion of sacrifices in honour of the Devas or of the Pitris? It behoves you to tell me what mantra it is which propitiates all malevolent influences, leads to prosperity and growth, protects from evil, destroys all foes, dispels all fears, and which, at the same time, is consistent with the Vedas.'

Bhishma says, 'Hear, O king, with dhyana what that mantra is which was declared by Vyasa. It was ordained by Savitri and is of profound excellence. It can instantly purify a man of all his sins. Hear, O sinless one, as I recite to you the law in respect of that mantra. Indeed, O first of the sons of Pandu, by listening to those laws one is cleansed of all one's sins. One who recites this mantra day and night is never stained by sin.

I will now declare to you what that mantra is. Do you listen with attention. Indeed, the man that hears it is blessed with long life, O prince, and attaining to the fruition of all his wishes dwells in bliss both here and hereafter. This mantra, O Yudhishtira, was daily recited by the foremost of Rajarishis, the royal sages devoted to the practice of Kshatriya dharma and steadfastly observant of the vow of truth. Indeed, O tiger among kings, those monarchs who, with restrained senses and tranquil soul, chant this mantra every day, succeed in acquiring unrivalled prosperity.

Salutations to Vasishta of the high vows, after bowing with reverence to Parasara, that ocean of the Vedas. Salutations to the great Snake Ananta, and salutations to all those who are crowned with success, and who own unfading glory. Salutations to the Rishis, and to him that is the Highest of the High, the God of gods, and the giver of boons to all those that are foremost. Salutations to him of a thousand heads, him that is most auspicious, him that has a thousand names—the One Janardana!

Aja, Ekapada, Ahivradhna, the unvanquished Pinakin, Rita, Pitrirupa, the three-eyed Maheswara, Vrishakapi, Sambhu, Havana and Iswara—these are the celebrated Rudras, eleven in number, who are the Lords of all the worlds. Even these eleven Mahatmans have been mentioned as a hundred in the Satarudra of the Vedas.

Ansa, Bhaga, Mitra, Varuna the lord of waters, Dhatri, Aryaman, Jayanta, Bhaskara, Tvashtri, Pushan, Indra and Vishnu are said to comprise a group of twelve. These twelve are called Adityas and they are the sons of Kasyapa as the Sruti declares.

Dhara, Dhruva, Some, Savitra, Anila, Anala, Pratyusha and Prabhava are the eight Vasus named in the scriptures. Nasataya and Dasra are the two Aswins. They are the sons of Martanda born of his wife Samjna, from whose nostrils they emerged.

After this I will recite the names of those who are the witnesses of all karma in the worlds. They take note of all sacrifices, of all gifts, of all good deeds. Those lords among the deities behold everything while they are themselves invisible. Indeed, they behold all the good and bad karma of all beings. They are Mrityu, Kala, the Viswedevas, the Pitris endued with forms, the great Rishis possessed of the wealth of penances, the Munis, and others crowned with spiritual success and devoted to tapasya and mukti. These of radiant smiles bestow diverse rewards upon men that recite their names. Verily, imbued with celestial energy, they bestow upon such men diverse worlds of felicity created by the Grandsire. They reside in all the worlds and attentively note all actions. By reciting the names of those Lords of all living creatures, one always becomes endowed with dharma, artha and kama in copious measure. One acquires hereafter diverse regions of auspiciousness and plenitude created by the Lord of the universe.

These three and thirty Devas, who are the lords of all beings, as also Nandiswara of the vast body, and that Pre-eminent One who has the bull for the device on his banner, and those masters of all the worlds—the Ganas, the followers and companions of him called Ganeswara—and those called Saumyas, and the Rudras, and those called the Yogas, and those that are known as the Bhutas, and the luminaries in the firmament, the rivers, the sky, Garuda the prince of birds, all those on earth who have achieved success through their tapasya and who exist in either immobile or mobile form, achala and chala, the Himavat, all the mountains, the four oceans, the followers of Bhava who are possessed of prowess equal to that of Bhava himself, the illustrious and ever-victorious Vishnu, and Skanda, and Ambika—these are the great souls by reciting whose names, with restrained senses, one is purified of all sins.

I shall now recite the names of those foremost Rishis who are known as Manavas. They are Yavakrita, and Raibhya, and Arvavasu, and Paravasu, and Aushija, and Kakshivat, and Bala, the son of Angiras. Then comes Kanwa, the son of the Rishi Medhatithi, and Barishada. All these are endowed with the tejas of Brahma and have been spoken of in the shastras as Creators of the universe. They have sprung from Rudra and Anala and the Vasus. Those who chant their names obtain great rewards. Indeed, by doing good deeds on earth, men and women sport in joy in swarga, with the Devas. These Rishis are the priests of Indra. They live in the east. That man who, with rapt attention, recites the names of these Rishis, succeeds in ascending to the regions of Indra and finding great honour there.

Unmachu, Pramchu, Swastyatreya of great energy, Dridhavya, Urdhvavahu, Trinasoma, Angiras and Agastya Mahatejasvin, the son of Mitravaruna—these seven are the ritwiks of Yama, king of the dead, and dwell in the southern quarter. Dridheyu and Riteyu, and Pariyadha of great fame, and Ekata, and Dwita, and Trita—the last three endowed with splendour like that of the sun—and Atri's son of righteous soul, Rishi Saraswata—these seven who once were the ritwiks at the Mahayagna of old of Varuna dwill in the western quarter. Atri, the illustrious Vasishta, the Maharishi Kasyapa, Gotama, Bharadwaja, Viswamitra the son of Kusika, and Richika's fierce son Jamadagni of great urjas—these seven are the ritwiks of Kubera, the Lord of treasures and dwell in the northern quarter.

There are seven other Rishis that live in all directions without being confined to any particular one. They, it is, who are the inducers of fame and of all that is beneficial to men, and they have been sung as the creators of the worlds. Dharma, Kama, Kala, Vasu, Vasuki, Ananta and Kapila—these seven are the upholders of the world. Rama, Vyasa, and Drona's son Aswatthaman are the other foremost among Rishis.

These are the great Rishis as distributed into seven groups, each group consisting of seven. They are the creators of that peace and good that men enjoy. They are said to be the regents of the several points of the horizon. One should turn one's face to that direction in which one of these Rishis dwells if one wishes to worship him. Those Rishis are the creators of all creatures and have been regarded as the cleansers of all.

Samvarta, Merusavarna, the righteous Markandeya, and Samkhya and Yoga, and Narada and the great Rishi Durvasa—these are imbued with severe penance and great self-restraint, and are celebrated throughout the three worlds. There are others who are equal to Rudra himself. They live in Brahmaloka. By naming them with reverence a sonless man obtains a son, and a poor man gains wealth. Indeed, by naming them, one acquires every success in dharma, artha and kama.

One should also take the name of that celebrated king who was emperor of all the earth and equal to a Prajapati—that foremost of all monarchs, Prithu, the son of Vena. The earth became his daughter. One should also name Pururavas of the Suryavamsa, equal to Mahendra himself in prowess. He was the son of Ila and celebrated over the three worlds. One should, indeed, take the name of that beloved son of Budha. One should also take the name of Bharata, that Kshatriya celebrated across the three worlds. He who in the Krita yuga adored the gods in a grand Gomedha yagna—Rantideva of great splendour, who was equal to Mahadeva himself, should also be named. Of untold tapasya, possessed of every auspicious mark and sign, the source of every kind of weal to the world, he was the conqueror of the universes.

One should also take the name of the Rajarishi Sweta of illustrious fame. He gratified Mahadeva and it was for his sake that Andhaka was slain. One should also take the name of the Rajarishi Bhagiratha of great fame, who, through the grace of Mahadeva, succeeded in bringing the sacred Ganga down from heaven to flow over the earth and wash all human beings of their sins. It was Bhagiratha who caused the ashes of the sixty thousand sons of Sagara to be purified by the sacred waters of Ganga and thereby rescued them from their ancient and violent sins.

Indeed, one should take the names of all these that were endued with the blazing refulgence of fire, great beauty of person and unsurpassed energy.

Some of them were of awe-inspiring forms and great might. Verily, one should take the names of these deities and Rishis and kings, those Lords of the universe, who are the enhancers of fame.

Samkhya, and yoga which is highest of the high, and havya and kavya and that refuge of all the Srutis, the Supreme Brahman, have been declared to be the sources of great weal to all creatures. These are sacred and sin-cleansing and have been spoken of most highly. These are the foremost of oshadhis for allaying all diseases, and are the enablers of the success of all deeds. Restraining one's senses, one should, O Bhaarata, take the names of these, morning and evening. It is they that protect. It is they that shower rain; they that shine and give light and heat; they that blow through the worlds. It is they that create all things.

These are regarded as the foremost of all, as the sovereigns of the universe, as the most adroit in the accomplishment of all things, as endowed with forgiveness, as complete masters of the senses. Indeed, it has been said that they dispel all the evils to which humans are subject. These Mahatmans are the witnesses of all good and bad deeds. Rising in the morning, one should take their names, for by this one is sure to acquire all that is good. He who chants these names is freed from the fear of fires and of thieves. Such a man never finds his way obstructed by any impediment. By taking the names of these lofty souls, one is never visited by dark dreams of any kind. Washed of every sin, such men take birth into auspicious families.

The Brahmana who, with restrained senses, recites these names while performing the initiatory rites of sacrifices and other religious observances, is blessed with dharma, devoted to the study of the atman, possessed of forgiveness and self-restraint, and free from malice. If a man who is afflicted with disease recites them, he is freed from his sin in the form of disease. By chanting them within a house, all evils are dispelled from the inmates. By reciting them in a field, a bounteous harvest is ensured of every kind of crop. Reciting them at the time of setting out on a journey, or while one is away from one's home, one meets with good fortune. These names lead to the protection of one's own self, of one's children and wives, of one's wealth, and of one's seeds and plants.

The Kshatriya who recites these names at the time of joining a battle sees destruction overtake his enemies and good fortune crown him and his forces. He who recites these names on the occasions of performing the rites in honour of the Devas or the Pitris, helps the Pitris and Devas eat the sacrificial havya and kavya. The man who recites them is freed from fear of disease and beasts of prey, of elephants and thieves. His load of anxiety is lightened, and he is freed from every sin. By reciting these excellent Savitri mantras on board a vessel, or in a vehicle, or in the courts of kings, one attains to high saphalata, success. There where these mantras are recited, fire does not burn wood. There children do not die, nor snakes come or dwell. Indeed, in such places, there can be no fear of the king, nor of Pisachas and Rakshasas. Verily, the man who recites these mantras ceases to have any fear of fire or water or wind or beasts of prey.

These Savitri mantras, recited duly, contribute to the peace and well-being of all the four varnas. Those men who recite them with reverence are freed from every sorrow and at last attain to a high end. Even these are the results achieved by them that recite these Savitri mantras which are of the form of Brahman. That man who recites these mantras in the midst of kine sees his kine become fruitful. Whether when setting out on a journey, or entering a house on returning, one should recite these mantras on every occasion. These mantras constitute a great mystery of the Rishis and are the very highest of those japams which they silently recite. Even such are these mantras to them who practise the dharma of japa and pour libations on the sacrificial fire.

This that I have said to you is the excellent opinion of Parasara. It was told in the oldest days to Sakra himself. Representing as it does Truth or Eternal Brahman, I have declared it in full to you. It constitutes that heart of all creatures, and is the highest Sruti. All the princes of the races of Soma and of Surya, the Raghavas and the Kauravas, recite these mantras every day after having purified themselves. These constitute the highest end of human creatures. There is rescue from every trouble and calamity in the daily recitation of the names of the Devas of the seven Rishis, and of Dhruva. Indeed, such recitation speedily frees one from all distress.

The sages of olden times, Kasyapa, Gautama, and others, and Bhrigu, Angiras and Atri and others, and Sukra, Agastya and Brihaspati and others, all of whom are regenerate Rishis, have worshipped these mantras. Approved of by the son of Bharadwaja, these mantras were attained by the sons of Richika. Verily, having acquired them again from Vasishta, Sakra and the Vasus went forth to battle and triumphed over the Danavas. That man who makes a gift of a hundred kine with their horns covered with plates of gold to a Brahmana possessed of great learning and well-conversant with the Vedas, and he who causes the excellent Mahabharata story to be recited in his house every day, are said to acquire equal punya.

By reciting the name of Bhrigu, one's righteousness is enhanced. By bowing to Vasishta, one's energy is enhanced. By bowing to Raghu, one is victorious in battle. By reciting the praises of the Aswins, one is freed from diseases. I have thus, O king, told you of the Savitri mantras which are identical with eternal Brahman. If you wish to question me on any other matter you may do so. I shall, O Bhaarata, answer you.'"

CANTO 151

"Yudhishtira says, 'Who deserve to be worshipped? Who are they to whom we should bow? How, indeed, should we behave, and towards whom? What course of conduct, Pitamaha, towards what classes of men is regarded as faultless?'

Bhishma says, 'The humiliation of Brahmanas would shame the very Devas. By bowing down to Brahmanas one does not, O Yudhishtira, incur any fault. They deserve to be worshipped. They deserve to have our salutations. You should behave towards them as if they are your sons. Indeed, it is those men of great wisdom that uphold all the worlds. The Brahmanas are the great causeways of dharma in all the worlds. Their happiness consists in renouncing all kinds of wealth. They are devoted to the vow of mowna. They are agreeable to all creatures, and observant of diverse marvellous vratas. They are the refuge of all creatures in the universe. They are the authors of all the laws which govern the worlds. They are possessed of great fame. Tapasya is always their great wealth. Their power consists of pure speech. Their energy flows from the duties they observe. Conversant with all dharma, they are possessed of minute vision, so that they are cognizant of the subtlest considerations. They are of righteous desires. They live the observance of well-performed duties. They are indeed the highways of dharma.

The four kinds of living creatures exist, depending upon them as their refuge. They are the path along which all should walk. They are the guides of all. They are the eternal upholders of all the sacrifices. They always uphold the heavy burdens of Sires and Grandsires. They never droop under heavy weights even when passing through difficult ways—like strong bullocks are they. They are attentive to the requirements of Pitris and Devas and Atithis. They are entitled to eat the first portions of havya and kavya. By the very food they eat, they rescue the three worlds from great fear. They are the island of refuge for all worlds. They are the eyes of all blessed with true sight. The wealth they possess consists of all the branches of knowledge known by the name of siksha, and all the Srutis. Imbued with great skill, they are conversant with the most subtle relations of things.

They are well-acquainted with the end of all things, and their thoughts are always employed upon Atmavigyana, the science of the Soul. They are gifted with the knowledge of the beginning, the middle and the end of all things, and they are the ones in whom doubts no longer exist from being certain of their knowledge. They are fully aware of the distinctions between what is superior and what is inferior. They it is who attain to the highest end.

Freed from all attachments, cleansed of all sins, transcending all the pairs of opposites, they are disconnected from all worldly things. Deserving of every honour, they are always held in great esteem by men of knowledge and high souls. They cast equal eyes on sandalwood paste and dirt, on what is food and what is not food. They see with an equal eye their brown vestments of coarse cloth and fabrics of silk and animal skins. They would live for many days together without eating, and dry up their limbs by such abstention from all sustenance. They devote themselves earnestly to the study of the Vedas, restraining their senses. They would make gods of those that are not gods, and not gods of those that are gods.

Enraged, they can create other worlds and other regents of the worlds than those that exist. Through the course of those high-souled ones, the ocean became so saline as to be undrinkable. The fire of their wrath yet burns in the forest of Dandaka, unquenched by Time. They are the gods of the gods, and the cause of all causes. They are the authority of all authorities. What man of intelligence and wisdom is there that would seek to humiliate them? Amongst them the young and the old all deserve honour. They honour one another not by distinctions of age but by those of tapa and gyana.

Even the Brahmana who is destitute of knowledge is a god and a high instrument for purifying others. He amongst them, then, that is possessed of knowledge is a much higher god and like the full and swollen ocean. Learned or unlearned, the Brahmana is always a high deity.

Sanctified or unsanctified with mantras, fire is ever a great deity. A blazing fire, even when it burns on a crematorium, is not regarded as tainted because of the character of the place where it burns. Clarified butter looks beautiful whether kept on the sacrificial altar or in a chamber. So, even if a Brahmana be always engaged in evil deeds, he is still to be regarded as deserving of honour. Indeed, know that the Brahmana is always a high deity.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell us, O king, what is that reward attached to the worship of Brahmanas, seeing which you do worship them, O you of most superior intelligence. Indeed, what is that success, flowing from their worship, guided by which you worship them?'

Bhishma says, 'In this regard is told this itihasa of a conversation between Pavana and Arjuna, O Bhaarata. Endowed with a thousand arms and great beauty, the mighty Kartavirya, in days of yore, became the Lord of all the world. He had his capital in the city of Mahishmati. Of unbaffled prowess, that Lord of the Haihaya vamsa of Kshatriyas held sway over all the earth with her girdle of seas, together with all her islands and all her precious mines of gold and gemstones. Keeping before him the dharma of the Kshatriya varna, as also humility and Vedic knowledge, the king made large gifts of wealth to Rishi Dattatreya. Indeed, the son of Kritavirya thus adored the great ascetic who, becoming pleased with him, asked him to solicit three boons.

The king said to him, "Let me become endowed with a thousand arms when I am in the midst of my troops. While, however, I remain at home let me have, as usual, only two arms. Indeed, let adversaries in battle see me possessed of a thousand arms. Let me also keep high vratas and conquer the whole world with my prowess. Having acquired the earth righteously, let me rule her with vigilance. There is a fourth boon which, O Dvijottama, I solicit you to grant and, O faultless one, because you are kindly disposed towards me, you must do so. Dependent as I am on you, whenever I may happen to go astray, let the righteous come forth to instruct and set me on the right path again."

The Brahmana Dattatreya replied to the king, "Tathaastu, so be it.'

Even thus did that king of splendour acquire those four boons. Riding then on his chariot whose lustre resembled that of fire or the sun, the monarch, blinded by his own great prowess, said, "Who, indeed, is there that can be regarded as my equal in patience and energy, in fame and heroism, in prowess and strength?"

When he uttered these words, an asariri, an invisible voice in the sky said, "Ignorant wretch, do you not know that the Brahmana is superior to the Kshatriya? The Kshatriya rules all creatures only because he is helped by the Brahmana!"

Kartaviryarjuna said, "When gratified, I am able to create all creatures. When angry, I am able to destroy all. In thought, word and deed, I am the first, the foremost. The Brahmana is certainly not above me. The first argument here is that the Brahmana is superior to the Kshatriya; this is countered by the other that the Kshatriya is superior. You have said, O invisible being, that the two are united. A distinction, however, is observable in this.

It is seen that Brahmanas take refuge with Kshatriyas. The Kshatriyas never seek the protection of Brahmanas. Indeed, throughout the earth, the Brahmanas accept such refuge under the pretence of teaching the Vedas, and draw their sustenance from the Kshatriyas. The duty of protecting all creatures is vested in the Kshatriyas. It is from the Kshatriyas that the Brahmanas derive their sustenance. How then can the Brahmana be superior to the Kshatriyas?

From today, I will bring your Brahmanas, who are superior to all creatures but who have mendicancy for their occupation and who are so conceited, under my sway. What the virgin Gayatri has said from the sky is not true. Robed in skins, the Brahmanas move about in freedom. I will bring those wights under my rule. God or man, there is none in the three worlds who can cast me down from the sovereignty I enjoy. And so am I certainly superior to the Brahmanas. This world that is now regarded as having Brahmanas for its foremost denizens shall soon have Kshatriyas for its highest beings. There is none that can bear my might in battle!"

Hearing these coarse and arrogant words of Arjuna, the sky-ranging goddess became agitated. Then Vayu, the god of wind, addressed the king from the sky, “Cast off this sinful hubris. Bow to the Brahmanas. By injuring them you will bring disaster down on your kingdom. The Brahmanas will either slay you, king though you are, or, invested with the great might that they have, they will drive you out of your kingdom, depriving you of your power and glory.”

Hearing this, the king addressed the speaker, saying, “And who, indeed, are you?”

The wind answered, “I am the god of wind and the messenger of the Devas. I say to you what is for your benefit.”

Arjuna said, “Oh, I see that you have today shown your devotion and attachment to the Brahmanas. Tell me now what kind of earthly creature is the Brahmana? Tell me, does a superior Brahmana resemble the wind in any way? Or is he like water, or fire, or the sun, or the firmament?”

"The god of wind said, "Hear, O deluded man, what the attributes are that belong to Brahmanas, all of whom are endowed with high souls. The Brahmana is superior to all those that, O king, you have named. In days of yore, the earth, indulging a spirit of rivalry with the king of the Angas, forsook her character as Bhumi. The Brahmana Kasyapa overtook her with calamity by paralysing her. The Brahmanas are always unconquerable, O king, in Swarga as also on Bhumi. In ancient days, the great Rishi Angiras, through his tejas, drained all the waters in the world, seas, rivers and the rest. The Mahatman Rishi, having quaffed all the waters as if they were milk, still did not feel that his thirst was slaked. He once more caused the earth to be filled with water by raising a mighty wave. On another occasion, when Angiras became enraged with me, I fled, leaving the world, and dwelt for a long time concealed in the agnihotra of the Brahmanas through fear of that Rishi.

The illustrious Purandara, having coveted the body of Ahalya, was cursed by Gautama, yet, for the sake of dharma and artha, the Rishi did not kill the king of the Devas. The ocean, O king, which was full in the first days of the world of crystalline water, like amrita, was cursed by the Brahmanas and became saline.

Even Agni, who is of the complexion of gold, and who blazes with effulgence when without smoke, and whose flames uniting together burn upwards, was cursed by the angry Angiras, and was instantly divested of all these attributes. Behold, the sixty thousand sons of Sagara, who came here to adore the ocean, were all made ashes by the Brahmana Kapila of golden complexion.

You are not equal to the Brahmanas. Do you, O king, seek your own good. The Kshatriya of even great power bows to Brahmana children that are still in their mothers' wombs. The vast kingdom of the Dandakas was destroyed by a Brahmana. The mighty Kshatriya Talajangala was destroyed by a single Brahmana, Aurva. You, too, have acquired a great kingdom, great might, religious merit, and learning, which are all difficult of attainment, only through the grace of Dattatreya. Why do you, O Arjuna, worship Agni every day who is a Brahmana? He is the bearer of sacrificial libations from every part of the universe. Are you ignorant of this? Why, indeed, do you suffer yourself to be stupefied by folly when you well know that a superior Brahmana is the protector of all creatures in the world and is, indeed, the Creator of the living world?

The Lord of all creatures, Brahma, unmanifest, and of unfading glory, who created this boundless universe with its mobile and immobile creatures is a Brahmana. Some there are, devoid of wisdom, who say that Brahma was born of an Egg. From the original Egg, when it burst forth, mountains and the points of the compass and the waters and the earth and the heavens all sprang forth into existence. This beginning of creation was not seen by anyone. How then can Brahma be said to have been born from the original Egg, especially when he is declared as being Aja, Un-born? It is said that vast uncreated space is the primeval Egg. It was from this uncreated Akasa, or Supreme Brahman, that the Grandsire Brahma was born.

If you ask, 'Whereon would the Grandsire, after his birth from uncreated space, rest, for there was then nothing else?' the answer may be given thus: 'There is an existent Being of the name of Chitta, Consciousness. That mighty Being is infused with great tejas. There is no Egg. Brahma, however, exists. He is the Creator of the universe and is its king."

Thus spoken to by Vayu the wind, Kartaviryarjuna remained silent.'

Vayu Deva said, 'Once upon a time, O king, a ruler of the name of Anga, desired to give away the whole earth as sacrificial dakshina to the Brahmanas. At this, the earth became filled with anxiety. "I am the daughter of Brahma. I support all creatures. Having obtained me, alas, why does this greatest of kings wish to give me away to the Brahmanas? Abandoning my character as soil, I will repair to the presence of my sire. Let this king with all his kingdom meet with destruction."

Arrived at this conclusion, she left for Brahmaloka. Seeing Bhumi Devi on the point of leaving, Rishi Kasyapa subtly entered into the visible embodiment of the goddess, after casting off his own body through yoga. The earth thus infused by the spirit of Kasyapa, grew in prosperity and became unprecedentedly fecund and replete with all kinds of plants and herbs and vegetation. Indeed, O king, for the time that Kasyapa possessed the earth, dharma prevailed everywhere and all fears ceased. The earth remained possessed by the spirit of Kasyapa for thirty thousand celestial years, and fully alive to all that it did while it was occupied by the spirit of Brahma's daughter. At the end of this time, Bhumi Devi returned from Brahmaloka and arriving here, bowed to Kasyapa, and from that time she became the daughter of that Rishi. Kasyapa is a Brahmana. Even this was the feat, O king, that a Brahmana performed. Tell me the name of the Kshatriya who can be held to be superior to Kasyapa!"

Hearing these words, King Arjuna remained silent. To him the god of wind once more said, "Hear now, O king, the story of Utathya who was born into the race of Angiras. The daughter of Soma, named Bhadra, was regarded as unrivalled in beauty. Her sire Soma thought Utathya to be the fittest of husbands for her. The famed and most blessed maiden of faultless limbs, observing diverse vows, underwent the severest tapasya from the desire of acquiring Utathya for her lord. After a while, Soma's father Atri invited Utathya to his home and bestowed Bhadra upon him. Utathya, who was used to giving away sacrificial gifts in copious measure, duly received the girl for his wife.

Now, it so happened that the handsome Varuna had, for a long time, coveted the girl for himself. Coming to the forest where Utathya dwelt, Varuna abducted Bhadra when she had entered the Yamuna for a bath. The Lord of the waters took her to his own abode. That mansion was of a wonderful aspect. It was adorned with six hundred thousand crystalline lakes surrounding it. There is no mansion that can be regarded more beautiful than that home of Varuna. It was embellished with many palaces and by the presence of diverse tribes of Apsaras and of diverse unequalled objects of enjoyment. There, within that palace, the Lord of waters, O king, sported with Bhadra.

Soon enough, the ravishment of his wife was reported to Utathya. Having heard all the facts from Narada, Utathya addressed the celestial Rishi, saying, "Go, O Narada, to Varuna and speak to him with due severity. Ask him why he has abducted my wife, and, indeed, tell him in my name that he should return her to me. You may say to him further, 'You are a protector of the worlds, O Varuna, a Lokapala, and not a despoiler or destroyer. Why have you abducted Utathya's wife bestowed upon him by Soma?'"

Narada went to Varuna and said, "'Do you set the wife of Utathya free. Indeed, why have you abducted her?"

Varuna replied, "This timid girl is exceedingly dear to me. Why, I dare not let her go!"

With this reply, Narada came back to Utathya and cheerlessly said, "O Maharishi, Varuna drove me out of his house, indeed, seizing me by the throat. He is unwilling to restore your wife to you. Do now as you please."

Hearing Narada, Angiras became inflamed with wrath. Possessed with great tapodhana, he stilled all the waters of Varuna and with his tapasya shakti drained them at a swallow. When all his waters were thus quaffed, the Lord of that element became cheerless and downcast, as also all his friends and kinsfolk. For all that, he still did not give up Utathya's wife.

Then Utathya, Dvijottama, filled with wrath, commanded the earth, "O amiable one, do you show land where there are now the six hundred thousand lakes of Varuna!"

The ocean was forced to abandon those lakes and the dry land which appeared in their stead was arid and sterile.

To the rivers that flowed through that region, Utathya said, "O Saraswati, do you become invisible here. Indeed, O gentle Devi, leaving this realm, go you to the desert! Auspicious goddess, without your presence let this whole place cease to become sacred.'

When that entire region, in which the Lord of waters dwelt, fell dry, Varuna went to Angiras, taking with him Utathya's Bhadra, and made her over to him. Getting back his wife, Utathya was cheerful again. Then, O Lord of the Haihaya vamsa, that great Brahmana released both the universe and the Lord of waters from the distress into which he had plunged them.

When he had his wife back, the Mahatejasvin Rishi Utathya said to Varuna, "I have recovered my wife, O Lord of waters, with the help of my tapasya and after inflicting such distress on you as made you cry aloud in anguish."

Saying this, he went home, with that wife of his. Even such, O king, was Utathya, that greatest of Brahmanas. Shall I continue? Will you yet persist in your arrogant opinion? Is there any Kshatriya that is superior to Utathya?"' Bhishma says, 'Thus addressed by Vayu, King Arjuna remained silent. The God of Wind spoke again to him, "Listen now, O king, to the story of the greatness of the Brahmana Agastya. Once upon a time, the Devas were vanquished by the Asuras at which they fell into despair. The sacrifices of the Devas were all seized, and the Swadha of the Pitris was also misappropriated. Indeed, O king of the Haihayas, all the religious karmas and kriyas of men were also obstructed and suspended by the Danavas.

Divested of their prosperity, the Devas wandered over the earth even like beggars. One day, in course of their wandering, they met Agastya Mahavrata, that Brahmana invested with great energy and splendour like that of the sun. Saluting him duly, the Devas made the customary enquiries after his well-being. They then said these words to that Mahatman, "We have been defeated by the Danavas in battle and have fallen off from affluence and prosperity. Do you, O greatest of Rishis, rescue us from this predicament of great fear."

When informed of the plight to which the deities had been reduced, Agastya grew incensed, and he blazed forth like the all-consuming fire of the Pralaya. The blazing rays of heat and light that sprang forth from the Rishi scathed the Danavas. Thousands of them began to fall smoking from the sky. Scalded by the tejas of Agastya, abandoning both heaven and earth, the Danavas fled towards the south.

At that time the Danava King Bali was performing a horse sacrifice, an Aswamedha yagna in the Patalas. Those great Asuras who were with him in those realms of nether, who dwelt in the bowels of the earth, were not touched by the searing wrath of Agastya. Upon the vanquishment and destruction of their foes, the Devas regained their own regions, and their fears were entirely dispelled. Encouraged by what he accomplished for them, they then asked the Rishi to consume the Asuras who had taken refuge in the Patalas.

Agastya replied to them, "I can surely consume the Asuras that dwell below the earth, but if I do this, my tapasya will suffer great diminution. And for that, I will not exert my power in that direction."

Even thus, O king, did the illustrious Agastya Muni burn the mighty Danavas through his own fierce tejas. Even thus did Suddhatma Agastya, of the pure soul, come to the rescue of the desperate Devas with his tapasya shakti. Sinless one, even so was the awesome Agastya! Shall I continue? Or, will you now say anything in reply? Is there any Kshatriya who is greater than Agastya?"

Thus addressed, King Arjuna remained silent.

Vayu Deva now said, "'Listen, O king, to one of the great feats of the lustrous Vasishta. Once upon a time, the Devas were engaged in performing a sacrifice on the shores of the Vaikhanasa lake. Knowing his might, the sacrificing gods thought of Vasishta and made him their priest in imagination. Meanwhile, seeing the Devas reduced and emaciated because of the diksha they were undergoing, a race of Danavas, called the Khalins, of stature as gigantic as mountains, sought to kill them. Those amongst the Danavas that were either maimed, dismembered or even slain in the battle plunged into the waters of the Manasa lake and, because of the boon they had from Brahma, they were restored to wholeness, vigour and life.

Plucking off jagged mountain peaks, enormous maces and mighty trees, they agitated the waters of the lake, making them rise up to a height of a hundred yojanas. They then ran against the Devas, and they were ten thousand demons. Attacked by the Danavas, the gods sought the protection of their King Vasava. Indra, however, was also soon dreadfully afflicted by the Danavas.

In his distress, Sakra sought the protection of Vasishta. At this, the holy Rishi Vasishta reassured the Devas, dispelling their fears. The sage did this because he saw how disconsolate the gods had become; he did this from compassion for them. Vasishta put forth his energy and, without exertion, burnt up those Danavas called Khalins.

Possessed of untold tapodhana, the Rishi brought the Ganga, who had flowed to Kailasa, to that place. Indeed, Ganga appeared there, springing up through the waters of the Manasa lake. The lake was infused by that holiest river, and the Ganga of heaven flowed from there as the Sarayu. The place where those Danavas fell came to be called after them. Even thus were the gods of swarga, with Indra at their head, rescued from great distress by Vasishta. It was thus that those Danavas, who had received boons from Brahma, were slain by that Mahatman Rishi.

Sinless one, I have told you of the feat which Vasishta accomplished. Shall I go on? Or, will you say anything now? Was there ever a Kshatriya who could be said to equal, let alone surpass the Brahmana Vasishta?"'

CANTO 156

"Bhishma says, 'Still, Arjuna remained silent. The wind god addressed him again, saying, "Hear me, O foremost of the Haihayas, as I narrate to you the achievement of the Mahatman Atri. Once upon a time, as the Devas and Danavas were fighting each other in the dark, Rahu pierced both Surya and Soma with his arrows. The Devas, overwhelmed by darkness, began to fall before the mighty Danavas, O greatest of kings. Repeatedly struck by the Asuras, the denizens of heaven began to lose their strength. They then saw the learned Brahmana Atri, that tapodhana, engaged in the observance of austerities.

To that Rishi who had conquered all his senses and in whom wrath had been extinguished they said "Behold, Rishi, these two, Soma and Surya, who have both been pierced by the Asuras with their arrows. In consequence, darkness has overtaken us, and we are being struck down by the enemy. We do not see the end of our troubles. Do you, O Lord of great power, rescue us from this fear."

The Rishi said, "How shall I save you?"

They answered, saying, "Do you yourself become Chandramas. Do you also become the sun, and do you begin to slay these brigands."

Thus solicited by them, Atri assumed the form of the darkness-destroying Soma. Indeed, because of his agreeable disposition, he began to look as handsome and delightful as Soma himself. Beholding that the real Soma and the real Surya had become darkened by the shafts of the foe, Atri, assuming the forms of those luminaries through his tapasya shakti, shone forth in splendour over the field of battle. Verily, Atri made the universe blaze forth in light, dispelling all its darkness. By putting forth his might, he also vanquished the vast multitudes of those enemies of the Devas. Seeing those great Asuras burnt by Atri, the Devas also, protected by Atri's tejas, began to despatch them ever more swiftly.

Putting forth his prowess and mastering all his energy, it was thus that Atri illumined the god of day, rescued the Devas, and slew the Asuras. Even this was the feat that Dvija, helped by his sacred fire, Atri, that silent reciter of mantras, he who wore deer-skins. Consider, O Rajarishi, what that Rishi who subsisted upon only fruits accomplished.

I have narrated to you, in detail, the feat of the Mahatman Atri. Shall I go on? Or will you say anything? Is there any Kshatriya that is superior to this Mahamuni?"

Yet, Kartaviryarjuna remained silent. Vayu spoke again to him, "Hear, O king, the feat achieved by the Maharishi Chyavana in days of old. Having given his word to the twin Aswins, Chyavana said to Indra, 'Do you make the Aswins drinkers of Soma with all the other Devas!'

Indra said, 'The Aswins have been cast out by us. How, then, can they be admitted into the sacrificial circle for drinking Soma with the others? They are not numbered among the Devas. Do not, therefore, tell us to do this. O Mahavrata, we do not wish to drink Soma in the company of the Aswins. Whatever other behest you may have for us, O learned Brahmana, we are ready to accomplish.'

Chyavana said, 'The Aswins shall drink Soma with all of you. Both of them are Devas, O Indra, for they are the sons of Surya. Let the gods do what I have said. By doing what I ask, the Devas will reap great rewards. By doing otherwise, evil will overtake them.'

Indra said, 'I shall not, O foremost of Dvijas, drink Soma with the Aswins! Let others drink with them as they please. But for myself, I dare not do it.'

Chyavana said, 'If, O slayer of Bala, you will not obey me gladly, you shall, this very day, drink Soma with them in a sacrifice, for I will compel you!'"

Vayu said, "Then, taking the Aswins with him, Chyavana began a great yagna for their benefit. Chyavana dazed all the gods with his mantras. Seeing what Chyavana did, Indra became incensed. Taking up a mountain in his hands he ran at that Rishi. The Deva king also wielded the vajra. As Indra rushed at him, the illustrious Chyavana, tapodhana, cast an angry glance at Indra. Throwing a little water at him, he paralysed the king of the Devas with his thunderbolt and mountain.

From the fire of the yagna he had begun, the Rishi created a terrible Asura made of the libations he had poured on the sacred fire. That demon was called Mada, of the gaping mouth. Indeed, formidable and dreadful was the Asura that the Mahamuni created with his mantras. There were a thousand teeth in his mouth, which extended a hundred yojanas. Of terrible mien, these fangs were two hundred yojanas long. One of his cheeks rested on the earth and the other touched the sky. Indeed, all the gods with Vasava seemed to stand at the root of that great Asura's tongue, even as schools of fish when they enter into the wide open mouth of a leviathan whale, a timmingala.

While within the mouth of Mada, the Devas held a quick consultation and then addressed Indra, 'Do you quickly bend your head in reverence to this Brahmana. Without scruple or hesitation, we shall drink Soma with the Aswins in our company.'

Then, bowing his head low to Chyavana, the humbled Indra obeyed his command. Even thus did Chyavana make the Aswins drinkers of Soma with the other gods. Calling back Mada, the Rishi then assigned him the duties he was to perform. That wild Mada was commanded to dwell in dice, in hunting, in drinking and in women. Hence, O king, those men that betake themselves to these, meet with destruction, and one should always keep these sins at a great distance. Thus, O king, have I narrated to you the feat achieved by Chyavana. Shall I go on? Or, will you say anything in reply? Is there any Kshatriya that is higher than the Brahmana Chyavana?"'

CANTO 157

Bhishma says, 'Hearing these words of the wind god, Arjuna still remained silent. At this, Vayu said to him, "When the denizens of swarga, with Indra at their head, found themselves in the mouth of the Asura Mada, at that time Chyavana took the earth away from them. Deprived previously of swarga and now shorn of Bhumi also, the gods were downcast. Indeed, afflicted with grief, the Devas threw themselves unreservedly at the Pitamaha Brahma's mercy and sought his protection."

The Devas said, 'O you that are adored by all creatures of the universe, Chyavana has taken the earth from us, while we have been deprived of swarga by the Kapas, O puissant one.'

Brahma said, 'Swargavasis, do you, with Indra at your head, seek the protection of the Brahmanas. By gratifying them you will succeed in regaining both the worlds as before.'

The Devas went to the Brahmanas and became suppliants for their protection. The Brahmanas asked them, 'Whom shall we subdue?'

The Devas said to them, 'Do you subdue the Kapas.'

The Brahmanas then said, 'Bringing them down first onto the earth, we shall swiftly vanquish them.'

The Brahmanas commenced a rite whose object was the destruction of the Kapas. As soon the Kapas heard of this, they immediately despatched a messenger of theirs, Dhanin, to those Brahmanas. Dhanin came to them as they sat upon the earth, and delivered the message of the Kapas. 'The Kapas are even equal to you all! They are not inferior to any of you. Hence, what will be the effect of these rites that you seem bent upon? All of them are knowers of the Vedas and possessed of wisdom. All of them are mindful of sacrifices. All of them have Truth for their vow, and for these reasons all of them are regarded as equal to great Rishis. The goddess of prosperity sports among them, and they, in their turn, support her with worship. They never indulge in fruitless congress with their wives, and they never eat the flesh of animals that have not been killed in sacrifices. They pour libations on the sacrificial fire every day and are obedient to the behests of their preceptors and elders.

All of them have their souls under perfect control, and never eat any food without dividing it duly among their children. They always travel together in chariots and other conveyances without any of them riding his own ratha while others journey on foot. They never indulge in sexual congress with their wives when the women are in their periods. They all conduct themselves in such a way as to attain to regions of felicity hereafter. Indeed, they are always righteous in their deeds.

When women quick with child or old men have not eaten, they never eat themselves. They never indulge in play or sport of any kind in the forenoon. They never sleep during the day. When the Kapas have these and many other virtues and accomplishments, why, indeed, would you seek to quell them? You should abstain from the endeavour. Verily, by this abstention, you will achieve your own good.'

The Brahmanas said, 'Oh, we shall subdue the Kapas! In this matter, we are with the Devas, and so the Kapas deserve killing. As regards Dhanin, he should return whence he came.'

Returning to the Kapas, Dhanin said to them, 'The Brahmanas are not disposed to do you any good.'

Hearing this, all the Kapas took up their weapons and went towards the Brahmanas. Seeing the Kapas advancing against them with the standards of their chariots upraised, the Brahmanas forthwith created blazing fires to destroy them. Those eternal fires, kindled with the help of Vedic mantras, devoured the Kapas, and then began to shine in the firmament like so many golden clouds. Having assembled together for battle, the Devas slew many of the Danavas. They did not know at the time that it was the Brahmanas who had effected their destruction. Then Narada of great tejas came there and informed the gods how their enemies, the Kapas, had really been slain by the Brahmanas of measureless power. Hearing what Narada said, the Swargavasis were gratified. They also applauded those twice-born Dvija allies of theirs, those Brahmanas of great fame.

Now the energy and prowess of the Devas began to increase and, worshipped in all the worlds, they also acquired the boon of immortality!"

When Vayu the wind had said this, King Arjuna worshipped him duly and now spoke these words to him. Hear, O mighty-armed king, what Kartaviryarjuna said.

Arjuna said, "O mighty Vayu, always and by all means do I live for the Brahmanas. Devoted to them, I worship them always. Through the grace of Dattatreya have I obtained this power of mine. Through his grace have I been able to accomplish great feats in the world and achieve high merit. Oh, I have, with attention, heard of the achievements, O Vayu, of the Brahmanas with all their fascinating details as recited by you so truly."

The wind said, "Do you protect and cherish the Brahmanas, in the exercise of your Kshatriya svadharma, which is yours by birth. Do you protect them even as you protect your own senses. There is danger to you from the race of Bhrigu. That, however, will come on a distant day."'

"Yudhishtira says, 'O Kshatriya, you always worship Brahmanas of praiseworthy vows. What, however, is that fruit seeking which you worship them, Pitamaha? O Mahavrata, with what prosperity attaching to the worship of the Brahmanas in your sight do you worship them? Tell me all this, O Mahabaho.'

Bhishma says, 'Here is Kesava Mahabuddhi. He will tell you everything. Of high vows and endowed with the greatest grace and fortune, even he will tell you what the felicity is that attaches to the worship of Brahmanas. My strength, ears, speech, mind, eyes and that clear understanding of mine are all clouded and weak today. I think, the time is not distant when I will cast off my body. The sun seems to me to go very slowly.

I have told you of the high dharmas, O king, which are mentioned in the Puranas as observed by Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras. Do you now, O son of Pritha, learn from Krishna what little remains to be learnt on that matter. I know Krishna truly. I know who he is and what his ancient might is. O king of the Kurus, Kesava is of immeasurable soul. Whenever doubts arise and faith is lost, it is he who upholds dharma.

It is Krishna who created Bhumi, Akasa and Swarga. Indeed, the earth has sprung from Krishna's body. Of terrible prowess and existing from before the beginning of time, it is Krishna who became the mighty boar and raised the submerged earth. It is he who created all the points of the horizon, together with all the mountains. Below him are the welkin, heaven, the four cardinal points, and the four lesser directions. It is from him that all creation has flowed. It is he who has created this ancient universe.

From his navel appeared a lotus. Within that lotus sprang Brahma, himself of immeasurable energy. It was Brahma, O son of Pritha, who rent that darkness which existed, exceeding the very ocean in depth and extent. In the Krita yuga, O Pandava, Krishna existed in the world in the form of dharma. In the Treta yuga, he existed in the form of gyana. In the Dwapara yuga, he existed in the form of Shakti. In the Kali age he came to the earth in the form of adharma.

It is he who in days of yore slew the Daityas. It is he who is the Ancient God. He who ruled the Asuras as their Emperor Mahabali. He is the Creator of all beings. He is also the future of all created beings. He is also the protector of this universe fraught with the seed of destruction. When the cause of dharma languishes, this Krishna incarnates either into the race of the gods or among men. Founded in dharma, this Krishna of the immaculate soul protects both the higher and the lower worlds from darkness. Sparing those that deserve to be spared, Krishna sets himself to the slaughter of the Asura, O Kaunteya.

It is he who is all karma, holy and unholy, and he who is the Cause of causes. Krishna is the act done, the act to be done, and the act that is being done. Know that this Illustrious One is Rahu and Soma and Sakra. He is Viswakarman. It is he that is the Viswarupa, of Universal Form. He is the Destroyer and he is the Creator of the universe. He is the wielder of the Sula; he is of human form; and he is of terrible form. All creatures sing his praises, for he is known by his deeds. Hundreds of Gandharvas and Apsaras and Devas always travel with him. The very Rakshasas hymn his praise. He is the Enhancer of Wealth; he is the one victorious Being in the universe. In sacrifices, eloquent men hymn his praises. The singers of Samans praise him by reciting the Rathantaras. The Brahmanas praise him with Vedic mantras. It is to him that the sacrificial priests pour their libations.

The Devas with Indra at their head hymned his praise when he lifted up the Govardhana mountain to protect the cowherds of Vrindavana against the wrathful torrents of rain which Indra lashed down on them. He is, O Bhaarata, the one Blessing to all creatures. He, O Bhaarata, having entered the old Brahma cave, beheld from that place the original sheath of the world at the beginning of Time. Agitating all the Danavas and the Asuras, this Krishna of foremost feats rescued the earth. It is to him that people dedicate diverse kinds of food. It is to him that warriors dedicate all their mounts and chariots, of every kind, at the time of war. He is eternal, and it is under this Illustrious One that the sky, earth, heaven, all things, exist and endure.

He it is who caused the seed of the gods Mitra and Varuna to fall into a jar, whence sprang Rishi Vasishta. It is Krishna who is Vayu; he is the Aswins; it is he who is that first of gods, Surya of a thousand rays. It is by him that the Asuras have been quelled. It is he who covered the three worlds with three steps. He is the soul of the Devas, the Manavas and the Pitris. He is the sacrifice performed by those that know the rituals of sacrifices. He it is who rises every day in the firmament as the sun and divides Time into day and night, and courses for half the year northward and for half the year south. Innumerable rays of light emanate from him up and down and transversely and illumine the earth.

Brahmanas who know the Vedas worship him. Taking a portion of his rays, the sun shines in the firmament. Month after month, the sacrificer ordains him as a sacrifice. Dvijas conversant with the Vedas sing his praises in sacrifices of all kinds. He it is that constitutes the wheel of the year, having three naves and seven steeds yoked to it. In this way he supports the triple mansion of the seasons. Endowed with great energy, pervading all things, the foremost of all creatures, it is Krishna alone who upholds all the worlds.

He is the sun, the dispeller of all darkness. He is the Creator of all. Do you, O Kshatriya, approach that Krishna! Once, the high-souled and powerful Krishna dwelt, for a while, in the form of Agni in the forest of Khandava in some dry grass. Soon was he gratified for he consumed all the medicinal herbs in that forest. He can go anywhere at will, and it was Krishna who, having vanquished the Rakshasas and Uragas, poured them as libations upon the sacred fire.

It is Krishna who gave Arjuna a number of white steeds; he is the creator of all horses. This world, this samsara, this human life is his chariot. He it is that yokes that chariot to set it in motion. That ratha has three wheels—the three gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas. It has three kinds of motion; it goes upward, or downward or transversely, implying superior, inferior and intermediate births as fetched by karma. It has four horses yoked to it—time, destiny, the will of the gods, and one's own will. It has three naves—white, black and mixed, implying good, evil and mixed karma.

It is this Krishna who is the refuge of the Panchamahabhutas, the five original elements with the sky among them. It is he who created bhumi and swarga and the space between. Indeed, it is this Krishna of immeasurable and blazing tejas who created the forests and the mountains. It is this Krishna who, wanting to punish Sakra who was about to hurl his thunder at him, crossed the rivers once and paralysed Indra. He is himself the one great Indra whom the Brahmanas worship in sacrifices with the help of a thousand ancient Riks. It was this Krishna, O king, who alone was able to keep the choleric Rishi Durvasa of great temper and powers as a happy guest in his home for a long time.

He is said to be the one most antique Rishi. He is the Creator of the universe. Indeed, he creates everything from his own nature. Superior to all the Devas, it is he who teaches all the gods. He scrupulously observes all ancient niyamas and vidhis.

Know, O king, that this Krishna, who is called Vishwaksena, is the fruit of all karma that relates to kama, of all karma that is founded on the Vedas, and of all karma that pertains to the world. He is the white rays of light that are seen in all the worlds. He is the three worlds. He is the three regents of all the worlds. He is the three sacrificial fires. He is the three Vyahritis; indeed, this son of Devaki is all the gods together. He is the year; he is the seasons; he is the fortnights; he is the day and the night; he is those divisions of time which are called Kaalas, and Kashthas, and Matras, and Muhurtas, and Lavas, and Kshanas. Know that this Vishwaksena is all these.

The moon and the sun, the planets, the constellations and the stars, all the Parva days, including the day of the full moon, the conjunctions of the constellations and the seasons, have, O son of Pritha, flowed from this Krishna who is Vishwaksena. The Rudras, the Adityas, the Vasus, the Aswins, the Sadhyas, the Viswedevas, the diverse Maruts, Prajapati himself, Aditi the mother of the Devas and the Saptarishis have all sprung from Krishna.

Transforming himself into the wind, he scatters the universe. Of universal form, he becomes fire that burns all things. Changing himself into water, he drenches and submerges all and, assuming the form of Brahma, he creates all the diverse species of animate and inanimate existences. He is himself the Veda, yet he learns all the Vedas. He is himself all the niyamas, yet he observes all the laws that have been laid down in matters of dharma and the Vedas; he is that force or power which rules the world. Indeed, know, O Yudhishtira, that this Kesava is truly all the mobile and immobile universe, chala and achala. He is of the form of the most resplendent light. Of universal form, this Krishna is displayed in that blinding refulgence. The original cause of the soul of all creatures, at first he created the waters. After that he created this universe.

Know that this Krishna is Vishnu. Know that he is the soul of the universe. Know that he is all the seasons; he is these diverse wonderful vegetations of nature which we see; he is the clouds that pour down rain and the lightning that flashes in the sky. He is the elephant Airavata. Indeed, I say again to you, he is all the immobile and mobile universe. The abode of the universe and transcending all attributes, this Krishna is Vasudeva. When he becomes jiva he is called Sankarshana. Next, he transforms himself into Pradyumna and then into Aniruddha. In this way, the Mahatman Krishna, who has himself for his origin divides and displays himself in fourfold form.

Wanting to create this universe, which consists of the five primal elements, he sets himself to his task, and causes it to perpetuate in the five forms of animate existence consisting of Devas and Asuras and Manavas and Mrigas and Garudas.

He it is that then creates the earth and the wind, the sky, light, and also water, O son of Pritha! Having created this universe, chala and achala, distributed into four orders of being, he then created the earth with her fivefold seed. He then created the firmament to pour down copious rain on the earth. Have no doubt, O king, it is this Krishna who has created this universe. His origin is in his own self; it is he who causes all things to exist through his own power. He it is that has created the Devas, the Asuras and Manavas, Bhumi, the Rishis the Pitris, and all creatures.

From his desire to create, the Lord of all creatures created the whole universe of life. Know that good and evil, and chala and achala, have all flowed from this One who is Vishwaksena. Whatever exists, and whatever will come into existence, all is Kesava. This Krishna is also the death that overtakes all creatures when their end comes. He is eternal and it is he who upholds the cause of dharma. Whatever existed in the past, and whatever we do not know, verily, all that also is this Vishwaksena. Whatever is noble and meritorious in the universe, indeed, whatever of good and of evil exists, all that is Kesava the Inconceivable.

Hence, it is absurd to think of anything that is superior to Kesava. Even such is this Kesava. More than this, he is Narayana, the highest of the high, immutable and unfading. He is the eternal and immutable cause of the entire universe, with its beginning, middle and end, as also of all creatures whose birth follows their wish.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Do you tell us, Madhusudana, what the prosperity is that attaches to the worship of the Brahmanas. You know this subject as well as, verily, our Grandsire knows you.'

Krishna says, 'Listen with sraddha to me, king of the Bharata vamsa, and I will tell you what the merits of the Brahmanas are, in truth, Kurusattama. Once on a time, while I sat in Dwaravati, Kurunandana, my son Pradyumna, who was enraged at some Brahmanas, came to me and said, "Madhusudana, what punya attaches to the worship of Brahmanas? Whence is their lordship derived both here and hereafter? O bestower of honours, what rewards are won by constantly worshipping Brahmanas? I beg you, explain this clearly to me, for my mind is disturbed by doubts in this matter."

I answered him as follows, and listen carefully, Yudhishtira, to what I said to him. I said, "Son of Rukmini, listen closely to me and I will tell you what the prosperity is that one may win by worshipping Brahmanas. When one sets oneself to the acquisition of the dharma, artha and kama, or to the achievement of mukti, or to that of fame and prosperity, or to the treatment and cure of disease, or to the worship of the Devas and the Pitris, one should take care to first gratify the Brahmanas. They are each a king, Soma. They are dispensers of happiness and misery. O Rukminiputra, whether in this or in the next world, my son, everything agreeable has its origin in the Brahmanas. I have no doubt about this.

From the worship of Brahmanas flow mighty achievements, and fame and strength. The denizens of all the worlds, and the regents of the universe, are all worshippers of Brahmanas. How then, Pradyumna, can we disregard them, deluded by the idea that we are Lords of the earth?

Mahabaho, do not suffer your wrath to embrace the Brahmanas as its object. In this as also in the next world, Brahmanas are regarded as supreme beings. They have direct knowledge of everything in the universe. If angered, they are capable of reducing everything to ashes. They can create other worlds and other regents of worlds. Why then should those who are possessed of tejas and true gyana not behave with obedience and respect towards them?

Formerly, in my house, my son, dwelt the Brahmana Durvasa whose complexion was both green and tawny. Clad in rags, he had a danda, a staff made from the bilwa tree. His beard was long and he was exceedingly emaciated. He was taller in stature than the tallest man on earth. Wandering over all the worlds—that which belongs to men and those that are for the gods and other superior beings, this was what he sang constantly in sabhas and in public squares—Who is there that would cause the Brahmana Durvasa to dwell in his house, doing the duties of hospitality towards him? He becomes enraged with everyone if he finds even the slightest fault. Hearing this about me, who is there that will give me refuge? Indeed, woe betide him that would give me shelter as a guest lest he does the least thing to annoy me.

When I saw that no one dared give him shelter in their homes, I invited Durvasa and had him live with me. On certain days, he would eat the food sufficient for the needs of thousands of men. On other days, he would eat very little. On some days, he would go out of my home and would not return. He would sometimes laugh without any ostensible reason and sometimes cry as causelessly. At that time, there was nobody on earth that was equal to him in years. One day, entering the quarters assigned to him, he burnt all the beds and their covers and all the well-adorned women that were there to serve him. Doing this, he went out. Of stern and terrible vows, he met me shortly after this and addressing me, said, 'Krishna, I wish to eat payasa without delay!' Having known his mind previously, I had set my servants to prepare every kind of food and drink. Indeed, many excellent foods had been kept ready. As soon as I was asked, I had hot payasa fetched and offered it to the unpredictable Rishi. Having eaten some, he quickly said to me, 'Do you, O Krishna, take some of this payasa and smear all your limbs with it!'

Without any hesitation I did as he said—I smeared the remnant of that payasa over my body and my head. The Rishi saw your lovely mother Rukmini standing nearby. Laughing the while, he smeared her body also with that payasa. Durvasa then had your mother, whose body was smeared over with the payasa, yoked to a carriage. Climbing onto that carriage he set out from my palace.

Imbued with great intelligence that Brahmana blazed with effulgence like fire, and, in my presence he struck my Rukmini in her youth, as if she were an animal made to haul the carriages of men. I saw all this and I did not feel the slightest grief, anger or malice, or the least wish to harm the Rishi. Indeed, having yoked Rukmini to the carriage, he went out, saying he wanted to go along the highway of the city. Seeing that extraordinary sight, some Dasarhas were filled with wrath, and said amongst one another, 'Who else is there on earth that would draw breath after having yoked Rukmini to a carriage? Verily, let the world be filled with only Brahmanas. Let no other varnas take birth here. The poison of a snake is keen. Keener than a serpent's venom is a Brahmana. There is no physician for a person that has been bitten or burnt by the virulent snake that is a Brahmana.'

As the irresistible Durvasa went along in the carriage, Rukmini tottered on the road and frequently fell down. At this, the Rishi became angry and began to urge Rukmini on, striking her with a whip. At last, filled with a towering passion, the Brahmana leapt down from the carriage, and fled towards the south, running on foot, over pathless ground. Seeing that foremost of Brahmanas go, we followed him, although we were smeared with payasa, exclaiming behind him, 'Be gratified with us, Holy One!'

The mahatejasvin Brahmana saw me and said, 'O Krishna Mahabaho, you have subdued wrath by the strength of your nature. O Mahavrata, I have not found the slightest fault in you. Govinda, I am perfectly gratified with you. Ask me for any boon or wish you have, and see, O son, what my powers are when I am pleased. As long as Devas and men continue to have a love for food, so too, will they love you, Krishna. As long, again, as there is dharma in the several worlds, so long will the fame of your achievements last. Janardana, you shall be beloved of all.

Whatever belongings of yours I have burnt or otherwise destroyed you will have restored, why, better than they were. As long, again, O you of unfading glory, as you wish to live, so long will you have no fear of death coming to you through any part of your body that you have smeared today with payasa. But ah, son, why did you not smear that payasa on the soles of your feet as well?'

Even this was what he said to me on that day on which he was pleased with me. When he had finished speaking, I saw that my body became invested with great beauty and splendour.

To Rukmini also, the Rishi, well-pleased with her, said, 'O most beautiful devi, you shall be the first of your sex in fame, and great glory and achievements will be yours. Decrepitude, disease or a fading complexion will never be yours. Everyone will see you engaged in waiting upon Krishna, possessed as you already are with the natural fragrance which is always present in you. You shall become the best of all the sixteen thousand wives of Krishna. At last, when the time comes for you to leave the world, you will attain to the inseparable companionship of Krishna in the hereafter.'

Having said these words to your mother, Rishi Durvasa, who blazed like fire with tejas, once more addressed me, 'O Kesava, let your understanding be always disposed even thus towards the Brahmana!' And uttering these words, that Brahmana disappeared before my very eyes. After he vanished I took to the observance of the vow of japa, chanting certain mantras silently without being heard by anybody. Verily, from that day I resolved to accomplish whatever commands I should receive from Brahmanas.

Having adopted this vrata, O Pradyumna my son, along with your mother, and with both our hearts filled with joy, I returned to our palace. Entering our home I saw that everything which the Rishi had broken or burnt had reappeared and become new. Seeing this, and all was finer and more beautiful than before, I was filled with wonder. Verily, O son of Rukmini, from that day forth I have always worshipped the Brahmanas in my heart."

'This, king of the Bharata vamsa, is what I said on that occasion regarding the greatness of those Brahmanas who are the foremost of their order. Do you also, O son of Kunti, worship the profoundly blessed Brahmanas every day with gifts of wealth and kine, O mighty one. It was in this way that I acquired the prosperity I enjoy, the prosperity that is born of the grace of Brahmanas. Whatever, again, Bhishma has said of me, O king of the Bharatas, is all true.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Madhusudana, I ask you to expound to me that knowledge which you acquired through the grace of Durvasa. O first among all endowed with intelligence, I wish to know everything about the high blessedness and all the names of that high-souled one truly and in detail.'

Krishna says, 'I will tell you the good that I have acquired and the fame that I have won through the grace of that Mahatman. I will discourse to you on the subject, after having bowed to the Kapardin. O king, listen to me as I recite to you that Satarudriya which I chant with restrained senses, every morning after rising from bed. The great Lord of all creatures, the Grandsire Brahma himself, tapodhana, composed those mantras, after having observed especial penances for some time. O king, it is Sankara who created all the creatures in the universe, mobile and unmoving. There is no being that is higher, O monarch, than Mahadeva. Verily, he is the highest of all beings in the three worlds. There is no one who can stand before that Devadeva. Indeed, there is no being in the three worlds that can be regarded as his equal. When he stands, filled with rage, on the field of battle, the very odour of his body deprives all his enemies of consciousness and they that are not slain tremble and fall down. His roars are terrible, like those of thunderheads. Hearing those roars in battle, the very hearts of the Devas break in twain. When the wielder of Pinaka grows angry and assuming a terrible form merely casts his eye upon Deva, Asura, Gandharva or Naga, that one shall never have peace of mind, not by taking shelter in the deepest recesses of a mountain-cave.

When the Prajapati Daksha undertook his great sacrifice, he slighted Siva by not inviting him or offering him any part of the havis; Sati went to Daksha's yagna and she immolated herself there at the disregard her father showed her husband Siva. And the dauntless Bhava, giving way to wrath, roared aloud and pierced the embodied Yagna through with a shaft from his terrible bow. When Maheswara became angry and suddenly struck Yagna with his shaft, the Devas were panic-stricken, and in a wink lost all their natural joy and peace. The universe trembled at the twanging of Siva's bowstring. The Devas and the Asuras, O son of Pritha, grew numb and weak. The ocean rolled in agitation and the earth shuddered to her very core. The hills and mountains uprooted themselves in terror and fled in all directions. The vault of the sky was cloven. All the worlds were plunged in gloom. Nothing could be seen. The light of all the luminaries fell dim and darkling, why, along with that of the sun himself, O Bhaarata.

Terror-stricken and desperate to save themselves and the universe, the Maharishis tried to perform the customary rites of propitiation and peace. Meanwhile, Rudra of terrible prowess rushed against the Devas. Filled with rage, he tore out the eyes of Bhaga. Incensed with wrath, he kicked Pushan with his foot. He tore out the teeth of that god as he sat eating the large sacrificial ball of the Purodasa. Quaking with fear, the Devas bent their heads to Sankara. Without being appeased, Rudra once more placed set a blazing arrow to his bow-string, and the Devas and Rishis' alarm flared up even higher. Those greatest among gods began to ardently worship him. Joining their hands in reverence, they began to recite the Satarudriya mantras. At last, thus hymned by the Devas, Maheswara was pacified and grew calm. The Devas then assigned a large and pre-eminent share of the sacrificial offerings to him. Still trembling with fear, O king, they fervently and abjectly sought his protection.

When Rudra became gratified, the embodiment of Yagna, which had been cloven in two, was once more united. Whatever limbs of his had been destroyed by the shafts of Mahadeva, became whole and sound.

The Asuras of great urjas had in days of yore three impregnable cities in the firmament. One of these was made of iron, one of silver and the third of gold. With all his weapons, Maghavat, the king of the Devas, could not destroy those cities. Harassed and afflicted by the Asuras, all the Devas sought the protection of the great Rudra.

Assembled together, the gods addressed him, ‘O Rudra, the Asuras threaten to destroy all things with what they do. We beg you, kill the Daityas and destroy their city for the protection of the three worlds, O bestowers of boons!’

Siva replied, ‘So be it,’ and then made Vishnu his inexorable arrowhead. He made Agni the shaft of his astra, and Surya’s son Yama the wings of that missile. He made the Vedas his bow and Goddess Savitri his bow-string. And he made the Grandsire Brahma his charioteer. With all these, he pierced the Tripura, the triad city of the Asuras, with his great astra, which was made of three parvans and three salyas. O Bhaarata, Siva consumed the Asuras with their cities, with his astra whose complexion was that of the sun and whose energy was that of the fire which appears at the end of the yuga to devour all things.

Seeing Mahadeva transformed into a child with five locks of hair lying on the lap of Parvati, Indra asked the Devas who he was. Seeing the child, Sakra suddenly became jealous and wrathful and resolved to kill him with his vajra. The child, however, paralysed Indra’s arm like a mace of iron, with the thunderbolt in its hand. The Devas were all bewildered, and they could not understand that the child was the Lord of the universe. Verily, all of them along with the Lokapalas, found their minds dazed by that child who was none else than the Supreme Being.

Then, meditating with his tapasya shakti, the illustrious Pitamaha Brahma discovered that that child was the foremost of all Beings, the Lord of Uma, Mahadeva of immeasurable prowess. He then praised the Lord. The Devas also began to hymn the praises of both Uma and Rudra. Indra’s paralysed arm was no longer benumbed. It was the same Mahadeva who incarnated as the Mahatejasvin Brahmana Durvasa, and lived for a long time in my home in Dwaravati. While he remained with me, he did so many diverse deeds of mischief. Though difficult to bear, I still endured them joyfully for I knew whose amsa Durvasa was.

He is Rudra; he is Siva; he is Agni; he is Sarva; he is the vanquisher of all; he is Indra, and Vayu and the Aswins and the god of lightning. He is Chandramas; he is Isana; he is Surya; he is Varuna; he is Kaala; he is Yama; he is Mrityu; he is the Divasa and Ratri; he is the Paksha; he is the Ritus; he is the two Sandhyas; he is the Varsa. He is Dhatri and he is Vidhatri; and he is Viswakarman; and he is the Sarvagyani. He is the Diks and the Upadiks also. Of Viswarupa, he is Anantatman.

The holy and illustrious Durvasa is of the complexion of the celestials. He sometimes manifests himself singly; sometimes divides himself in two; and sometimes exhibits himself in many, a hundred thousand, forms. Even such is Mahadeva. He is, again, that God who is Aja, Un-born. In even a hundred years one cannot begin to describe his merits by reciting them.'"

"Krishna says, 'O Yudhishtira, Mahabaho, listen to me as I recite to you the many names of Rudra as also the high blessedness of that Mahatman.

The Rishis describe Mahadeva as Agni, and Sthanu and Maheswara; as One-eyed, and Three-eyed, of Universal Form, and Siva or highly auspicious. Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas say that God has two forms. One of these is terrible, and the other mild and auspicious. Those two forms, again, are divided into many forms. That form which is fierce and terrible is identical with Agni and lightning and Surya. The other form which is mild and auspicious is identical with dharma and Jala and Chandramas. Then, again, it is said that half his body is Agni, fire, and half is Soma or the moon. That form of his which is mild and auspicious is said to be engaged in keeping the Brahmacharya vrata. The other form of his, which is supremely terrible, is engaged in all the destruction found in the universe.

Because he is great, Mahat, and the Supreme Lord of all, Iswara, therefore is he called Maheswara. And since he burns and scourges, is keen and fierce, and endued with great energy, and is a devourer of flesh and blood and marrow, he is said to be Rudra. Since he is the foremost of all the deities, and since his dominion and acquisitions are infinite, and since he protects the infinite universe, he is called Mahadeva.

Since he is of the form or colour of smoke, he is called Dhurjati. Since through all his actions he performs sacrifices for all and seeks the good of every creature, he is called Siva or the Auspicious One. Staying above in the sky, he burns the lives of all creatures and is, besides, fixed on a definite path from which he does not deviate. His emblem, again, is fixed and immovable for all time. He is, for these reasons, called Sthanu. He is also of multiform aspect. He is present, past and future. He is chala and achala. For this he is called Bahurupa. The deities called the Viswedevas reside in his body. He is, for this, called Viswarupa of universal form.

He is thousand-eyed; or he is myriad-eyed; or he has eyes on all sides and on every part of his body. His energy issues through his eyes. There is no end to his eyes. Since he always nourishes all creatures and sports, also, with them, and since he is their Lord and master, he is called Pasupati, the Lord of creatures.

Since his Linga is always observant of the vow of Brahmacharya, all the worlds worship it. This act of worship is said to please him highly. If there is one who worships him by creating his image and another who worships his Linga, it is the latter that attains to great prosperity for ever. The Rishis, the Devas, the Gandharvas and the Apsaras worship that Linga of his which is forever erect and upraised. If his Linga is worshipped, Maheswara becomes highly gratified with the worshipper.

Loving towards his devotees, he bestows happiness upon them with a cheerful heart. This Great God loves to stay in smasanas, crematoria, and there he burns and consumes corpses. Those that perform sacrifices on such grounds attain at the end to those regions which have been set apart for great Kshatriya heroes. He it is that is regarded as the death which resides in the bodies of all creatures. He is, again, the breaths called prana and apana in the bodies of all embodied beings. He has many blazing and terrible forms. All those forms are worshipped in the world and are known to Brahmanas possessed of knowledge. Amongst the gods, he has many names, all of which are full of grave import. Verily, the meanings of those names are derived from either his greatness or vastness, his feats or his conduct. The Brahmanas always recite the excellent Satarudriya in his honour, which occurs in the Vedas, as also that which has been composed by Vyasa.

Verily, the Brahmanas and Rishis call him the Eldest of all beings. He is the First of all the gods, and it was from his mouth that he created Agni. Ever willing to grant protection to all, Siva never gives up or abandons his bhaktas who worship him. He would much rather abandon his own life-breath and incur all possible afflictions himself. Long life, health and freedom from disease, affluence, wealth, diverse kinds of pleasures and enjoyments, he confers, and also takes them away. The lordship and affluence that one sees in Sakra and the other Devas are in truth his.

It is he who is always engaged in all that is good and evil in the three worlds. In consequence of his absolute control over all objects of kama, he is called Iswara, the Supreme Lord or master. Since, again, he is the master of the vast universe, he is called Maheswara. The whole universe is pervaded by him in diverse forms. It is that God whose mouth roars and burns the waters of the sea, in the form of the Badavamukha, that vast burning head of a mare!'" Vaisampayana said, "After Krishna, the son of Devaki, says this, Yudhishtira once more asks Santanu's son Bhishma, 'O Mababuddhe, O foremost of all who know dharma, which of the two—direct perception or the scriptures—is to be regarded as the authority to arrive at a conclusion?'

Bhishma says, 'I believe there is no doubt in this matter. Listen to me, O you of great wisdom; I will answer you. The question you have asked is apposite. It is easy to have doubts about this, and the answer to it is difficult. Innumerable are the instances, in respect of both direct perception and the Srutis, in which doubts can arise.

Some men, who delight in the name of logicians, imagining themselves to be possessed of superior wisdom, affirm that direct perception is the only authority. They assert that nothing, however true, can be said to exist which is not directly perceivable; or, at least they doubt the existence of those things. Indeed, such assertions involve an absurdity and they who make them are of foolish understanding, whatever may be their pride of learning. If, on the other hand, you doubt how the one indivisible Brahman could be the cause, I answer that one would understand it only after a long course of years and with the help of assiduous yoga. Indeed, O Bhaarata, one that lives by such means as present themselves without being wedded to this or that settled mode of life, and one who is devoted to the resolution of the question, will be able to understand it. None else truly can.

When one attains to the very end of reasons, indeed the process of reasoning, one then attains to that ultimate and all comprehensive knowledge—that infinite mass of light which illumines all the universe, the lustre called Brahman. That knowledge, O king, which is derived from reason or inferences can scarcely be called true knowledge, and such knowledge should be rejected. It is not defined or comprehended through the word. It must, therefore, be abjured.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, Pitamaha, which among these four is most authoritative—direct perception, inference from observation, the science of Agama or the scriptures, and diverse kinds of practices that distinguish the good.'

Bhishma says, 'While evil men of great might seek to destroy dharma, it is can be protected for the time being by those that are good exerting themselves with care and earnestness. Such protection, however, is of no avail in the long term, for destruction does overtake dharma finally. Then, again, dharma often proves a mask for covering adharma, like grass and straw covering the mouth of a deep pit and concealing it from view. Listen again to me, O Yudhishtira. It is because of this that the practices of the good are interfered with and sought to be destroyed by the evil. Men of evil pravritti, who discard the Srutis, sinners who are haters of dharma, destroy that righteous course of conduct which could otherwise be established as a standard. Hence, doubts attach to direct perception, inference and good conduct. Those, therefore, among the good that possess understanding born of or cleansed by the scriptures, and who are always contented, are to be regarded as the best and the foremost of men. Let those that are anxious and deprived of tranquillity of soul, approach these. Indeed, Yudhishtira, do you pay court to them and seek from them the resolution of your doubt.

Disregarding both pleasure and wealth, kama and artha, which always follow lobha, greed, and awakened into the belief that only dharma should be sought, O Yudhishtira, wait upon and question men of truth to receive enlightenment from them. The way and the conduct of those great men never strays or meets with peril or destruction, as also their sacrifices and Vedic study and rites. Indeed, these three—conduct as consisting of overt deeds, behaviour in respect of purity of mind, and the Vedas, together constitute dharma.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, my understanding is once more darkened by doubt. I am on this side of the ocean, seeking the means to cross it. I do not, however, see the other shore of the ocean. If these three, the Vedas, direct perception, and conduct, together constitute what is to be regarded as authority, it can be alleged that there is a difference between them. Dharma then becomes of three kinds, although it is one and indivisible.'

Bhishma says, 'Dharma is sometimes seen to be destroyed by evil men and spirits of great power. If you think, O king, that dharma should really be of three kinds, my reply is that your conclusion is warranted by reason. The truth is that righteousness is one and indivisible, although it can be looked at from three different viewpoints. The paths as indications of those three that constitute the foundation of dharma have each been clearly laid down. Do you act according to the niyamas, the laws. You should never wrangle about dharma and then seek to have those doubts solved at which you may arrive. O king of the Bharatas, let no doubts like these ever seize possession of your mind.

Do you obey what I say without scruple or hesitation of any kind. Follow me like a blind man or like one who, without being possessed of sense himself, has to depend upon that of another. Non-violence, truth, absence of wrath, forgiveness and liberality in gifts—these four practices, O king, Ajatasatru that has no foe, for these four constitute eternal dharma. Do you also, O Mahabaho, pursue that conduct towards Brahmanas which is consistent with what has been observed towards them by your sires and Grandsires. These are the principal indications of dharma. The man of little intelligence who would destroy the weight of authority by denying that to be a standard which has always been accepted as such will himself fail to become an authority among men. Such a man is the cause of much grief in the world. Do you reverence Brahmanas and treat them with hospitality. Do you always serve them in this way. The universe rests upon them. Do you understand them to be such—the very holders of the worlds!'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, Pitamaha, what the respective ends are of those that abhor dharma and of those that adore and observe it.'

Bhishma says, 'Those men that hate righteousness are said to have their hearts overwhelmed by the attributes of passion and darkness, rajas and tamas. Such men have always to go into naraka. Those men, on the other hand, who always worship and observe dharma, those men who are devoted to truth and sincerity, are called good men. They always enjoy the pleasures and grace of swarga. For waiting upon their preceptors with reverence their hearts always turn naturally towards dharma. Verily, they who adore dharma attain to the realms of the gods. Men or deities who divest themselves of avarice and malice, and who emaciate or afflict their bodies by the observance of austerities, succeed, through the dharma which then becomes theirs, to attain to great reward and bliss.

Those that are gifted with true wisdom have said that the Brahmanas, who are the eldest sons of Brahma, represent and embody dharma. They that are righteous always worship them, their hearts regarding them with as much love and affection as a hungry man's stomach entertains for ripe and delicious fruit.'

Yudhishtira says, 'What is the appearance presented by those that are evil, and what are the deeds of those that are called men of dharma? Explain to me this, O Holy One. Indeed, tell me what the indications are of the good and the wicked.'

Bhishma says, 'The evil are so in their practices; they are ungovernable, foul-mouthed and cannot be kept within the restraints of laws; they who are good are always so in what they do. Why, the deeds of these men are regarded as the very indications of the course of conduct which is called dharma.

They that are good or righteous, O king, never answer the two calls of nature on a public road, in a cow-pen, or a paddy field. After feeding the five—the gods, the manes, guests, kinsmen and dependants—they eat themselves. They never talk while eating, and never go to sleep with wet hands. Whenever they see any of the following, they circumambulate them in pradakshina to show them reverence—a burning fire, a bull, the image of a deity, a cow-pen, a place where four roads meet and an old and virtuous Brahmana. They give way, themselves standing aside, to the old, to those that carry burdens, to women, to those that hold high positions in the village or town, Brahmanas, kine and kings.

The righteous or good man is he that protects his guests, servants and other dependants, his own relatives, and all those that seek his protection. Such a man always welcomes these with the customary polite enquiries after their health and well-being. Two times have been appointed by the deities for humans to eat—morning and evening. In between these two, one should not eat anything. By following this rule about eating, one is said to observe an upavasa, a fast. As the sacred fire waits for libations to be poured upon it when the hour for homa arrives, even so a woman, when her period is over, expects an act of congress with her husband. He that never approaches his wives at any other time save after their period, is said to observe the vow of brahmacharya. Amrita, Brahmanas and kine—these three are regarded as equal. Hence, one should always worship, with due rites, Brahmanas and sacred cows.

One does not incur any fault or stain by eating the meat of animals slain in sacrifices with mantras from the Yajur Veda. The flesh of the backbone, or that of animals not killed in sacrifice, should be avoided even as one avoids the flesh of one's own son. One should never have one's guest go without food whether when one lives in one's own country or in a foreign land. After completing one's study, one should give dakshina to one's preceptor. When one sees one's guru, one should greet him with reverence and, worshipping him, offer him a seat. By worshipping one's guru, one increases the period of one's life as also one's fame and prosperity.

One should never censure the old, nor send them on any business. One should never sit when someone old is standing. By conducting oneself in this manner, one protects and even prolongs the duration of one's life. One should never cast one's eyes on a naked woman, or a naked man. One should never indulge in sexual congress, except in privacy. One should eat also without being seen by others. Gurus are the foremost of tirthas; the heart is the foremost of all sacred objects; knowledge is the foremost of all objects of seeking; and contentment is the foremost of all joys.

Morning and evening, one should listen to the grave counsels of those that are aged. One attains to wisdom by constantly waiting upon those that are venerable in years. While reading the Vedas or eating, one should use one's right hand. One should always keep one's speech and mind under thorough control, as also one's senses. With well-cooked payasa, yavaka, krisara, and Havi, one should worship the Pitris and the Devas in the sraddha called Ashtaka. The same should be used in worshipping the Grahas, the planets.

One should not shave or be shaved without calling down a blessing upon oneself. If one sneezes, one should be blessed by those present. All that are ill or afflicted with disease should be blessed. The extension of their lives should be prayed for. One should never address an eminent person familiarly by using the word Tvam. Under even great duress one should never do this. To address such a person as Tvam and to kill him are equal; men of learning are degraded by such a form of address. To those that are inferior, or equal, or to disciples, the word Tvam can be used.

The heart of the sinful man always proclaims the sins he has committed. Those men who have deliberately committed sins meet with destruction by seeking to conceal them from the good. Indeed, confirmed sinners seek to conceal their sins from others. Such ones think that their sins are witnessed by neither men nor the gods. The sinful man, overwhelmed by his sins, is born into a wretched and miserable order of being. The sins of such a man continually grow, even as the interest the usurer charge on loans increases from day to day.

If, having committed a sin, one seeks to have it removed through dharma, that sin is destroyed and leads to righteousness instead of further sins. If water be poured upon salt, the salt immediately dissolves. Even so when expiation is performed, sin dissolves. For these reasons one should never conceal a sin. Concealed, it is certain to increase. Having committed a sin, one should confess it in the presence of those that are good. They would destroy it immediately.

If one does not enjoy in good time what one has stored with hope, the consequence is that the stored wealth finds another owner after the death of him who has stored it. The wise have said that the mind of every creature is the true test of dharma. Hence, all creatures in the world have an innate tendency to achieve dharma. One should achieve dharma alone, single-handedly. Verily, one should not proclaim oneself to be righteous and walk with the standard of dharma borne aloft for the purpose of exhibition. They are said to be traders in dharma who practise it for enjoying the fruits it brings.

One should worship the gods without giving way to feelings of pride. Similarly, one should serve one's preceptor without deceit. One should make arrangements for securing to oneself invaluable wealth in the hereafter, which consists in dana given here to the deserving.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'It is seen that if a man happens to be unfortunate, he fails to acquire wealth, however great his strength. On the other hand, if one happens to be fortunate, he comes to the possession of wealth, even if he be a weakling or a fool. When, again, the time does not come for acquisition, one cannot make an acquisition with even one's best exertions. When, however, the time comes for acquisition, one wins great wealth without any effort. Hundreds of men may be seen who achieve no result even when they exert themselves to the best of their abilities. Many, again, are seen to make acquisitions without any exertion. If wealth were the result of exertion, then one could, with exertion, acquire it immediately. Verily, if the case were so, no man of learning could then be seen to take the protection for his livelihood of one destitute of learning.

Among men, that which is not destined to be attained, O king of the Bharatas, is never attained. Men are seen to fail in achieving results even by putting forth their best efforts. One man may be seen to seek wealth by hundreds of means and yet failing to acquire it; while another, without at all seeking it, is happy in its possession. Men may be seen doing evil deeds continually for wealth and yet failing to acquire it. Others are in the enjoyment of wealth without doing any evil whatever. Others, again, who are observant of the duties assigned to them by the scriptures, are without wealth.

One man may be seen to be without any knowledge of the science of morality and policy, even after he has studied all the treatises on that subject. Another, again, may be seen appointed as the prime minister of a king without having studied the science of morality and policy at all. A learned man may be seen that is possessed of wealth; one devoid of learning may also be seen owning wealth. Both kinds of men, again, may be seen to be entirely impoverished. If, by the acquisition of learning one could acquire the felicity of wealth, then no man of learning could be found living for the very means of his subsistence under the protection of one who has no learning. Indeed, if one could obtain by the acquisition of learning all things desirable, objects like a thirsty man having his thirst slaked upon obtaining water, then none in this world would have ever shown idleness in acquiring learning.

If, one's time has not come one does not die even if one be pierced with hundreds of arrows. On the other hand, one gives up one's life if one's hour has come, even if it be a blade of grass with which one is struck.'

Bhishma says, 'If a man, setting himself to an undertaking involving even great exertion, fails to earn wealth, he should then practise severe austerities. Unless seeds be sown, no crops appear. It is by making gifts to deserving persons in this life that one acquires in one's next life numerous objects of enjoyment, even as one becomes possessed of intelligence and wisdom by waiting upon those that are venerable for years. The wise have said that one is blessed with longevity by practising the dharma of abstaining from cruelty to all creatures. Hence, one should make gifts and not solicit or accept them when made by others.

One should worship those men that are righteous. Verily, one should be sweet-speeched towards all, and always do what is agreeable to others. One should seek to attain to purity, of both mind and body. Indeed, it is paramount that one should always abstain from doing injury to any creature. When in the matter of the happiness and woe of even ants and insects, their karma of this and past lives and nature constitute the cause, it is meet, O Yudhishtira, that you should be serene.'

"Bhishma says, 'If a man does good deeds himself or causes others to accomplish them, he should then expect to attain to the rewards of dharma. Similarly, if he does evil, and causes others to do evil, he should never expect to attain to the merits of righteousness. At all times, it is Time that, entering the understanding of all creatures, sets them to acts of dharma or adharma, and then confers felicity or misery upon them. When, beholding the fruits of dharma, a man understands dharma to be superior, it is then that he inclines towards righteousness and puts his faith in it. He, however, whose understanding is not firm, fails to find faith in goodness. As regards faith in dharma, it is this and nothing else that makes for belief—the steadiness of the mind.

To put faith in righteousness is the indication of wisdom in all men. The man who knows both what should be done and what should not must be mindful of timeliness, care and devotion when he sets out to achieve what is right. Righteous men who have in this life been blessed with affluence, acting of their own volition, take particular care of their souls so that they may not, in their next lives, have to be born as men with the rajoguna dominating in them.

Time, which is the supreme disposer of all things, can never make dharma the cause of misery. One should, therefore, know that the soul, which is inherently righteous, is certainly pure, and free from evil and suffering. As for adharma, it may be said that, even when of large proportions, it cannot even touch dharma, which is always protected by Time and which shines like a blazing fire. These are the two results achieved by dharma—the stainlessness of the soul and insusceptibility to being touched by adharma. Verily, dharma is always fraught with victory. Its lustre is so great that it illumines the three worlds. A man of wisdom cannot seize a sinner and forcibly make him righteous. When seriously urged to act righteously, the sinful only do so with hypocrisy, impelled by fear.

They that are righteous among the Sudras never betake themselves to such hypocrisy under the plea that men of the Sudra varna are not allowed to live according to any of the four prescribed asramas. I will tell you particularly what the svadharmas truly are of the four varnas. As far as their bodies are concerned, individuals belonging to all the four orders have the five primal elements for their constituent ingredients. Indeed, in this respect, they are all of the same substance. For all that, distinctions exist between them in respect of both practices relating to life or the world and also their svadharma. Notwithstanding these distinctions, sufficient liberty of action is left to them by which all men may attain to an equality of condition. The regions of grace which represent the consequences or rewards of dharma are not eternal, for they are destined to come to an end. Dharma itself, however, is eternal. When the cause is eternal, why is the effect not so? Listen to the answer to this.

Only that dharma is eternal which is not promoted by the desire of fruit or reward. That dharma which is prompted by the desire of reward is not eternal. Hence, the reward though undesired that attaches to the first kind of dharma—attainment of identity with Brahman—is eternal. The reward, however, that attaches to that dharma prompted by desire of the reward of swarga and enjoyment, is not eternal.

All men are equal in respect of their physical organism. All of them, again, are possessed of souls that are equal in regard of their nature. When death comes, all else dissolves. What remains is the inceptive will to achieve dharma. That, indeed, reappears of itself in the next life. When such is the result, when the enjoyments and endurances of this life are due to the karma of a past life, the inequality of lot discernible among human beings cannot be regarded as in any way anomalous. So also, it is seen that those creatures that belong to the intermediate orders of existence are equally subject, in the matter of their actions, to the influence of example.'"

CANTO 165

Vaisampayana said, "That perpetuator of Kuru's race, Yudhishtira the son of Pandu, wanting to acquire the dharma which destroys sin, further questions Bhishma who lies on a bed of arrows.

Yudhishtira says, 'What is truly beneficial for a man in this world? What is that by doing which one may earn happiness? By what may one be cleansed of all one's sins? Indeed, what is that which is destructive of sin?'

The royal son of Santanu, O best of men, duly recites the names of the deities to Yudhishtira who was eager to listen.

Bhishma says, 'O son, the following names of the Devas, with those of the Rishis, if duly recited morning, noon and evening, become efficacious cleansers of all sins. Whatever sins of body or mind one might commit by day or by night, or during the two twilights, consciously or unconsciously, one is sure to be cleansed therefrom and become pure by reciting these names. He that speaks these names never becomes blind or deaf; indeed, by taking these names, one always succeeds in attaining to what is beneficial. Such a man is never born in the intermediate order of beings, never goes to hell, and never becomes a human being of any of the mixed castes. He has never to fear the accession of any disaster or tragedy. When death comes, he is never frightened or bewildered.

The resplendent Master of all the Devas and Asuras, worshipped by all creatures, inconceivable, indescribable, the life of all living beings, and unborn, is the Pitamaha Brahma, the Lord of the universe. His chaste consort is Savitri. Then comes that Origin of the Vedas, the Creator Vishnu, otherwise called Narayana of immeasurable puissance. Then comes the three-eyed Lord of Uma; then, Skanda, the senapati of the celestial forces; then Visakha; then Agni, the eater of sacrificial libations; then Vayu, the god of wind; then Chandramas; then Aditya, the sun god, endued with splendour; then the illustrious Sakra, the Lord of Sachi; and Yama with his consort Dhumorna; and Varuna with Gauri; Kubera the Lord of treasures, with his wife Riddhi; the gentle and illustrious cow Surabhi; the great Rishi Visravas; Sankalpa, Varuna, Ganga; the other sacred rivers; the diverse Maruts; the Balakhilyas crowned with tapodhana; the island-born Krishna; Narada; Parvata; Viswavasu; the Hahas; the Huhus; Tumburu; Chitrasena, the celestial messenger of wide celebrity; the most blessed Apsaras—Urvasi, Menaka, Rambha, Misrakesi, Alambusha, Viswachi, Ghritachi, Panchachuda and Tilottama; the Adityas, the Vasus, the Aswins, the Pitris; Dharma Deva; Vedic lore, tapasya, diksha, dridhata in religious acts, the Pitamaha, day and night, Kasyapa the son of Marichi, Sukra, Brihaspati, Mangala, the son of earth, Budha, Rahu, Sanaischara, the constellations, the seasons, the months, the fortnights, the year, Garuda, the son of Vinata, the several oceans, the sons of Kadru, the Nagas; Satadru, Vipasa, Chandrabhaga, Saraswati, Sindhu, Devika, Prabhasa, the lakes of Pushkara, Ganga, Mahanadi, Vena, Kaveri, Narmada, Kulampuna, Visalya, Karatoya, Ambuvahini. Sarayu, Gandaki, the great Lohita river, Tamra, Aruna, Vetravati, Parnasa, Gautami, Godavari, Krishnavena, Dvija, Drishadvati, Kaveri, Vankhu, Mandakini Prayaga, Prabhasa, the sacred Naimisha, Kasi which is sacred to Visweswara or Mahadeva, Manasarovara, lake of crystalline water, Kurukshetra, full of many sacred waters, Kshirsagara the foremost of oceans, tapasya, dana, Jambumarga, Hiranwati, Vitasta, the Plakshavati river, Vedasmriti, Vedavati, Malava, Aswavati, all sacred tirthas on earth, Gangadwara, the sacred Rishikulya, the Chitravaha river, the Charmanwati, the sacred Kausiki the Yamuna, the Bhimarathi river, the great Bahuda river, Mahendravani, Tridiva Nilika, Saraswati, Nanda, the other Nanda, the large sacred Lake Gaya, Phalgutirtha Dharmarayana the sacred forest that is peopled with the Devas, the holy Akasa Ganga, the Lake Pushkara created by the Grandsire Brahma, which is sacred and celebrated over the three worlds, and auspicious and able to cleanse all sins, the Himavat mountain endued with the most excellent herbs, the Vindhya mountain with diverse kinds of metals, containing many tirthas and overgrown with medicinal herbs; Meru, Mahendra, Malaya, Sweta imbued with silver, Sringavat, Mandara, Nila, Nishada, Dardurna, Chitrakuta, Anjanabha, the Gandhamadana mountains; the sacred Somagiri, the various other mountains, the cardinal points of the sky, the subsidiary points, the earth, all the trees, the Viswedevas, the firmament, the constellations, the planets and the deities—let these all, named and unnamed, purify and save!

The man who takes the names of these is cleansed of all his sins. By hymning their praises and gratifying them, one becomes free from every fear. Verily, the man who delights in uttering the hymns in praise of the deities is washed of all such sins as lead to birth in impure orders. After this recital of the deities, I will name those learned Brahmanas crowned with ascetic merit and success and who can exorcise one of every sin.

They are Yavakrita and Raibhya and Kakshivat and Aushija, and Bhrigu and Angiras and Kanwa, and the mighty Medhatithi, and Barhi possessed of every accomplishment. These all belong to the east. Unmuchu, Pramuchu, all highly blessed, Swastyatreya of great energy, Agastya of great prowess, the son of Mitra and Varuna; Dridhayu and Urdhabahu, those two foremost and most celebrated of Rishis—these dwell in the south. Hear now of the Rishis that dwell in the west. They are Ushango with his brothers, Parivyadha of great energy, Dirghatamas, Gautama, Kasyapa, Ekata, Dwita, Trita, Durvasa, the righteous-souled son of Atri, and great Saraswat. The Rishis that worship the Devas in sacrifices, and dwell in the north are Atri, Vasishta, Saktri, Parasara's son Vyasa of great tejas, Viswamitra, Bharadwaja, Jamadagni the son of Richika, Rama, Auddalaka, Swetaketu, Kohala, Vipula, Devala, Devasarman, Dhaumya, Hastikasyapa, Lomasa, Nachiketa, Lomaharsana, Ugrasravas, and Bhrigu's son Chyavana.

These are the Rishis possessed of the most profound Vedic lore. They are primeval Rishis, O king, whose names, if taken, can purify one of every sin.

Listen now to names of the principal kings. They are Nriga, Yayati, Nahusha, Yadu, Puru of great energy, Sagara, Dhundhumara, Dilipa of great prowess, Krisaswa, Yauvanaswa, Chitraswa, Satyavat, Dushmanta, Bharata who became an illustrious Emperor of many kings, Yavana, Janaka, Dhrishtaratha, Raghu, that foremost of kings, Dasaratha, the heroic Rama, that slayer of Rakshasas, Sasabindu, Bhagiratha, Harischandra, Marutta, Dridharatha, the highly fortunate Alarka, Aila, Karandhama, that foremost of men, Kasmira, Daksha, Ambarisha, Kukura, Raivata of great fame, Kuru, Samvarana, Mandhatri of unbaffled prowess, the Rajarishi Muchukunda, Jahnu who was much favoured by Jahnavi the Ganga, the first of all kings

Prithu, son of Vena, Mitrabhanu, Priyankara, Trasadasyu, Sweta that best of royal sages, the celebrated Mahabhisha, Nimi, Ashtaka, Ayu, the Rajarishi Kshupa, Kaksheyu, Pratardana, Devodasa, Sudasa, Kosaleswara, Aila, Nala, the royal sage Manu, that Lord of all creatures, Havidhara, Prishadhara, Pratipa, Santanu, Aja, the elder Barhi, Ikshvaku of great fame, Anaranya, Janujangha, the Rajarishi Kakshasena, and many others who were great indeed but remain unnamed.

That man who, rising at early dawn, takes the names of these kings at the two sandhyas, at sunset and sunrise, with a pure body and mind and without focused attention, acquires great religious punya. One should hymn the praises of the Devas, the Devarishis and the Rajarishis and say, "These Lords of the creation will ordain my growth and long life and fame. Let no calamity be mine, let no sin defile me, and let me have no opponents or enemies. Without doubt, victory will always be mine and an auspicious end hereafter!'"

Janamejaya said, "While that Kurusattama Bhishma, greatest of his vamsa, lay on a bed of arrows, a bed always coveted by Kshatriya heroes, and when the Pandavas sat around him, my great Grandsire Yudhishtira of much wisdom listened to these expositions of mysteries with respect to dharma and had all his doubts resolved. He heard also what the niyamas and vidhis are that apply to the subjects of dana and dakshina, and had all his doubts removed about both dharma and artha. I ask you now, O learned Brahmana, to tell me what else the great Pandava king did."

Vaisampayana said, "When Bhishma falls silent, the entire circle of kings and heroes who sit around him become perfectly quiet. Indeed, they all sit motionless there, like figures painted on stone. Then, Vyasa, the son of Satyavati, having reflected for a moment, addresses the royal son of Ganga, saying, 'O Devavrata, the Kuru King Yudhishtira has been restored to his own nature, along with all brothers and followers. With Krishna of great intelligence by his side, he bends his head in reverence to you. You must now give him leave to return to the city.'

Thus addressed by the holy Vyasa, the royal son of Santanu and Ganga dismisses Yudhishtira and his counsellors. Addressing his grandson in a loving voice, Bhishma says, 'Do you return to the city, O king. Let the fever of your heart be dispelled. Do you adore the Devas in many sacrifices distinguished by large gifts of food and wealth, as Yayati himself did, O best of kings endued with bhakti and samyama. Devoted to the svadharma of the Kshatriya varna, do you, O son of Pritha, gratify the Pitris and the Devas. You shall earn great benefits if you do this.

Indeed, let the fever of your heart be entirely dispelled. Do you gladden all your subjects. Do you assure them and establish peace among all. Do you also honour all your well-wishers with such rewards as they deserve. Let all your friends and well-wishers live, depending on you for their means, even as birds depend on a full-grown tree laden with fruit and standing on a sacred spot. When the hour comes for my departure from this world, come here again, O king. The time when I shall leave my body is when the sun stops in his southward journey, Dakshinayana, and begins his return northwards in Uttarayana.'

The son of Kunti answers, 'Tathaastu, so be it!' and salutes his Grandsire with reverence and then sets out, with all his relatives and followers, for the city called after the elephant. Placing Dhritarashtra at the head of his party and also Gandhari, so very devoted to her husband, and accompanied by the Rishis and Krishna, as also by the citizens of Hastinapura and the inhabitants of the countryside and by his counsellors, O Rajan, that foremost one of Kuru's race enters the city named after the elephant."

Vaisampayana said, “Now the royal son of Kunti, having duly honoured the citizens and the inhabitants of the provinces, dismisses them to their respective homes. The Pandava king then consoles the women who had lost their heroic husbands and sons in the Great War, and gives them abundant wealth. Having recovered his kingdom, Yudhishtira of great wisdom finally has himself duly installed on the throne. With diverse and countless acts of goodwill, that Purushottama reassures and comforts all his subjects. That best of men of dharma sets himself to earn the substantial blessing of Brahmanas, of his foremost military officers and the leading citizens.

Having passed fifty nights in the capital, the Kuru king recalls that Uttarayana is upon the world, the time his Pitamaha Bhishma had told him that he would leave the world. Accompanied by a number of priests he sets out of the city named after the elephant, for he has seen the sun cease his southward journey and turn north. Yudhishtira takes a great quantity of ghrita with him and garlands of fine flowers and excellent sandalwood and agar wood and dark aloe wood, for the cremation of Bhishma’s body. He further brings with him many kinds of costly ornaments and invaluable gemstones. Taking Dhritarashtra and Queen Gandhari, celebrated for her virtues, and his own mother Kunti and all his brothers also, Yudhishtira of great intelligence, accompanied by Krishna and Vidura of great wisdom, as also by Yuyutsu and Yuyudhana, and by his other relatives and followers forming a large train, goes forth to Kurukshetra again, his praises sung the while by vabdhis and magadhis, many eulogists and bards.

The sacrificial fires of Bhishma are also borne along with the procession. Thus, the Kuru king sets out from his city of the elephant like a second Indra. Soon enough, he arrives at the place where the son of Santanu still lies upon his bed of arrows. He sees his Grandsire waited upon with reverence by Parasara's son Vyasa Mahabuddhi, by Narada, O Rajarishi, by Devala and Asita, and also by the unslain kings of the world arrived and assembled here from various parts of Bharatavarsha. Yudhishtira sees that his Mahatman Pitamaha, as he lay on his heroic bed, is guarded on all sides by the warriors appointed to that charge. Alighting from his chariot, Yudhishtira and his brothers solemnly greet and salute their Pitamaha, that great Parantapa. They also reverently salute the Rishis with the island-born Vyasa at their head, and are respectfully greeted by them in return.

Accompanied by his priests, each of whom resembles the Pitamaha Brahma himself, and by his brothers, Yudhishtira of unfading glory approaches Bhishma on his bed of arrows lying there surrounded by the revered Mahamunis.

Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, at the head of his brothers, addresses Gangaputra Bhishma, saying, 'I am Yudhishtira, O Lord. Salutations to you, O Jahnaviputra! If you can still hear me, tell me what I should do for you. I have come here at the hour you told me to and I bring your sacred fires with me, and wait upon your command. Preceptors of all the shastras and their angas, all the branches of learning, Brahmanas, Ritwiks, my brothers, your son king Dhritarashtra of great tejas, are all here, with my counsellors as also Krishna who has no equal. Those Kshatriyas whom the war has spared and all the denizens of Kurujangala are also here. Open your eyes, O Lord of the Kuru vamsa, and look at them. We have arranged for everything that is needed for this solemn and auspicious hour, and I come bringing all of it with me. We await your command.'

Thus addressed by Kunti's son of great intellect, the son of Ganga opens his eyes and sees all the Bharatas assembled there and standing around him. Taking Yudhishtira's strong hand, Bhishma speaks to him in a voice deep as rumbling clouds. That most eloquent of men, master of words, says, 'Through great good fortune, Kaunteya, have you come here with all your counsellors, O Yudhishtira! The thousand-rayed maker of day, holy Surya, has begun his northward course. I have lain on this bed of mine for eight and fifty nights. Stretched out on these sharp arrows, I have felt that a hundred years have passed. Yudhishtira, the month of Magha has come.

This is, again, the lighted fortnight and by my calculations a fourth part of it should be over.'

Having said this to Yudhishtira, son of Dharma, Ganga's son Bhishma then salutes Dhritarashtra and says to him 'O king, you are well-conversant with dharma. All your doubts, again, relating to the vigyana of artha have been removed. You have waited upon many Brahmanas of great learning. The subtle sciences connected with the Vedas, all the duties of dharma, and all the four Vedas do you know well and thoroughly. And therefore, you should not grieve, O son of Kuru. That which was pre-ordained has come to pass. It could not be otherwise. You have heard the mysteries relating to the Devas from the lips of the island-born Rishi himself. Yudhishtira and his brothers are morally as much your sons as they are the sons of Pandu. Observe the duties of dharma, Dhritarashtra, and do you cherish and protect them. On their part, they are always devoted to the service of their elders.

Yudhishtira Dharmaputra is pure of soul, a true Shuddhatman. He will always prove obedient to you. I know that he is devoted to the virtues of karuna and ahimsa. He is devoted to his elders and preceptors. Alas, your own sons were all of dark and evil hearts. They were wedded to wrath and greed. Overwhelmed by envy, they were all sinners. You must not grieve for them.'

Having said this much to Dhritarashtra of deep wisdom, Bhishma now speaks to Krishna Mahabaho. Bhishma says, 'O Holy One, O God of all gods, O you that are worshipped by all the Devas and Asuras, O you who covered the three worlds with three rides, salutations to you, O wielder of the conch, the discus and the mace! You are Vasudeva, you are the golden-bodied, you are the One Purusha, you are the Creator of the universe, you are of cosmic proportions. You are Jiva. You are Sukshma, the Subtle One. You are the Supreme and eternal Soul.

Do you, O Lotus-eyed One, save me, O Foremost of all beings! Do you, give me leave, Krishna, to depart this world, O you that are Paramananda, the Supreme felicity, O First of all beings. You must always protect the sons of Pandu. You are, indeed, already their sole refuge. Once, I said to the foolish Duryodhana Durbuddhi that there is dharma where Krishna is, and that Jaya is where dharma is. I further counselled him that, relying on Krishna as his refuge, he should make peace with the Pandavas. Indeed, I repeatedly told him, This is the fittest time for you to make peace! The foolish Duryodhana, whose heart was given to darkness and evil did not do my bidding. And having caused a great carnage on earth, at last he himself laid down his own life.

You, O illustrious one, I know to be that ancient and best of Rishis who dwelt for many years in the company of Nara, in Badarikasrama. The Devarishi Narada told me this, as also did Vyasa of austere tapasya. Even they have said to me that Arjuna and you are the ancient Rishis Narayana and Nara born now among men. Do you, O Krishna, grant me leave, for I would now cast off my body. Blessed by you, and through your grace, I shall attain to the highest end!'

Krishna says, 'I give you leave, O Bhishma. Do you, O king, attain once more to the Vasus. O you of great splendour, you have not been guilty of a single transgression in this world. Rajarishi, you always were and still are devoted to your sire Santanu. You are, therefore, like a second Markandeya. It is for that reason that death awaits your pleasure even as your slave.'

When Krishna has said this, Bhishma, son of Ganga, once more addresses the Pandavas led by Dhritarashtra, and his other friends and well-wishers, 'I wish to cast off my prana, my life-breath. You must all give me your leave to do so. You should all strive to attain to Truth. Truth is the highest power. You must always live with Brahmanas of righteous conduct, who are devoted to tapasya, always abstain from any cruelty, and who have their souls under control.'

Having said these words to his friends and having embraced them all, Bhishma once more addresses Yudhishtira, 'O king, let all Brahmanas, especially those that are endowed with wisdom, let them who are preceptors, those who are priests able to assist at sacrifices, be worthy of adoration to you.'"

Vaisampayana said, “Having said this to all the Kurus, Santanu’s son Bhishma falls silent for a time. He then stills and holds his life-breaths, successively, in those parts of his body that are indicated in yoga. The prana of that Mahatman rises up through the chakras of his body, and all the arrows fall out, of themselves, from those parts of the body of Santanu’s son through which the prana rises with yoga, their wounds cleared miraculously, their gaping wounds healing, wound-mouths closing and becoming smooth, one after another. Even in the midst of those Mahatmans, including the great Rishis with Vyasa at their head, the sight is a most uncanny and marvellous one, O king. Within a short time, all of Bhishma’s body is shaftless and woundless. Seeing this miracle, all those great and distinguished men, with Krishna first among them, and all the Munis with Vyasa, are filled with wonder.

Restrained firmly and unable to escape through any of the bodily outlets, Bhishma’s prana, his life, at last pierces the crown of his head like a lustrous comet and flares up and away toward swarga. Batteries of celestial drums resound on high and unearthly flowers of light pour down out of the sky. The Siddhas and divine Rishis, filled with delight, exclaim, ‘Uttamam! Uttamam!’

Truly like some flaming, pulsating star, the prana of Bhishma emerges through the crown of his head, courses up through the firmament and vanishes. Even thus, O great king, does Santanu’s son, that pillar of Bharata’s race, unite himself with eternity.

Then the Mahatman Pandavas and Vidura pile a funeral pyre with a quantity of the most fragrant wood and sprinkle it liberally with diverse kinds of scented oils. Yuyutsu and others stand by as spectators to these preparations. Yudhishtira and Vidura wrap Bhishma's body in a silken cloth and cover it with copious flowers and garlands. Yuyutsu holds a regal chatra over the body, while Bhimasena and Arjuna both hold yak-tails whisks, chamaras of pure white. The two sons of Madri hold two Kshatriya helmets in their hands. Yudhishtira and Dhritarashtra stand at the feet of the departed lord of the Kurus; taking up palmyra fans, they all stand around the body, which now exudes a redolence of heaven, and begin to fan it softly.

The Pitri yagna for Bhishma Mahatman is then duly performed. Many libations are poured upon the sacred fire. The singers of Samans sing many hymns. Finally, covering the body of Ganga's son with sandalwood and black aloe and bark, as well as other aromatic fuel, and touching fire to the pyre, setting it alight, the Kurus with Dhritarashtra and the others, stand on the right side of the blazing thing until it burns down.

Having thus cremated the body of the son of Ganga, those greatest heroes of the Kuru vamsa take themselves to the sacred Bhagirathi, accompanied by the Rishis. They are followed by Vyasa, by Narada, by Asita, by Krishna, by the royal women of the Bharata vamsa, as also by such of the citizens of Hastinapura as have come there. Arrived at the holy river, all of them offer tarpana, oblations of water, to the Mahatman Bhishma, son of the same Ganga.

After the oblations of water have been offered by them to her son, Goddess Bhagirathi rises up from her stream, weeping and distraught. Through her lamentations, she cries to the Kurus, 'You sinless ones, listen to me as I tell you all that transpired with my son. Possessed of regal conduct and disposition, and endowed with wisdom and lofty birth, my son was the benefactor of all the elders of his race. He was devoted to his father and kept the highest vratas. Not even his guru, Jamadagni's son Rama of untold tejas, could vanquish him in battle, not with the greatest, most powerful devastras. Alas, that Kshatriya has been killed by Sikhandi. Oh, you kings, my heart is surely made of adamant, for it does not break even at the vanishment of that son from my sight!

At the swayamvara at Kasi, from a single ratha, he routed all the assembled Kshatriyas of the world and took the three princesses for his step-brother Vichitravirya. There was no one on earth to equal him in might or prowess. Alas, that my heart does not break upon hearing of the slaughter of that son of mine by Sikhandi!’ And she sobs uncontrollably.

Hearing the goddess of the great river lamenting so, Krishna consoles her. Krishna says soothingly, ‘O Susheele, most gentle one, be comforted. Do not yield to grief, O you of incomparable sanctity and beauty. Have no doubt, your son has gone to the highest heavens of grace. He was one of the Mahatejasvin Vasus. Through a curse, O you of unworldly beauty, had he to be born among men. It does not become you to grieve for him.

By Kshatriya dharma, he was cut down by Arjuna on the field of battle, even while he fought. He fell nobly. He was not slain, O devi, by Sikhandi. Why, Indra himself could not kill Bhishma in battle when he stood with his bow in hand. I say to you, Atisundari, your son has gone straight into swarga of every bliss. I tell you all the gods together could not slay Bhishma in battle. Do not, therefore, O Ganga, grieve for that son of the Kuru vamsa. He was one of the Vasus, O devi. Your son has gone to Devaloka, so let the fever of your heart be dispelled.’”

Vaisampayana continued, “Thus spoken to by the divine Krishna, that first among all rivers casts off her grief, O great king, and is restored to equanimity. Having honoured and worshipped the devi Ganga, all the kings there, led by Krishna, seek her leave and then depart from her sacred banks.”

ASWAMEDHIKA PARVA

CANTO 1

AUM. Bowing down to Narayana and Nara, foremost of Purushas, and to Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya!

Vaisampayana said, "King Dhritarashtra offers libations of water, tarpana, to the manes of Bhishma. Mahabaho Yudhishtira, his heart in turmoil and his eyes filled with tears, setting his blind uncle before him, climbs back to the bank of the Ganga, where he sinks to the ground like an elephant shot by a hunter. Bhima comes forward to support his brother, urged on by the Parantapa Krishna, who exclaims, 'This should not be!' The Pandavas, seeing Yudhishtira Dharmaraja distraught and prostrate, sighing again and again, are overwhelmed by grief and sit down around him.

Dhritarashtra, blessed with percipience and the inward vision of wisdom, sorely afflicted by the death of his sons, exhorts Yudhishtira: 'Arise, O tiger among the Kurus, and attend to your kingly duties. By Kshatriya usage, O Kaunteya, you have conquered this Earth. Enjoy her now with your brothers and friends, Naresha. Foremost among the righteous, I do not see why you should grieve. It is Gandhari and I who should mourn, Rajan, having lost a hundred sons like wealth won in a dream.

Through perversity of mind I did not heed Vidura Mahatman's words of deep import, though he sought only our own good, and now I repent. The virtuous Vidura of divine insight had said to me, "Your very vamsa will be annihilated through Duryodhana's iniquities. If you desire the welfare of your lineage, heed my advice, O King. Cast out this evil prince Suyodhana, do not allow either Karna or Sakuni ever to see him, and forbid their gambling, with no further ado. Anoint Yudhishtira as king. He is a man of profound self-restraint and will rule the world with dharma, justly. If you are not prepared to have as king Yudhishtira, son of Kunti, then, Rajan, undertake a yagna. Take charge of the kingdom yourself. Regarding all its creatures with an impartial eye, O Lord of men and advancer of your kindred, let your kinsmen subsist on your bounty."

Fool that I was, Kaunteya, I followed the wicked Duryodhana instead of listening to the far-sighted Vidura. Having turned a deaf ear to the sweet and sage counsel of the serene Vidura, I have brought upon myself this mighty sorrow, and find myself in an ocean of misery: O Rajan, behold your old father and mother sunk in wretchedness. But for your affliction, O master of men, I can find no reason.'" Vaisampayana said, "Hearing the wise words of King Dhritarashtra, the pensive Yudhishtira is comforted.

Krishna counsels him, 'When a man mourns his departed forefathers to excess, he distresses them. Banish your sorrow now and perform many yagnas with generous gifts to the priests. Gratify the Devas with Soma rasa, and the manes of your ancestors with offerings of food and drink, as is their due. Sate your guests with meat and drink, and bestow on the destitute all the gifts they want. A man of your great intelligence should not comport himself in this manner. You know, and have experienced, all that you should; you have done what you needed to do. You have heard about the dharma of the Kshatriya from Bhagirathi's son Bhishma, from Krishna Dwaipayana, from Narada and Vidura. You, of all men, must not cling to the way of fools but, following in the footsteps of your forefathers, shoulder your burden.

It is meet for a Kshatriya to attain Swarga by his own merit. The warriors who have been killed during the war will ever remain in the realms of heaven. Abandon your grief, mighty sovereign, and know that whatever happened was destined exactly as it came to pass. No way can you see again those who were slain in this war.'

The serene Govinda pauses, and Yudhishtira, prince of the righteous, answers him thus: 'O Krishna, full well do I know the love you bear me, for you have always favoured me with affection and friendship. And, O Gadadhara, Chakradharin, Yadava, most glorious one, if you were now readily to give me your leave to retire to the forest to take sannyasa, you would grant my deepest wish. I can find no peace after having killed my Pitamaha and that foremost of men, Karna, who never turned away from a battle. Janardana, allow me to renounce the world, to perform tapasya, so that I may be freed from this heinous sin and my mind may be purified.'

At this, Vyasa tejasvin, knower of the purusharthas and the four asramas of life, attempts to hearten his troubled grandson: 'My child, your mind has not found its calm, and it is puerile sentiment that possesses you yet once more. Why is it, O child, that you scatter our words again and again to the four winds? You know the dharma of the Kshatriya, who lives by war. A king who has followed his svadharma should not allow himself to be overwhelmed by sorrow.

You have faithfully attended the exposition of the entire doctrine of Mukti, and I have often removed your doubts springing from attachment. But it seems you fail to heed what I say, or some obduracy of understanding makes you forget it clean. It should not be so; such ignorance is not worthy of you. Sinless one, you know of many ways of expiation for violence and sin, and you have been instructed exhaustively in the dharma of kings and the punya of giving daana. Bhaarata, when you know all this, and the Agama scriptures as well, how can you let yourself be swayed by sorrow, as though you were benighted?'"

"Vyasa goes on to say, 'Yudhishtira, it seems to me that you are deficient in wisdom. No man does anything through his own power; it is God who causes him to engage in deeds, good or bad. Where, then, is there room for self-reproach? Yet you judge yourself as a sinner. So, Bhaarata, listen to how you can atone for your transgressions. Those who sin can always purify themselves through penance, sacrifice and charity. Evil-doers, O Rajan, Narottama, are cleansed by yagna, tapasya and daana. The Devas and Asuras undertook sacrifices to secure punya; yagnas are of supreme importance. Through great yagnas alone have the Devas waxed powerful, and it is through those performances that they vanquished the Danavas.

Now, O Yudhishtira, prepare to perform the Rajasuya as well as the Sarvamedha and the Naramedha yagnas. Then must you, like Dasaratha's son Rama, and Dushyanta and that puissant Lord of the Earth, Sakuntala's son Bharata, your ancestor, conduct the Aswamedha yagna consummately, as ordained, with munificent dakshinas.'

Yudhishtira replies, 'Beyond doubt, the Aswamedha purifies Kshatriyas. But I have a limitation, to which you must attend. Having caused this vast carnage of kindred, Dvijottama, I cannot dispense daana on even a small scale, as I have no wealth to give. Nor can I solicit any from the survivors of the Great War, the young sons of kings, whose wounds are still raw, and who are suffering untold sorrow from their own bereavements and deprivation. Having destroyed the world as we knew it, how can I, stricken as I am myself, O Mahamuni, seek tribute now from these young ones to perform so immense a sacrifice?

For Duryodhana's sins, the kings of the Earth have all been killed, and we have reaped ignominy. For the sake of kingdom and wealth, Duryodhana laid waste this very Bhumi, and the coffers of Dhritarashtra's evil son are empty. The Earth is the dakshina, the gift made to the Brahmanas; this is the first and cardinal law laid down for the horse sacrifice. The learned accept that, under certain circumstances, this law may be set aside and some other dakshina take the place of the Earth—but, my lord, I do not even remotely possess wealth which could be given in her place. Can you, Pitamaha, counsel me in this quandary?'

Krishna Dwaipayana reflects silently for a while, then says to the Dharmaraja, 'The exhausted Kuru treasury shall again be filled, O son of Pritha. Upon Himavat mountain is hidden gold and treasure left by the Brahmanas who performed the Aswamedha yagna of the Rajarishi Marutta.'

Yudhishtira asks, 'How was all that gold amassed for Marutta's yagna? When was he king?' Vyasa replies, 'Prithaputra, if you are anxious to hear about that ancient king of the Karandhama vamsa, listen to me and I will tell you about the reign of that Rajadhiraja of immeasurable majesty and wealth.'"

CANTO 4

"Yudhishtira says, 'Righteous one, I want to hear the tale of Rajarishi Marutta. O Dwaipayana, sinless Muni, tell it to me.'

Vyasa says, 'In the Krita Yuga, O child, Manu was Lord of the Earth and wielded the sceptre over all the world. His son was Prasandhi. Prasandhi had a son named Kshupa, whose son was Ikshwaku, that Lord of men. King Ikshwaku had a hundred sons endowed with pre-eminent piety, O Rajan, and made all of them kings.

The eldest of them, Vinsa, was the model for all bowmen. Vinsa's son was the auspicious Vivinsa. Vivinsa had fifteen sons, mighty archers, reverential to Brahmanas, truthful, gentle and well-spoken. The eldest of them, Khaninetra, oppressed his brothers; but, having conquered the entire kingdom hitherto devoid of all troubles, Khaninetra could not retain his sovereignty, nor were the people pleased with him. They dethroned him, and were happy to make his son Survacha king in his stead.

Survacha, noting the lapses of his father, and their outcome, worked zealously for the welfare of his people. Ever devoted to Brahmanas, he restrained his passions and his very thoughts, always spoke the truth and was the purest of men. His subjects were well pleased with that Mahatman, constant in virtue. However, with his ceaseless service and generosity, his treasury came to be greatly depleted. The feudal princes who swarmed around him banded together and turned on their king. Besieged by many foes, and with his resources diminished, Survacha, his retainers and the people in his capital suffered great tribulation. Yet, though his strength had dwindled much, his enemies could not kill the king, O Yudhishtira, for his power was founded in dharma.

When he and his people had reached the extreme depths of misery, he blew a breath onto his palm, and from it there issued a great supernatural army, with which he vanquished in a day all the surrounding kings on the borders of his land. For that, O Rajan, he was celebrated with the title of Karandhama.

Karandhama's son Avikshita, born at the beginning of the Treta Yuga, was the equal of Indra himself, blessed with grace and invincible even against the immortals. He subdued all the other kings of the world and, by virtue of his wealth and prowess, became their emperor. He was indeed like Indra himself in valour and majesty. He performed great yagnas past counting, and took delight in dharma, holding his senses and passions in firm check. In tejas he resembled the Sun and in forbearance the Earth herself; in intelligence, he was like Brihaspati, and in calmness, like the mountain Himavat.

Avikshita's deeds, his speech, his patience and fortitude brought great joy to the hearts of his subjects. He performed hundreds of Aswamedha yagnas, and the potent and learned Angira himself served as his priest. Avikshita's son Marutta surpassed even his father in his great and lordly gunas, in dharma and renown, and possessed the strength of ten thousand elephants. He was like another Vishnu in the world.

Seeking to perform yet another great sacrifice, that virtuous king once came to Mount Meru, north of Himavat. Upon the immense golden mountain Marutta meant to undertake his sacrificial rites. He had splendid golden vessels forged by the greatest smiths in the land, who wrought sacred vessels, thrones and other marvellous artifacts without number. He caused the yagnasala to be marked and consecrated. And there, indeed, did that righteous Lord of Earth Marutta undertake his sacrifice.'"

CANTO 5

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Most eloquent one, how did King Marutta become so powerful? And how, O Dvija, did he come by so much gold? Where now, O revered grandsire, is all his wealth? And how, Muni, can we secure that treasure?'

Vyasa answers, 'As the children of Prajapati Daksha, the Asuras and the Devas, constantly challenged each other, so did Angira's sons, Brihaspati and the Rishi Samvarta, of tremendous and equal tejas and vratas. Brihaspati harassed his brother until Samvarta could no longer bear his provocations. He renounced everything and went away into the forest with nothing to cover his body, O Bhaarata, save the sky.

Indra, having vanquished and destroyed the Asuras and wrested sovereignty over the celestial realm, appointed as his priest Angira's eldest son Brihaspati, best of Brahmanas, who had once been the Kulaguru, the family-priest, of King Karandhama. Matchless among men in might, prowess and character, powerful like Satakratu himself, of immaculate rectitude and stern vows, Karandhama had countless vahanas and warriors, many followers, rich and superb palaces with magnificent thrones and beds, and every other manner of opulence, all created from dhyana and the breath from his lips. Through his inherent virtues and might, he had brought every other king under his sway.

Then, having lived as long as he pleased and having enjoyed a surfeit of all that he desired, Karandhama rose bodily into Swargaloka. His son Avikshita, conqueror of his enemies, righteous as Yayati, brought all the Earth under his dominion; in both merit and might, he resembled his father.

Avikshita’s son Marutta, of tremendous tejas, was like another Indra. The sea-clad Bhumi Devi felt herself irresistibly drawn towards him. Marutta was always wont to defy Indra, and the king of the Devas, too, had no love for that godlike Kshatriya. But Marutta, master of the Earth, was pure and possessed of perfection and, despite all Indra’s efforts, he could not prevail over the king.

Riding his Amrita-born steed, Indra came with the Devas to Brihaspati and said, “O Guru, if you want to please me, do not be Marutta’s Ritvija for any yagna he performs, either for the Devas or the Pitrs. I am sovereign of the three worlds, while proud Marutta is only king of the Earth. Brahmana, having been priest of the immortal Lord of the celestials, will you now be the priest of a mere mortal king? Either embrace my cause, or Marutta’s. Abandon his service, be always only at mine, and do so gladly.”

Brihaspati reflected on this for a moment, then replied to Devendra, “You are the Lord of the Devas, indeed, of all creatures. In you the worlds are established. You destroyed Namuchi, Viswarupa and Bala. You alone encompass the highest weal of all the divine ones; you, O Indra, sustain both Swarga and Bhumi. Best of gods, scourge of Paka, how indeed, having served as your priest, can I serve a mortal king? Hear my pledge: even if Agni were to cease giving heat and warmth, even if Bhumi Devi were to change her nature or Surya Deva cease to give light, I will never break this my solemn pledge to you.”

At this Indra was rid of the raging envy he felt towards Marutta and, praising his guru Brihaspati, returned to his own abode.’”

CANTO 6

"Vyasa says, 'The ancient legend of Brihaspati and the wise Marutta is told in this connection. Hearing of the pact made by Angira's son Brihaspati with Indra, King Marutta made the necessary preparations for a great sacrifice. His mind set on the mahayagna, the eloquent grandson of Karandhama went to Brihaspati and said, "Mahamuni, I have decided to undertake the Aswamedha yagna, in accordance with your directive, as you had once proposed to me, and I want you to be my chief Ritvija. I have assembled everything needed for the yagna. Most exalted one, you are our Kulaguru, so take all these sacrificial components and perform the yagna."

Brihaspati said, "Lord of the Earth, I do not want to perform your sacrifice. Indra has made me his priest, and from now on I will perform sacrifices only for him." Marutta said, "You are our hereditary family priest, whom I hold in great esteem, and I have the right to your help with my yagnas. It is meet that you be the chief priest for this sacrifice as well."

Brihaspati said, "O Marutta, I have now become priest to the Immortals; how can I perform a yagna for a mere mortal? Go or stay, as you please; from now on I will be Indra's Ritvija alone, Mahabaho, and yours nevermore. You are free to choose any other priest to preside over your yagna."'

Vyasa says, 'Marutta was perplexed and humiliated. As he journeyed homeward, burdened by anxiety, he met the wandering Devarishi Narada and stood before him, his hands folded in greeting. Narada said, "Rajarishi, you seem distraught. Is all well with you? Where have you been, sinless one, and what disquiets you so? If you care to, tell me the cause of your distress, O best of kings, and I will bend every effort to help you." Marutta told Mahamuni Narada about how his Kulaguru had rebuffed him. "Wanting a Ritvik for my yagna, I went to Angira's son, Devaguru Brihaspati, but he spurned my offer. O Narada, I have no wish to live any longer after his rebuff. I am contaminated by the sin of failing to perform the yagna I was pledged to undertake."

Narada then spoke to the son of Avikshita, words which brought hope and life back to the king's heart. "Another powerful son of Angira, Samvarta, wanders naked and sorrowing across the earth, astonishing everyone by his condition. Go to him, O Kshatriya. If Brihaspati does not want to officiate at your yagna, the mighty Samvarta, if he is pleased with you, will do so." Marutta said, "You have breathed new life into me! Most eloquent Narada, tell me where I can find Samvarta, tell me how I can serve and please him, for if he also were to refuse me, I surely would not want to live."

Narada said, "Samvarta roams the city of Varanasi at his whim, in the garb of a madman, searching for a sight of the Mahadeva Siva. Go to Kasi and, when you reach the gates of the city, set a dead body there. The man who turns away on seeing the corpse, know him to be Samvarta. Once you recognize him, Marutta, follow him wherever that man of power goes until you come to a secluded place, where you must prostrate yourself at his feet in supplication. If Samvarta demands to know who told you about him, tell him it was I, Narada. If he then asks you to follow me, tell him without hesitation that I have entered into a sacred fire and turned myself to ashes."

Ready to follow Narada's advice, Marutta made his reverences to the Devarishi and repaired to the city of Varanasi. The great king did exactly as the sage had instructed him. No sooner had he placed a corpse at the gates of the city, than Samvarta appeared there and, on seeing the dead body, abruptly turned and walked away. With folded hands, Marutta followed him, begging to be received as his sishya.

They came to a lonely place, where the Rishi covered the king with mud and ashes, phlegm and spittle, and strode off again. Marutta, harried and oppressed by the Brahmana, still followed him, all the while trying with folded hands to placate him. At length, exhausted, Samvarta came to a sacred nyagrodha tree, and sat down to rest under its dense canopy.'

'Samvarta demanded, "How have you come to know me? Who told you about me? Tell me truly, if you wish your own good. If you tell me the truth you will have what you desire, but if you tell me a lie your head will burst into a hundred pieces."

Marutta said, "Narada, wandering on his way, told me that you are the son of my Kulaguru Angira, and this information drew me gladly towards you." Samvarta said, "You speak the truth. Narada knows me to be a performer of sacrifices. Now tell me where he is." Marutta said, "That prince among Devarishis shared this intelligence with me, commended me to your care, and then entered a sacred fire."

Hearing this, Samvarta was gratified and said, "Indeed, I can do what you want from me." Then, O Kshatriya, raving at the king like one deranged, abusing him wildly, Samvarta said to Marutta, "I am disordered in my mind and given to random caprice. Why are you bent upon performing this sacrifice with a priest of such a disposition? My brother is more than able to undertake the greatest yagna. Why, he performs Indra's own yagnas. Ask him to conduct your sacrifice. My elder brother took from me all my possessions, material and spiritual, as well as all the yajamans on whose behalf I once undertook yagnas, leaving me with just this naked body of mine. Yet, O son of Avikshita, he is worthy of my reverence, and I cannot conduct your sacrifice without his leave. So go first to Brihaspati and obtain his permission. Only if he agrees can I perform your yagna for you."

Marutta said, "Hear me, O Samvarta, I did first go to Brihaspati but, wanting Indra's patronage, he refused to have me as his yajaman. He said,

‘I have secured the priesthood of the Immortals, and have no wish to exert myself on behalf of any mortal man. Also, Indra has forbidden me to officiate at your sacrifice, saying that since you became Lord of the Earth, you are driven by a desire to compete with him.’ Your brother assented to what Indra asked of him, saying ‘Tathaastu’. So, best of Rishis, your brother now has Indra’s patronage and protection. Although I went to him with a fervent heart, he turned me away. I now mean to expend all my resources to have you perform this yagna for me and, by your good offices, to outstrip Vasava in every way. Since Brihaspati rejected me for no fault of mine, I have no wish to seek his aid.”

Samvarta said, “I can surely accomplish what you want, O King, but only if you agree to do whatever I ask of you. I fear that when Brihaspati and Indra learn that I am helping you, as they surely will, they will be enraged and do everything in their power to injure you. Therefore, assure me of your loyalty and fortitude, so that I might be calm and constant. For if you anger me, I will reduce you and your vamsa to ashes.”

Marutta said, “If I forsake you, may I never attain the blessed regions as long as the mountains stand, and the thousand-rayed sun continues to shed light and heat on the world. If I betray you, may I never attain true wisdom, and remain forever addicted to mundane pursuits.”

Samvarta said, “O son of Avikshita, your determination to perform this yagna is praiseworthy, as is my ability to conduct the sacrifice. I say to you, O King, upon its completion you will gain imperishable punya, and rule over Indra and his Devas, and the Gandharvas as well. For myself, I have no wish for any wealth or sacrificial gifts. I want only to be revenged upon Indra and my brother. I will satisfy your wishes and make you Indra’s equal.”’

CANTO 8

'Samvarta said, "There is a forested peak called Munjavana, high among the Himalayan pinnacles, where the divine Lord of Uma is engaged in austere tapasya. There puissant Mahadeva, with Uma at his side, armed with his trisula and surrounded by Sivaganas, his attendant goblins, dwells in the shade of giant forest trees, or in caves, or roams the rugged fastnesses of the great mountain, as he pleases.

There the Rudras, the Sadhyas, the Viswadevas, the Vasus, Yama, Varuna, Kubera with all his attendants, the two Aswins, the Gandharvas, the Apsaras, the Yakshas, as well as the Devarishis, the Adityas of the Sun, the Maruts who rule the winds, and all manner of untamed and feral spirits, Bhutas and Pretas, worship Siva Mahatman of diverse gunas. And there, O King, the most exalted Lord sports with the wild and playful followers of Kubera, the Yakshas and Guhyakas of weird and ghoulish appearance.

Lit by its own splendour, that mountain is as bright as the morning sun. No being with natural eyes can ever discern its shape or form. Neither heat nor cold prevails there. The sun does not shine on that peak, nor do the winds blow there. Neither age nor hunger, nor thirst, nor death, nor fear can afflict anyone in that hermetic place. Parantapa, on all sides of that mountain are rich mines of gold, splendid as the rays of the sun. The legions of Kubera, the Lord of Treasures, guard these with arms raised aloft.

Marutta, take yourself to that place and worship that greatest of gods who is called Sarva, Bedha, Rudra, Sitikantha, Surapa, Suvarcha, Kapardi, Karala, Haryaksha, Varada, Tryaksha, Pushnodantabhid, Vamana, Siva, Yamya, Avyaktarupa, Sadvritta, Sankara, Kshemya, Harikesa, Sthanu, Purusha, Harinetra, Munda, Krishna, Uttarana, Bhaskara, Sutirtha, Devadeva, Ranha, Ushnishi, Suvaktra, Sahasraksha, Midhvan, Girisa, Prasanta, Yata, Chiravasa, Bilwadanda, Siddha, Sarvadandadhara, Mriga, Vyadha, Mahan, Dhanesa, Bhava, Vara, Somavaktra, Siddhamantra, Chakshu, Hiranyabahu, Ugra, Dikpati, Lelihana, Goshtha, Vrishnu, Pasupati, Bhutapati, Vrisha, Matribhakta, Senani, Madhyama, Sruvahasta, Yati, Dhanwi, Bhargava, Aja, Krishnanetra, Virupaksha, Tikshnadamshtra, Tikshna, Vaiswanaramukha, Mahadyuti, Anangha, Sarva, Vilohita, Dipta, Diptaksha, Mahauja, Vasuretas, Suvapu, Prithu, Kritivasa, Kapalmali, Suvarnamukuta, Mahadeva, Tryambaka, Krodhana, Nrisansa, Mridu, Bahusali, Dandi, Taptatapa, Akrurakarma, Sahasrasira, Sahasracharana, Swadhaswarupa, Bahurupa, Damshtri, Pinaki, Mahayogi, Avyaya, Trisulahasta, Bhuvaneswara, Tripuraghna, Trinayana, Trilokesa, Mahanja, Sarvabhutaprabhava, Sarvabhutadharana, Dharanidhara, Isana, Visveswara, Umapati, Pasupati, Viswarupa, Maheswara, Virupaksha, Dasabhuja, Vrishavadhwaja, Ugra, Sthanu, Rudra, Iswara, Sitakantha, Aja, Sukra, Prithu, Prithuhara, Vara, Viswarupa, Bahurupa, Umapati, Anangangahara, Hara, Saranya, Chaturmukha.

Bowing down to that God of gods, you must entreat his protection and favour. And thus, Kshatriya, surrendering yourself to Mahadeva of infinite tejas, you will acquire that gold, for the man who goes there and worships him will indeed obtain that most precious treasure.”

Marutta, the grandson of Karandhama, did as he was instructed and, going to Munjavana, received from the Lord a vast store of treasure. He then prepared to perform his mahayagna, and the arrangements he made for it exceeded human capacity. The gold of Kubera was fashioned by artisans into sacrificial urns and other vessels for the sacrifice.

Hearing of Marutta’s prosperity, which eclipsed that of the gods, Brihaspati was stricken; he was beside himself with envy and distress at the thought that his brother and rival should prosper thus. Sick at heart, he grew lean and wasted and his face lost its lustre. When Indra learnt that Brihaspati was sorely afflicted, the Lord of the Devas went to him with all the Immortals.’

CANTO 9

'Indra asked him, "Do you sleep in peace, Brihaspati, and are your servants agreeable to you? Do you seek the welfare of the gods, O Brahmana, and do the gods protect you?" Brihaspati said, "I do sleep in peace in my bed, O Devendra, and my servants are to my liking. I seek the welfare of the gods, and they cherish me." Indra said, "Why then are you so pale and strained, and whence this anguish of body or mind? Tell me, Brahmana, who they are that have caused you pain, that I might exterminate them all!"

Brihaspati said, "O Indra, I have heard that Marutta will perform a splendid mahayagna at which he will give exquisite gifts, and that Samvarta will be the chief priest. I do not want him to officiate at the king's sacrifice." Indra replied, "Brahmana, knower of all sacred mantras, you attained everything that you could have desired when you became the Ritvija of the Devas, and you have passed beyond the influence of age and death. What can Samvarta do to you now?"

Brihaspati said, "Prosperity in a rival is always painful to one's feelings. It is for this very reason that you, too, with your attendant Devas persecute the Asuras, with their kith and kin, and kill the most prosperous among them. I am pale and distraught, Lord of the gods, because my rival prospers. O Indra, do everything in your power to stop the yagna of Marutta and Samvarta."

Turning to Agni, Indra said, "Jataveda, go to Marutta, taking Brihaspati with you, and say to that king that this guru will conduct his sacrifice and make him immortal." Agni said, "Tathaastu, so be it!" and went forth on his errand, taking Brihaspati with him. The Fire God of high soul flew like a flaming wind at the end of winter, consuming forests and trees on his way, roaring and spinning at will.

Marutta said, “Behold, today I find Agni come in his own embodiment! O Muni, offer him an asana and padya, and a cow, and water to wash his feet.” Agni said, “I accept your offerings. Sinless one, know that I have come to you as Indra’s messenger.” Marutta said, “Divine Agni, is the glorious Lord of the Devas happy, and is he pleased with us, and are the other gods loyal to him? Tell me all.”

Agni said, “Bhumipala, Sakra is perfectly happy, he is pleased with you and all the other gods are indeed loyal to him. O King, listen to the message I bring from the Lord Indra. He wishes to deliver you from age, O Marutta, and has sent me here with Brihaspati, so that the high priest of the gods may conduct your great sacrifice for you, a mortal, and thereby make you immortal.”

Marutta said, “I submit to Brihaspati that, having been priest to Mahendra himself, it does not look well for him now to act as a priest for mortal men. The twice-born Brahmana Samvarta will conduct my sacrifice.”

Agni said, “If Brihaspati officiates as your priest, you will have the blessings of the Devaraja and attain the highest realm in Swarga from the great fame that will accrue to you. You will conquer all the kingdoms and lands of men, the realms on high, the loftiest domains created by Prajapati, even the entire kingdom of the gods.” Samvarta broke in furiously, “Never again dare to bring Brihaspati to Marutta; for know, O Pavaka, if you do, I will consume you with one look from my furious and fiery eyes.”

Terrified by Samvarta’s threat and trembling like the leaves of the aswattha tree, Agni returned to the gods. Seeing the conveyor of oblations return to him with Brihaspati, Indra said, “O Jataveda, did you take Brihaspati to Marutta as I told you to? What did that sacrificing king say to you? Did he agree to what I asked?” Agni said, “Marutta did not accept your offer, urged on him by me and, clasping Brihaspati’s hands, asserted repeatedly that Samvarta would act as his priest. He also said that he did not aspire to attain Bhumi, Swarga or even Brahmaloka, and that he would accept your offer if he were ever so minded.”

Indra said, “Go back to that king and tell him that if he does not do as I say, I will cast my Vajra thunderbolt down on him.” Agni said, “Let the king of the Gandharvas go as your messenger, O Vasava, for I am afraid to go there myself. Know that the highly incensed Samvarta of great tapasya said to me in anger, 'If you come here again to offer Brihaspati's services to Marutta, I will consume you with a malevolent look from my fierce eyes.'"

Indra said, "Jataveda, it is you who burn all other things; none can reduce you to ashes. All the world is afraid of your burning touch, O conveyor of oblations, so these timorous words of yours deserve no credence." Agni said, "O Sakra, by the might of your arms you conquered Swarga, Bhumi and Akasa, yet Vritra once surely wrested the sovereignty of Devaloka from you."

Indra said, "I can reduce my foes to submission and a mountain to an atom, if I will it. But, O Vahni, as I do not accept the libation of Soma if offered by an enemy, and as I do not strike the weak with my thunderbolt, Vritra seemed to triumph over me for a time. But who among mortals can live in peace, if he incurs my wrath? I have banished the Kalakeyas down to Bhumi, expelled the Danavas from Swarga, and cast even Prahlada out of Devaloka. Which mortal man can live in peace if he provokes my enmity?"

Agni said, "Mahendra, do you remember that in olden times, when the Rishi Chyavana conducted the sacrifice for Saryati with the Aswin twins and kept the Soma for himself, you were incensed and indeed raised your hand to cast your Vajra at the sage? But that Brahmana, with the power of his tapasya, seized your very hand, the thunderbolt in it, and held you helpless, O Purandara. In his rage, he created the dreadful shape-changing Asura Mada—whose lower jaw rested on the earth while the upper one yawned into the sky, whose countless teeth were more than a hundred yojanas long, with four main fangs like unimaginable silver columns, two hundred yojanas each—that Demon whose visage struck fear into your heart.

Gnashing his fangs, Mada pursued you with his terrible pike uplifted to kill you and you, Indra, trembled before him, making a pitiful spectacle of yourself, O slayer of Danavas. Overcome with fear, you folded your shaking hands in supplication to Chyavana Muni and implored his protection. The might of Brahmanas, Sakra, is greater than that of Kshatriyas. None are more powerful than great Brahmanas and, knowing well their awesome force, I have no wish to incur the wrath of Samvarta."'

'Indra said, "Even so is it. The might of Brahmanas is great, and there are none more powerful; but I cannot with equanimity bear the insolent pride of Avikshita's son, and I will strike him with my thunderbolt. Therefore, O Dhritarashtra, Lord of Gandharvas, take yourself to Marutta's court, where Samvarta attends on him, and give him this message from me: 'Kshatriya, take Brihaspati for your priest, else I will consume you with my Vajra!'"

The Gandharva went to Marutta's royal sabha, and delivered Indra's message: "Lord of men, I am the Gandharva Dhritarashtra and I bring you this message from Devendra. Rajasimha, lion among kings, the Lord of the Devas, of fathomless accomplishments, has just this to say to you: 'Take Brihaspati to be your priest for your sacrifice, else I will hurl my Vajra down on you, and you will die.'"

Marutta said, "O Purandara, O Viswadevas, O Vasus and you Aswins, all know that in this world there is no escaping the consequences of betraying a friend; it is a sin as great as Brahmahatya, slaying a Brahmana. So let Brihaspati be your priest, O Vasava Vajradharin, and Samvarta will conduct my yagna, for Indra's message does not commend itself to me, and his threat does not affright me." The Gandharva said, "O Kshatriyasimha, listen to Indra's dreadful thunder in the sky. Be certain that he will indeed hurl his thunderbolt at you. Think of your own good, for it is time."

Hearing Indra's fury roaring as if to split the sky into shards, Marutta said to Samvarta, that best of all men of dharma, absorbed in tapasya, "The thunderhead rages above, and wrathful Indra is near for certain. O prince among Brahmanas, I seek sanctuary in you; pluck this fear from my heart. See where the Vajradharin descends on me, lighting up the ten cardinal points of the sky with his terrifying, superhuman effulgence. All who were to assist me during the yagna are also panic-stricken."

Samvarta said, "Lion among kings, I will remove your anxiety and pain with my mantras. Be calm and have no fear, for the weapons of all the gods, including that of Indra of a thousand sacrifices, will prove impotent against my mystic powers. Let Indra's lightning gash the sky and his clouds pour down their cataracts, let thunder boom and winds howl through forests and upon mountains; let Sakra blast his thunderbolt where he will; you have nothing to fear, for Agni, Vahni Deva, will protect you in every way, and you shall have all your desires fulfilled."

Marutta said, "Ah, Brahmana, my heart quails to hear the squalling tempest and terrifying crashes of thunder. My serenity has quite deserted me!" Samvarta said, "O King, your fear of the Vajra will soon leave you. I will summon great winds of my own to scatter the black-massed thunderclouds. Cast off your fear and ask me for any boon, and I will grant you whatever your heart desires."

Marutta said, "O Brahmana, what I wish is for Indra himself to appear at my yagna and accept the oblations offered him, and for all the other gods also to come and take their shares of the havis and drink the Soma rasa." Samvarta said, "I have summoned Indra with my mantras. Look, O King, where he hastens to your yagna, in his chariot drawn by supernal steeds, attended by all the other gods."

And indeed the Lord of the Devas, accompanied by the other elemental gods, approached the sacrificial altar of the son of Avikshita to drink the Soma rasa of that unrivalled monarch. King Marutta with his priest rose to receive Indra with the host of gods and, well pleased, welcomed the Lord of the Devas with all due and high worship, as laid down in the Shastras.

Samvarta said, "Welcome, O Indra, All-knowing, your presence here sanctifies this sacrifice and makes it truly a Mahayagna. O slayer of Bala and Vritra, drink once again the Soma rasa I have prepared today." Marutta said, "I bow to you O Lord of the gods, look kindly upon me, for your coming here has rendered my yagna complete, and blessed my whole life. Brihaspati's younger brother, this most excellent Brahmana, now conducts my sacrifices for me, O Surendra."

Indra said, “I know your Ritvija, Mahamuni Samvarta, Brihaspati’s younger brother and great tejasvin; indeed I have come here at his invitation. Rajan, I am well-pleased with you, and my resentment against you has vanished.” Samvarta said, “If you are pleased with us, O Devendra, direct this yagna yourself, and ordain the sacrificial portions for the Devas, so that the world knows you have done this.”

Thus petitioned by the son of Angira, Sakra himself gave directions to all the gods to create the yagnashala, raise a thousand richly appointed apartments, magnificent as in a picture, and swiftly complete a massive and durable staircase for the ascent of the Gandharvas and the Apsaras, as well as a dance arena for the Apsaras which he told them to make as wondrous as his own celestial palace in Amaravati.

Rajan, the Swargavasis fulfilled his directions in next to no time. Indra, well-pleased and adored at the great yagna of Marutta, said to him, “O Kshatriya, your Pitrs and all the Devas are gratified with your sacrifice, and have accepted your oblations joyfully. Now let the best of all Brahmanas sacrifice a red bull to Agni upon his vedi, and a sacred and consecrated blue bull of variegated hues to the Viswadevas.”

With that, the majesty and splendour of the yagna swelled in tide, that greatest of sacrifices where the gods took their offerings in person, and Sakra, their Lord, master of celestial steeds, Vasava, whom Brahmanas worship, himself assisted at the ceremonies. Now Samvarta Mahatman, effulgent as another Agni, ascended the altar, sonorously hymned the gods and poured libations of ghrita into the blazing sacred fire, to the accompaniment of holy mantras.

First of all, Indra drank the precious Soma rasa, and then the other Devas partook of the ambrosia. Then joyously, with the king’s leave, they returned to their heavenly realm satisfied—indeed, delighted. Marutta, Parantapa, his heart full, freely set hillocks of gold in diverse places for his people, and gave even more bountiful riches away to the Brahmanas. The king in his glory was as resplendent as Kubera, Lord of Treasures. His heart soaring, Marutta filled his capacious coffers with all kinds of wealth and, taking reverent leave of his spiritual preceptor Samvarta, returned to rule his realm, extending to the shores of the sea.

Great Marutta was, in his age, the very embodiment of dharma on earth, and incalculable was the treasure that he garnered during his great sacrifice. Yudhishtira, it is now time for you to seek out and retrieve his vast store and to worship the gods with it, Dharmaraja, by performing an Aswamedha yagna.'

Exhilarated by the words of his grandsire Vyasa, son of Satyavati, Yudhishtira sets his heart on a majestic and peerless horse sacrifice, and to that end holds regular counsel with his brothers, priest and ministers."

CANTO 11

Vaisampayana said, "When Vyasa finishes speaking to Yudhishtira, the almighty Krishna, light of the Kurus, also addresses Pritha's son, racked by the carnage of the Great War, by the loss of kinsmen and friends beyond count, his face dark with grief like the sun in eclipse, or fire shrouded by smoke.

Krishna says, 'The path of sin leads inexorably to doom and bondage, and the way of dharma to Brahman and Mukti. If you understand that this is the essence of all knowledge and wisdom, how can you let yourself be overwhelmed by anguish? Your karma is not yet exhausted, nor have all your enemies perished, for you do not know those that lurk within your own body.

Let me tell you, as I have heard and understood it, the tale of the war between Indra and Vritra. Once, Vritrasura seized the entire Earth, and from the sacred and fragrant Bhumi there arose the most repulsive stench on every side, befouling the pristine element. Since smell belongs to the Mahabhuta Earth, Indra of the hundred sacrifices was enraged and hurled his thunderbolt down at Vritra. In a flash the Asura plunged into the Ocean and corrupted that precious domain too. Taste was lost, and the very seas were no longer aqueous. Indra struck Vritrasura once more with his Vajra. This time the demon entered into the realm of Light, Jyoti, extinguishing its inherent property, Sight. Once again Indra struck Vritra with his great thunderbolt, and the Asura this time entered into Vayu, Air, making away with its inherent property, Touch. Yet again Indra cast his Vajra at Vritra and the demon entered into Akasa, the ethereal element, and spirited away its guna, primeval Sound.

Indra cast his final thunderbolt upon the Asura. This time Vritra entered into Indra's very body and, violating it, appropriated every transcendent attribute of that divine form. Indra was plunged thereby into sinister darkness, profound delusion, great Maya, O best of the Bharatas. It was Mahamuni Vasishta who comforted the Lord of the Devas and lit the lamp of his wisdom again, dispelling the solid night into which the Asura had locked him. Regaining himself, Indra now killed Vritrasura with a most subtle, intangible Vajra, neither solid nor liquid but made of foam.

Pandava, it was Sukracharya himself who related this Itihasa of deep mystery to the greatest sages, and they in turn told it to me.'"

CANTO 12

"Krishna says, 'There are two kinds of ailments, the physical and the mental, produced by the mutual action of the body and the mind, and they never arise without this interaction. Vata, pitta and kapha, the cold, the warm and the windy humours, Yudhishtira, are the essential transformations generated in the physical body. When these humours are equal and harmonious, present in due proportion, they ensure good health, for the warm humour is balanced by the cold one, the cold by the warm, and both by the one of wind.

Sattva, Rajas and Tamas are the attributes of the soul, and the sages say that their presence in due proportion creates a healthy mind. But if any one of the three dominates, the Munis enjoin some remedy to restore equilibrium. Happiness is overcome by sorrow, and sorrow by pleasure. Some people, when afflicted by sorrow, wish to recall past happiness, while others, while enjoying happiness, remember past sorrow. But you, Kaunteya, neither recall your sorrows nor your happiness; why else would you indulge in this empty delusion of grief? Perhaps it is your innate nature, which overpowers you just now, O Pandava.

Think not of the painful sight of Krishnaa, in her period, standing in the Kuru sabha wearing a single cloth to cover her body, while all you five brothers were in that court. It is not fitting for you to recall your leaving Hastinapura like beggars; or your exile, during which you covered yourselves with antelope hide and wandered in the wilderness; or how Jatasura set upon you, the battle with Chitrasena, and what the Saindhavas did when their king forcibly hauled Panchali away in his chariot.

Nor it is proper, Yudhishtira Parantapa, for you to recall how Kichaka kicked Draupadi in Virata's court, during your ajnatavasa, or the battle you fought against Bhishma and Drona. No, none of these: for now the time has come when you must fight the battle that each one must fight alone, against his own mind. Prepare now for that last war, and through dhyana and the punya of your own karma, conquer that inscrutable and most powerful of all enemies.

You will have no use during this war for weapons, for allies or attendants. The time has come for the implacably sole battle, the one against yourself. If you lose this, you will find yourself in the most wretched plight, son of Kunti; while, know this beyond doubt, if you use your wisdom to conquer your enemy, you will attain success and the highest felicity and then, knowing the destiny of all creatures and following the ways of your sires, rule your vast kingdom with dharma.'"

"Krishna says, 'O Bhaarata, salvation is not attained by renouncing things external, be it even a kingdom, but by relinquishing what panders to the flesh. The virtue and felicity that come to a person who has abandoned the outer world but is still in the clutches of passion—let those belong to our enemies! The twin-syllabled Mrityu is the death of the soul, while the three-syllabled Saswatam is the eternal spirit, the very Brahman. The consciousness that this or that thing is mine, or the condition of being addicted to worldly objects, is Mrityu, and the absence of that apperception is Saswatam. These two, Brahman and Mrityu, have their seats in the hearts of all creatures, O King, and wage war with each other, remaining unseen.

If it be true that no creature is ever destroyed, then one does not make oneself guilty of the death of any creature by destroying its body. How does the world affect a man if, having acquired sovereignty over the very Earth with all its mobile and immobile creations, he does not become attached to it or engrossed in its enjoyment? But the man who renounces the world, takes to the life of a vanaprastha, living on wild roots and plants, but still craves the things of the world, remains addicted to them in his heart—why, he bears Mrityu in his mouth.

Yudhishtira, watch and observe the illusory character of your external and internal enemies, through the optic of discernment, for he who is able to perceive the nature of eternal reality is beyond the influence of the great fear of death. Men do not admire the conduct of those absorbed in worldly desires, and there is no action without a desire at its root. All desires are creations of the mind. Knowing this, wise men subjugate their desires.

The Yogi who holds communion with the Supreme Spirit, by dint of his dharma and dhyana of many former births, knows Yoga to be the immaculate way to salvation. Remembering that what the mind desires is not conducive to piety and virtue, and that the conquest of desire itself is at the root of all true dharma, such men do not engage in charity, Vedic learning and rituals, asceticism and meditation, all of whose only object is the attainment of mundane felicity. To illumine this truth, the sages versed in ancient lore sing the gaathas, the ballads called Kamagita. Listen to them, O Yudhishtira.

Kama himself says, "No man succeeds in conquering me unless he resorts to the proper methods. If, knowing my power, a man strives to overcome me by intoning prayers, I prevail by deluding him with the belief that I am himself, the ego within him; if he attempts to quell me through sacrifices and charity, I deceive him by appearing in his mind as a most radiant and virtuous being, a paragon; and if he tries to destroy me by mastering the Vedas and Vedangas, I vanquish him by appearing to be the very soul of virtue.

If a man's strength lies in truth, and he seeks to quell me through patience, I appear to him as his own mind, and he is unable to detect my separate existence; if a man of austere vratas seeks to put me to the sword through asceticism, I appear in the guise of tapasya in his mind, and he does not know me for what I am. If the man of gyana, whose purpose is Mukti, wants to subdue me, I easily seduce him and laugh in his face. Verily, I am the eternal one, without a peer, whom no creature can kill!" So says Kama Deva.

Hence, O Kshatriya, turn away from this tyrant Kama and towards Dharma, so that you can attain true felicity. Yudhishtira, prepare earnestly to undertake the Aswamedha yagna, with rituals of resplendence and daana unseen since the day of Marutta himself.

Do not allow this unworthy grief to overwhelm you again, even if it is for your kin and friends who lie slain on the field of war. You cannot bring them back to life with your tears. Your way ahead lies in performing the most magnificent sacrifices, so that you bless the ravaged world, attain enduring fame in this life, and tread the high path to salvation.'" Vaisampayana said, "With such counsel Dwaipayana Vyasa, Viswarishabha Krishna and other Mahamunis of mighty tapasya console Rajarishi Yudhishtira, who lost many kinsmen and dear friends to the Great War. Rajan, Devasthana, Narada, Bhima, Nakula, Krishnaa, Sahadeva, and Vijaya of the keen intellect, as well as other great Brahmanas versed in the Shastras—all comfort the despondent Dharmaraja so that he can emerge from his dejection.

CANTO 14

After performing the obsequial ceremonies for the dead, and duly worshipping the Brahmanas and Devas, Yudhishtira brings under his sway the vast kingdom of the Earth, with her girdle of oceans. His mind now tranquil, that Kurusottama speaks to Vyasa, Narada and the other sages present. 'You ancient men of untold age, greatness and wisdom have removed my distress, and I find no basis left to cause me sorrow. I have also acquired great wealth, with which I can now worship the gods. O Dvijottamas, with your help, I will indeed now perform the Aswamedha yagna.

We have heard that the Himalayan realms are full of wonders. Therefore, Brahmanas, Maharishis, O Pitamaha, ordain that, with your protection, we reach the Himalayas, for the performance of our yagna depends entirely on your blessings. We seek the blessing of Devarishi Narada and the great Devasthana, for they too have spoken words of great beauty and wisdom to us for our welfare. No other man fallen into tribulation and distress ever had the fortune to secure the kindly counsel of such great friends and gurus, whom all the virtuous revere and laud.'

Thus addressed by the king, those great sages bid Yudhishtira, Krishna and Arjuna repair to the Himalayan fastnesses, and then vanish before the eyes of the assembled crowd. Yudhishtira, the lordly son of Dharma Deva, sits for a while in silence, in the place where the sons of Pandu are offering tarpana and performing funeral rites for the departed Bhishma, Karna, and all the great heroes and prominent Kauravas who have been slain during the Great War.

When they have fulfilled these duties, they give away munificent gifts to Brahmanas. Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, keeping Dhritarashtra always beside him, consoling his blind and lordly uncle of the eyes of wisdom, returns to Hastinapura, takes up the reins of the kingdom and, together with his brothers, rules the Earth with dharma for his sceptre."

Janamejaya asked, "O Dvijottama, when the Pandavas have recovered and pacified their kingdom, what do Krishna and Arjuna do?"

Vaisampayana said, "Rajan, Vasudeva and Dhananjaya are full of joy when the Pandavas succeed in regaining and pacifying their dominions, and set out to travel, wandering together with deep satisfaction in each other's company, even like Indra with his consort in Devaloka; they rove through picturesque forests, wondrous lakes and plateaux, to sacred places of pilgrimage and holy rivers; they enjoy themselves like the two Aswins sporting in the Nandanavana.

When they have spent some weeks ranging at will, the two come blithely to Indraprastha and the magnificent Maya sabha. There they pass their time recounting the stirring events of the war, and recalling the years of privation and suffering, not just of this life but of those past, as well: for they are indeed the ancient sages Nara and Narayana, and they can narrate even the most antique genealogies of the Rishis and the Devas.

One day, Krishna of fathomless punya, who always knows the full import of all things, speaks words of Amrita to comfort Arjuna, whose heart is deeply wounded by the death of his sons and many thousands of friends and kinsmen, although he says nothing of his anguish, being absorbed and delighted in Krishna's company. It is as if Janardana with his deep understanding and ascetic punya has removed Arjuna's great burden, bringing him to a state of perfect peace.

This is what Govinda says to Partha: 'Arjuna, terror of your enemies, your brother, the Dharmaputra, has conquered this whole Earth through the might of your arms, the invincible strength of Bhima and the prowess of the twins. Your brother Yudhishtira now reigns supreme over Bhumi, without a rival. You know well what dharma is; it is by dharma alone that Yudhishtira regained the kingdom, from the strength of dharma that the powerful Suyodhana and his brothers, all of them avaricious, arrogant, ill-spoken and given irrevocably to evil, have been killed, along with their allies. And now that Dharmaputra rules the world again in grace and peace, I, too, have enjoyed your company in the wonderful, untamed and free wilderness.

Parantapa, what more is there to say, than that I am drawn to wherever you are—Kunti, you, Yudhishtira, the mighty Bhima and Madri's twins—by my love for all of you? We have spent a long time now in these sacred places and halls of delight, and the days have fleeted by in your company without my seeing my father Vasudeva, my brother Balarama and my other Vrishni kinsmen.

It is time now that I return to Dwaravati. So I ask you, most valorous of men, give me leave to go. When Yudhishtira was heavily stricken, Bhishma and I consoled him with pertinent Itihasas and Puranas from antiquity, and your brother, being pliant and high-minded, though our sovereign and himself versed in all forms of knowledge, paid due heed to what we said to him. That son of Dharma honours truth, and is grateful and righteous. With his virtue and good sense, the stability of his power will endure. But now, Arjuna, go you to your noble brother and tell him that I mean to return to Dwaraka. I must obtain his leave, Mahabaho, for, let alone going home to the sea-city, even if death were to come to me, I would be unwilling to do anything that might displease Yudhishtira.

Partha, I always have your welfare at heart, and I now say to you that my work here is done. Duryodhana, who ruled the world with greed and evil, is dead; his armies and allies have been slain, and the Earth, with her girdle of seas, her mountains, rivers and jungles, and the great and ancient Kuru kingdom, all have come under the sway of the wise Yudhishtira Dharmaraja.

Kurusottama, may your brother rule the world in dharma with the blessings of the greatest Siddhas, his praises always being sung by the vabdhis and magadhis of Hastinapura. Arjuna, come now with me into Yudhishtira's presence and tell him I wish to return to Dwaraka. Yudhishtira Mahatman always commands my love and respect, and I have placed my body and all the wealth that I own at his disposal. But now that Bhumi has come under your sway and that of the immaculate Yudhishtira, the need for my remaining has passed, and only my love for you keeps me in your kingdom.'

At these words of Janardana, sadness wells up in Arjuna's heart but, honouring Krishna's wishes, he says merely, 'Tathaastu—so be it.'"

ANUGITA PARVA

CANTO 16

Janamejaya asked, "O Dvija, after the enemy was vanquished, tell me of what else was said between Krishna and Arjuna when they went to the hall of audience?"

Vaisampayana said, "As I have told you, after recovering his kingdom Arjuna spends some weeks joyfully in that palace of unearthly beauty in Krishna's company, doing nothing else, his heart full of delight. One day, the two of them, strolling along, come to a part of the palace that is truly like a piece of Swarga upon this earth. There jubilant kinsmen, friends and attendants, surround them.

Arjuna, blissful in the company of his kinsman, looks at the marvellous chambers and asks his divine companion, 'Mahabaho, when the war was upon us, I became aware of your true greatness. Devakinandana, you showed me your Viswarupa, and I saw that you are the Lord of the universe! From the inconstancy of my mind I have all but forgotten those hallowed words you spoke to me, out of your love, O Kesava. Yet my mind constantly harks back to them and searches for those truths you disclosed. But O, Madhava, you are soon to go back to Dwaraka.'

Krishna, Mahatejasvin, foremost of speakers, embraces his cousin, and says, 'Arjuna, I expounded to you mysterious and eternal truths. I spoke to you about the highest dharma, religion in its most essential form, and about the immortal realms. I am sorely disappointed that you did not receive what I imparted to you. What I said then will not return to me now exactly. Panduputra, I am sorry to find you so deficient in both faith and understanding. I cannot repeat in detail everything I said at that critical hour, the Sanatana Dharma I revealed to you, with which you can attain to the very Brahman. I yoked myself deep into yoga at that time, and it was indeed the Parabrahman that I revealed to you.

Yet let me now tell you another old and sacred Itihasa on the same subject. Best of men, observant of duty, listen to me now with undivided attention, so that you succeed in attaining to the highest goal. Listen, Arjuna, and hear me well this time.

Parantapa, once a Brahmana of irresistible tejas came to me from the realms of heaven, from Brahmaloka, and we worshipped him duly. Listen, Partha, without doubt or hesitation, to what he said, most agreeably and eloquently, in reply to our queries. The Brahmana said, "O Krishna of highest puissance, harken to my reply to the question you raise about Mukti, out of your compassion for all creatures, Madhava, once the Brahmana known as Kashyapa, of profound tapasya and every virtue, foremost among savants of dharma, came to another Brahmana who was a knower of the deep and intricate mysteries of the Atman, and even the final Secret.

Indeed, the latter had mastered all the knowledge held in the scriptures about the departure and reappearance of beings, and he had direct gyana of all things conferred by true yoga. He was a master of the truth of all matters of the world. He knew all about pleasure and pain, about birth and death, and had fathomed the distinctions between actions that yield good and those that are sinful. He was a seer, a witness of all the ends that creatures, high and low, attain through karma, and he lived as one emancipated from samsara.

His tapasya crowned with success, he was perfectly tranquil in soul and, having his senses and passions under absolute control, blazed with the resplendence of the Brahman. He could transport himself anywhere at will, indeed vanishing before the eyes of all whenever he chose. He roved in the company of invisible Siddhas and Gandharvas. He was wont to sit in their midst and converse with them in sequestered places, far from the bustle of humanity. He was as free as the wind from attachment to all things.

Kashyapa, hearing of this sage, wanted to see him. That best of Brahmanas sought out the mystic Rishi and approached him. A great tapasvin himself, moved by the desire to acquire further punya, Kashyapa fell with a rapt heart at the feet of the sage, in whom he clearly perceived marvellous attributes.

Full of awe at the extraordinary accomplishments of that recondite Muni, Kashyapa began to wait upon the Brahmana with the humble reverence of a sishya waiting on his guru, and succeeded in pleasing him. His unstinting devotion gratified the immaculate and noble Brahmana and at last the Rishi spoke blithely to Kashyapa about Moksha, the highest goal. Listen to those hermetic words, O Janardana, as I repeat them.

That mystic among ascetics said, "Through diverse karma, my son, as well as through dharma, mortal creatures attain to diverse ends in this world and beyond. Yet nowhere is the highest happiness to be found, and nowhere can residence be eternal. Even after reaping the harvest of the most strenuous deeds, mortals fall from the loftiest realms won by such karma.

In consequence of my own indulgence in sin, I have, time and again, come to miserable and inauspicious ends, for I never escaped the clutches of lust and wrath, and was always deluded by greed. I have experienced death and rebirth repeatedly, I have eaten every manner of food, I have fed at diverse breasts, I have known diverse mothers and many different fathers. Many kinds of happiness have been mine, and many kinds of misery, O sinless one. On numerous occasions have I been torn away from what was pleasant, and reaped torment. Having earned wealth with great toil, I have had to endure its loss. Insults and grievous anguish have I received from kings and relatives; agonizing mental and physical have been mine; humiliations have I known, and death and immurement in horrific conditions. Falls into hell have been mine, and great tortures in the domains of Yama. Decrepitude and disease have repeatedly assailed me, and calamities as frequent. In this world, I have time and again undergone all the afflictions that flow from the illusory perception of duality.

After all this, one day, the utmost, final despair overwhelmed me. And then, afflicted as I was, I sought refuge in the Formless, and renounced the world with all its joys and sorrows. Finally understanding the true path, I set myself upon it, even while living in this world. When my soul found its innate peace, I accomplished what you now see, this immortal freedom. When I leave my body this time, I will never return again, never again be reborn. Truly, until I attain absorption into the eternal Brahman, indeed until the final dissolution of the universe, I shall look only towards that blissful end which shall be mine, and those beings that constitute this universe.

Having reached this goal, I will attain Satyaloka, and after that what is higher still, the Brahman and Moksha. I will attain the Nirguna Parabrahman, the single, unmanifest, unborn, deathless One. Have no doubt about this, Parantapa, I will not return to this world of mortal creatures. O you of great wisdom, I have been gratified by you. Tell me what I can do for you. I know why you sought me out, and it is now time to accomplish the purpose for which you came here to me.

Very soon I will leave this world for the last time. Since you have pleased me with your service and conduct, ask me what you will, and I will gratify you. I know that you have great acumen, and can grasp whatever I have to say, else you would not have recognized me in the first place. Yes, surely, Kashyapa, yours is a profound intelligence.”””

"Krishna went on, 'Touching the feet of the sage, Kashyapa asked him some profound and difficult questions, and he, foremost of all men of truth, discoursed on every aspect of dharma about which he was asked.

Kashyapa asked, "How does one body dissolve, and how is another acquired? How does a soul find Moksha after enduring a repeated cycle of painful rebirths? After enjoying Prakriti for some time, how does the Jiva cast off a particular body? How does the Jiva attain to what is different from it, to the Brahman? How does a human being enjoy and endure the fruits of his karma, good and bad? What happens to the karma of one who has no body?"

The emancipated sage, at Kashyapa's insistence, answered his questions one after another. Listen to me, O Vrishni, as I tell you what he said. The Jivanmukta said to Kashyapa, "Upon the exhaustion of the karma which extends a life and fetches fame to a particular body assumed by the Jiva, the embodied self, the end of its span drawn near, begins to do things hostile to its own life and health. As its dissolution approaches, its understanding turns away from its proper course.

The man of uncleansed soul, even after an accurate apprehension of his constitution and strength, and of the season of his own life and of the year, will begin to eat irregularly food that is detrimental to him, to indulge in practices injurious to himself. At times he eats excessively, at others abstains from food; he ingests bad food or drink, or eats food containing ingredients incompatible with one another, or eats to excess, or before digesting what he ate before.

He indulges to excess in physical exercise and sexual pleasure, or falls so avidly to work that he suppresses the urgings of his corporeal organism, even when they become pronounced. Otherwise he gluts himself with food far too rich, or sleeps during the day. Undigested food itself provokes such defects, when the time comes. Stimulating the deficiencies in his body brings fatal disease to fall upon him, ending in his death. There are even those who perversely kill themselves outright by unnatural means such as hanging.

It is through these causes that a living body finds its end. Understand correctly the manner of this, as I declare it to you. Urged on by the element of wind, Vayu, which intensifies, the heat in the body is fanned and agitated and spreads even like a fire to all parts of the body, one after another, consuming every vital part where life resides. Overwhelmed with pain, O Dvija, the Jiva quickly flees its mortal casement.

Thus are all the living repeatedly afflicted with death and birth. The pain felt when leaving a body is very like that experienced when first entering the womb, and when issuing out of it. Dying or being born, the Jiva feels distress. The body's Vayu becomes excited through cold and dissolves its compound of elements so that the panchabhutas abandon their unity, scatter and return again into their five original elements. The Vayu that dwells in the vital breaths, Prana and Apana, which enliven the body of five primal elements, sweeps upward, away from the turmoil of the embodied creature. Breathlessness follows, and the man becomes destitute of heat, of breath, of beauty and of consciousness. Deserted by Brahman, he finds the condition known as death.

The senses through which he perceives the world no longer register anything; for it is the eternal Jiva who creates and sustains the body through the two vital breaths, which he generates through food. While the body is occupied, alive, know that the elements are firmly united in those parts termed in the Shastras as its vital centres. When these are pierced, the Jiva stirs and rises into the heart and swiftly ceases to animate those vital centres, so that the living creature, though still alive, loses consciousness of the external world. Darkness overwhelms him; it is then that the Jiva, in a long, agonized breath, quits the mortal flesh, with a final shudder. However, even when the Jiva leaves a body, the karma of the life lived in it clings to him, all the punya and paapa, the good and the evil.

Brahmanas, seers gifted with knowledge and sight and conversant with the secrets of the hermetic scriptures, can tell whether the soul departs with more good or evil. Even as common men see the firefly appear and disappear in the dark, tapasvins with the eye of knowledge see with mystic vision the Jiva as it leaves one body and as it enters another womb.

The Jivatma has three realms assigned to it through all time: this world, Bhumi, where creatures dwell, is known as kshetra, or the field of karma, of deeds. Here, with deeds good and evil mixed from lives gone by and present, all embodied creatures find their fruits. In consequence of their own varied karma, creatures enjoy higher or lower pleasures and joys. Sinners find Naraka for themselves, the lower realms into which they fall, and terrible is the experience of plunging head-first into savage fires as a result of their sins. Rescue is exceedingly difficult, and every mortal being must do its utmost to preserve itself from those infernal realms.

Listen now carefully to what I say about the kind of world into which souls ascend as a result of their punya; for by that you will achieve firmness of understanding and a clear knowledge of good and evil karma. Know that the realms of Swarga, to which souls of good deeds attain, are the celestial fields of stars that shine in the firmament: the lunar world, Pitriloka, and the solar one as well, Suryaloka, resplendent with its own light. Yet, upon the exhaustion of their punya, these souls too fall away from the regions of bliss. In Swargaloka itself are distinctions of inferior, superior and middling felicity, and souls experience discontent at the sight of prosperity more glorious than their own.

These are the goals that I have described to you. Listen now, attentively, O Brahmana, to what the Jiva experiences on finding itself in the womb.'"

CANTO 18

'The enlightened Brahmana said to Kashyapa, "The karma, good and bad, that a Jiva accumulates is not destroyed with the body but yields its harvest successively, body after body. As a fruit-bearing tree, when the season comes, yields bountiful fruit, so, too, does punya of a pure heart bestow its crop of felicity and, as surely, do sins committed with an evil heart result in harvests of misery.

Moved by Mind, Manas, the Jiva, the embodied soul, indulges in karma. Listen to how, bearing all its karma, and overwhelmed by lust and wrath, this Jiva enters a womb. The vital seed, mixed with blood, enters the womb of females and becomes the field of the Jiva, good or bad according to the karma it carries. But Jiva itself, being subtle and unmanifest, never becomes attached to anything, even upon incarnating, time after time. It is in essence the Eternal Brahman, the seed of all creatures, because of whom all mortals live.

The Jiva, entering the foetus, enlivens its limbs part by part, and, dwelling in all the centres that belong to Prana, supports life. Becoming endowed with Manas, the unborn child begins to move its limbs. Know that the Jiva occupies an embryo even as liquid iron does a mould; as fire burning fiercely turns iron to fluid, so does the soul animate the foetus. As a lamp lit in a room discovers all things within the chamber, even so does Mind discover the different limbs and organs of the body. Whatever karma the Jiva has performed in a previous body, it must inexorably reap its harvests, bitter and sweet, in the new body. Through such enjoyment and suffering, old karma is exhausted and fresh karma accumulates, also inevitably, until, after countless births and deaths, the Jiva penetrates at last the profound dharma of the dhyana which leads to Mukti, to final Emancipation.

Let me tell you of the karma, the deeds, by which the Jiva, coursing through the interminable round of rebirths, finds happiness: daana, tapasya, brahmacharya: worshipping Brahman as ordained in the Shastras, shanti, feeling pity and compassion for all creatures, restraining the passions, abstaining from cruelty and from appropriating what belongs to others, refraining, even mentally, from all deeds that are false and injurious to living creatures, reverently serving the mother and the father, honouring the Devas and Sadasyas—gods and guests—worshipping Gurus, maintaining purity, firmly restraining all organs of lust, and performing good deeds.

From such karma ensues righteousness, dharma, which protects all creatures eternally. Such conduct is seen in sattvic persons, and, verily, such karma is immortal, the way of tranquil souls that indicates eternal virtue; among the serene, the way of Sanatana Dharma is cast. He who embraces these paths of truth will never come to a miserable end. It is through the virtue of the righteous that the world is maintained.

However, the Yogin is a Jivanmukta, a liberated soul, and he is distinguished above these men of goodness. Deliverance from the meshes of samsara comes after an incalculably long time, when a person remains in tune with the truth and does as he or she should with perfect detachment. A Jiva is faced ineluctably with karma from every previous life: karma is the very cause of the essentially eternal Jiva becoming embodied in so many different forms, at various times, all of them mortal, unlike his true, immortal Self.

There exists in the world the question of how a Jiva first accepted a body. The Grandsire of all the worlds, Brahma, first created a body of his own; then he created the three worlds, in their entirety, of mobile and immobile creatures, Pradhana, the material cause of all embodied creatures, and the highest. All else that is seen is kshara, mortal; while the other is transcendent—Para—immortal and indestructible—a-kshara. Of each Purusha taken distributively, the whole is duality among these three. The first, Svayambhuva Prajapati, created all the primal elements and all immobile creation from the first sound, the primordial audition. The Pitamaha ordained a limit to time, and to transmigrations among diverse creatures, births and rebirths.

What I say to you is the truth on the subject of previous births, as perceived by one who has seen his Atman, his Soul. One who looks upon pleasure and pain as fleeting, who regards the body as an unholy compound, and death as ordained in karma, who is mindful of what little there is of pleasure in the world, that in truth all is pain, dukha, will succeed in crossing this stormy ocean of worldly migrations, this samsara so difficult to traverse.

Though assailed by decrepitude, disease and death, he who understands Pradhana beholds with an equal eye the One consciousness dwelling in all conscious beings. Seeking the supreme condition, he becomes impervious to all else. Best of men, I will now tell you about this. Most learned Brahmana, understand fully that which constitutes the final knowledge of the immortal condition.'"

'The Brahmana said, "He who becomes absorbed in the one repository of all things, freeing himself from even the thought of his own identity with all things—indeed, ceasing to think of even his own existence, will gradually cast off one bond after another and succeed in attaining Mukti. The man who is a friend to all, who endures all, who is devoted to tranquillity, who has conquered his senses, who is divested of fear and wrath, and who is of restrained soul, succeeds in liberating himself.

He who behaves towards all creatures as towards himself, who is restrained, pure, free from vanity and egoism, is truly emancipated. He looks with an equal eye upon life and death, pleasure and pain, gain and loss, the agreeable and the disagreeable. He is in every way free who does not covet what belongs to others, who never disregards anybody, who transcends all the pairs of opposites, and whose soul is untrammelled by the slightest attachment. He is a Jivanmukta who has no enemy, no kinsman and no child, who has cast off dharma, artha and kama, and who is liberated from all desire.

He who finds Moksha acquires neither punya nor paapa, and casts off the good and evil accumulated in previous births; he lays waste the elements of his body in order to attain to a tranquil soul, and transcends all pairs of opposites. He who abstains from all karma, who is unfettered by desire, whose heart is fixed on renunciation, who looks upon the universe as transient, like an aswattha tree ever subject to birth, decay and death, and whose eyes are always directed towards his own faults, soon succeeds in freeing himself from the bonds that bind him.

He finds Mukti who sees his soul as unknowable, without smell, taste, touch, sound, sight and belonging. He who sees his soul as being untouched by the attributes of the five elements, without form and cause, to be in truth without attributes although enjoying the attributes, finds Moksha. Abandoning, through true understanding, all purposes relating to body and mind, one gradually achieves the cessation of separate existence, even like a fire no longer fed with fuel.

One who is freed from all impressions, who transcends all pairs of opposites, who restrains and employs his senses using tapasya, who owns nothing, becomes a Jivanmukta and attains Nirvana. Disentangled from samsara, he attains to Brahman, eternal and supreme, perfectly tranquil, stable, enduring and deathless.

Let me now tell you about the supreme science of Yoga, and how Yogins, by dhyana, come to see the immaculate Atman. Learn from me about those doors through which, directing the soul within the body, one beholds that which is without beginning and end. Withdrawing the senses from their objects, one should fix one's mind upon the soul; after having performed the severest austerities, one should finally practise that last dhyana which leads to Moksha.

Always at tapasya, engaged in dhyana, the intelligent and learned Brahmana should keep the precepts of the science of Yoga, contemplating the soul in the body. If the good man succeeds in concentrating the mind on the Atman, in time, as he becomes increasingly absorbed in meditation, he sees the Paramatman in his own Atman. Self-restrained, always rapt, his senses completely conquered, the man of the cleansed soul surely succeeds in uniting his soul with the Soul.

Even as a man, having seen a stranger in a dream, recognizes the person in waking life, so, too, he who sees the Supreme Soul in deep samadhi, recognizes it everywhere, even when he awakes from his trance. Just as one perceives the fibrous pith of the munja after extracting it from its sheath, even so does the Yogin behold the soul, extracting it from the body. The body is likened to the munja, and the Atman to its essential fibre, by those who know the true Yoga, which is union.

Once the bearer of a body properly sees the soul in Yoga, no one can be his master, for he has become lord of the three worlds. He assumes diverse bodies as he wishes. Repudiating age and death, he neither grieves nor exults. The self-restrained man, concentrated in Yoga, can create for himself godship over the very gods. Casting off his transient body, he feels no qualm even at the sight of all creatures perishing before his eyes, for he has passed beyond and attained to immutable Brahman. When all creatures suffer, he is beyond suffering, for nothing can afflict him.

Devoid of desire, his mind tranquil, the man yoked in Yoga is never shaken by pain, sorrow or fear, those terrible results of attachment and affection. Weapons cannot pierce him; death does not exist for him. Nowhere in the world will you find anyone happier. Having effectively yoked his soul, he lives steadily, on himself. Disconnected from ageing, from pain and pleasure, he sleeps in peace. Casting off his human body, he attains to other forms and bodies at his own pleasure. However, while enjoying the sovereignty that Yoga bestows, one should never fall away from devotion to Yoga. When, after profound devotion to Yoga, one beholds the Atman in oneself, one ceases to have any regard for even Indra of a hundred sacrifices.

Listen now to how a man who habituates himself exclusively to dhyana succeeds in attaining to the final Yoga, the communion of nirvana. Thinking of that point of the compass that has the sun behind it, the mind should be fixed in the interior of the dwelling in which one might happen to live. Within the dwelling, let the mind, with all its inward and outward operations, be fixed first in the room where one is. Sinking deeply into meditation, one beholds the All, the Brahman, the Soul of the universe, for there is nothing outside Brahman on which the mind may dwell; Brahman is everywhere and all things.

Else, restraining all the senses in a silent and uninhabited forest, one may fix one's mind in dhyana on the Brahman, here both within and outside one's body. One should meditate on the teeth, the palate, the tongue, the throat, the neck; likewise, on the heart and its bonds, its ligatures."

"Kashyapa now asked, 'O Madhusudan, enlighten me further about the dharma of Moksha, so hard to explain. How is the food that we eat digested in the stomach? How does it become transformed into fluids? How, again, into blood? How does it nourish the flesh, the marrow, the sinews and bones? How do all these limbs of embodied creatures grow? How does the strength grow of the growing man? How do all that is not nutritive and all that is impure come to be expelled? How does one inhale and exhale? In which particular part of the body does the Atman dwell, enlivening it? How does the Jiva, exerting himself, support the body? Of what colour and of what kind is the body in which he dwells, when he leaves? O Holy One, tell me all this, Anagha, I beg you!'

I said to Kashyapa—for that emaciated sage was verily me, O Madhava—"As one placing some precious object in one's store-room should keep his mind on it, so should one dispose one's mind to dwell on the Soul, restraining the senses, avoiding heedlessness. Being always assiduous in this way and fulfilled within himself, a man will within a short time behold that Brahman with which one grasps Pradhana. It cannot be seen by the eye, nor apprehended by all the senses. It is only the lamp of the mind that illumines the great Soul. He has hands and feet on all sides; he has ears on all sides; he dwells in the world, pervading all things. When true knowledge dawns, Jiva beholds the Atman as extracted from the body, like the pith from a stalk of munja grass.

Then, casting off Brahma as invested with form, by holding the mind in the body, he beholds Brahma free from all attributes. He sees the Soul with his mind, smiling the while. Depending upon that Brahma, he then attains to Mukti, Emancipation. O Dvijottama, I have now expounded to you the mystery of all mystery, the final Rahasya. And now give me your leave, O Kashyapa, for I must go from here. You, too, are free to go wherever you please.' Thus, O Krishna, that sishya of mine, the Muni Kashyapa, of deep tapasya and stern vows, took my blessings and, expressing his adoration and gratitude, went his way."'

Krishna continues, 'And, Partha, that most lustrous Brahmana, having laid bare the dharma of Mukti, vanished before my eyes. Have you heard and absorbed what the Brahmana said, with all your mind and heart, Arjuna? For this was what you heard on that occasion between the two armies in my chariot. I believe that one whose mind is confused, who has gleaned no wisdom from study, or who eats food incompatible with his body, or whose soul is not purified, will find it difficult to truly comprehend this teaching.

O Bhaarata, what you have heard is a great mystery, even among the Devas. At no time or place in this world, Partha, has this been heard by another man, and, Anagha, no other man is worthy of hearing it. Truly, no man whose soul is bewildered can understand this teaching. The world of the gods is filled with those who follow the dharma of action. The Devas do not find agreeable the religion of inaction, through the cessation of all karma.

That end is the highest which is the eternal Brahman, where, casting off the body, one attains immortality and eternal bliss. By following the secret way of which I have told you, O Partha, even those of sinful birth, like women, Vaisyas and Sudras, attain to the highest felicity—what need be said, then, of Brahmanas and Kshatriyas possessed of great learning, devoted to the duties of their own varna, who are intent on finding Mukti?

I have laid down for you the reasons upon which the Mukti Marga rests; I have told you the means for its acquisition and its ultimate fruit, which is Nirvana and knowledge of the truth about suffering. Nothing anywhere, O Bhaarata, brings greater peace and perfect joy than this. By treading this path, that mortal endowed with intelligence, faith and courage, who renounces as insubstantial what is regarded as substantial by the world, succeeds in a short time in gaining the Supreme goal.

This is the last teaching, beyond which there is no other; this is all that I have to say, for nothing else is higher. Yoga, communion and liberation can be found by one who devotes himself to its constant practice for a period of six months.'"

"Krishna says, 'O son of Pritha, there is an old tale told of a discussion between a married couple. The wife of a certain Brahmana, seeing that master of every kind of knowledge and wisdom seated in seclusion, said to him, "What realm will I attain, who depends on one who sits renouncing all karma, who is towards me, so harsh and unconcerned? I have heard that a wife attains to those regions that her husband gains. What, goal, then, will be mine, who have you for my lord?"

The serene Brahmana of tranquil soul said to her, smilingly, "Blessed, sinless one, I am not offended by what you say. Karma is performed by those who depend on others to help them, who take the way of action as true, from their feeble understanding. Such men of deeds only store delusion through what they do. Yet freedom from karma cannot be had in this world for even a moment. From birth to death and rebirth, karma, good or bad, of deed, thought or speech, exists in all beings. I have turned away from the path of ritual karma defined by outward things, the way of Soma rasa and offerings of ghrita, all destroyed inevitably by Rakshasas; and so turning away, I have found the seat of the Atman within my body. There dwells Brahman, eternal, transcending all pairs of opposites; there Soma is with Agni; and there moves Vayu constantly, supporting all creatures. It is for that seat that Pitamaha Brahma and others, concentrated in Yoga, worship the Indestructible, and for which men of learning and great vows strive, men of tranquil souls and vanquished senses.

It cannot be smelled by the organ of smell, nor tasted by the tongue, nor touched by the organs of touch. It cannot be seen by the eye. It transcends hearing. It is without scent, taste, touch or form; it is devoid of attributes, attained only through the mind. From it ensues the perfectly ordained universe, and upon it the universe rests.

From it the life-breaths, Prana, Apana, Samana, Vyana and Udana flow, and into it are they subsumed. The breaths Prana and Apana move between Samana and Vyana. When the soul sleeps, both Samana and Vyana are absorbed. Between Apana and Prana dwells Udana, pervading all. Since Udana is the breath that controls all the life-winds, Prana and Apana do not desert a sleeping person. Hence, utterers of Brahman undergo penances which have the Atman for their goal.

In the midst of all those life-breaths that swallow up one another and move within the body blazes forth the fire called Vaiswanara, made up of seven flames. The nose, the tongue, the eye, the skin, and the ear which numbers the fifth, the mind, and understanding—these are the seven tongues of that Vaiswanara's flame. That which is smelled, that which is seen, that which is eaten or drunk, that which is touched, that which is heard, that which is thought of, and also that which is understood—these are the seven sorts of fuel. That which smells, that which eats, that which sees, that which touches, that which hears, the fifth; that which thinks, and that which understands—these are the seven great officiating priests.

Learned sacrificers, O blessed one, duly casting seven libations in seven ways in the seven fires—that which is smelt, that which is drunk, that which is seen, that which is touched, that which is heard, that which is thought of, and that which is understood—create them in their own wombs. Earth, Wind, Ether, Water, Light, Mind and Understanding: these seven are called wombs of all things.

All the attributes, the burnt havis constituting the sacrificial offerings, enter into the attribute born of fire and, abiding within that dwelling, are reborn in their respective wombs. In that which generates all beings, they remain absorbed during the period for which dissolution lasts. From that is created smell, from that is produced taste, from that comes colour, and from that, touch; from that issues sound; from that arises doubt; and from that also, resolution. This is the sevenfold creation. It is in this very way that the ancients comprehended all things. By the three full and final libations, the full become replete with light.'"

'The Brahmana said, "An ancient story is told in this regard. Do you understand the institution of the ten hotris, the sacrificing priests? The ear, the skin, the two eyes, the tongue, the nose, the two feet, the two hands, the genital organ, the lower duct and speech—these, O beautiful one, are the ten hotris. Sound and touch, colour and taste, scent, speech, action, movement, and the discharge of vital seed, of urine and of excreta, are the ten libations. The points of the compass, the Quarters, Wind, Sun, Moon, Earth, Fire, Vishnu, Indra, Prajapati, and Mitra—these are the ten sacrificial fires. The objects of the senses are the fuel cast into these ten fires as are the Mind, which is the ladle, and the wealth—the good and bad karma—of the sacrificer. What remains is the pure, highest knowledge.

We have heard that this universe was differentiated by that knowledge. All objects of knowledge are Manas, mind. Knowledge only perceives. The knower, the Jiva, encased in its subtle form, sukshma sarira, lives within the gross body, sthula sarira, created by the vital seed. The bearer of the body is the Garhapatya fire. From that is produced another—Mind, the Ahavaniya fire. Into it is poured the oblation. From that came the Veda, the Word; Mind, desirous of creation, sets itself on the Veda. Then arises form, essential colour undistinguished by particular colours. It runs towards Manas, the Mind."

The Brahmana's wife asked, "How did Veda, the Word, arise first and only then Mind, seeing that Word comes into existence after having been thought upon by Mind? Upon what authority can it be said that Mati or Prana takes refuge in Mind? Why, again, in dreamless sleep, though apart from Mind, does not Prana apprehend the world? What restrains it?'"

The Brahmana said, "The Apana Vayu, becoming the lord of Prana, makes it identical with itself. That restrained movement of the Prana Vayu is the motion of the Mind. Hence the Mind is dependent upon Prana, not Prana upon the mind. Therefore, in dreamless sleep, upon the disappearance of Mind, Prana does not vanish. But, since you ask me about Veda and Manas, I will relate a discourse between them.

Word and Mind, repairing to the Soul of matter, asked, 'Which of us is superior, most powerful one? A question has arisen between us about this. Do you dispel our doubt.'"

On that occasion, the Holy One made this reply, 'Manas is undoubtedly superior.' At this, Word said to Mind, 'I yield to you the fruition of all your desires!'"

The Brahmana said, "Know that I have two minds, the moving and the still. That which is unmoving is, verily, with me; the movable is in your dominion. That Mind is movable which, in the form of Mantra, word or voice, is of your dominion. Hence, you are superior to the other mind.

But since, my beautiful one, you have entered into this engagement of your own accord, I fill myself with breath and utter you. The Goddess Word once always dwelt between Prana and Apana. But, sinking into Apana, though urged upwards, she was dissociated from Prana. She ran to Prajapati saying, 'Be gratified with me, O Holy One!'

The Prana reappeared, once more fostering Word. Hence, Word, encountering deep exhalation, never utters anything. Word always flows either endowed with utterance or without it. Between the two, Word without utterance, Silence, is superior to Word with utterance, Speech. Like a cow blessed with excellent milk, Silence yields diverse meanings. When she speaks of Brahman, O you of charming smiles, she yields the Eternal, Moksha. Word is a most puissant cow, both divine and not divine. Behold the distinction between these two subtle forms of Word that flow."

The Brahmana's wife said, "What did the Vakdevi, Goddess of Word, say in days of old when Speech, though impelled by the wish to utter, could not emerge?"

The Brahmana said, "The Word that is generated in the body by Prana, attains to Apana from Prana. Then, transformed into Udana and issuing out of the body, Vak envelops all the quarters, with Vyana. After that, she dwells in Samana. Even in this way did Word once speak. Hence, Mind, being unmoving, is distinguished; and the Goddess Word, having movement, is also distinguished.'"

CANTO 22

'The Brahmana said, "Blessed one, another antique story tells of the seven sacrificing priests: the nose, the eye, the tongue, the skin, the ear, the mind, and the understanding, all distinct from one another. Dwelling in subtle space, they do not perceive one another. They are seven, these priests, in number as well as in nature."

The Brahmana's wife said, "How is it that, dwelling in subtle space, they do not perceive one another? What are their natures, O Holy One? Explain this, my lord." The Brahmana said, "Not knowing the qualities of any object is ignorance of that object, while knowledge of its qualities is gyana of the thing.

These seven never succeed in knowing the qualities of one another. The tongue, the eye, the ear, the skin, the mind and the understanding do not ever apprehend smell; the nose alone does so. The nose, the tongue, the ear, the skin, the mind and the understanding never perceive colours; the eye alone does. The nose, the tongue, the eye, the ear, the understanding and the mind never sense touch; only the skin does. The nose, the tongue, the eye, the skin, the mind and the understanding never hear sounds; the ear alone apprehends them. The nose, the tongue, the eye, the skin, the ear and the understanding never know doubt, only the mind. The nose, the tongue, the eye, the skin, the ear and the mind, never determine knowledge; only the understanding or intellect does.

Listen to an ancient discourse that took place between the senses and the Mind. The Mind said, 'The nose does not smell without me; when deprived of me the tongue does not taste, the eye does not see, the skin does not feel, the ear does not hear. I am the eternal and foremost of all the elements. Without me, the senses are lifeless, like empty homes or fires whose flames have been quenched. Without me, creatures cannot apprehend qualities and objects, even with the senses exerting themselves, just as wet fuel can never ignite a fire.'

The Senses replied, 'This would surely be as you say, if you could by yourself enjoy the pleasures of the world without us and the experiences we bring to you of our objects. What you claim would be true if, when we are gone, life could still be supported and gratified, and you could continue to enjoy sensations; or if you could satisfy your desires and enjoyments without us, even by conceiving them. If, again, you deem your power over our objects to be supreme, then seize colour by the nose, and taste by the eye. Also, take smell by the ear, and touch by the tongue. Enjoy sound through the skin, and touch by the intellect. The truly powerful are not bound by law; laws bind only the weak.

So, if you are truly powerful, then seize sensations unenjoyed before; it is beneath you to taste what others have tasted before! As a sishya goes to a guru to acquire the Srutis, and then, having acquired them, dwells on their import by obeying their injunctions, even so, regard as your own all that we reveal and give you to enjoy, in the past or the future, asleep or awake.

In creatures of little intelligence, when their minds are distracted and dismal, life is still sustained by the continuing function of the senses and their objects. All creatures, high and low, having formed innumerable purposes and fantasies, when taken by the wish to enjoy these, run to the senses and their objects. He who sets out to gratify desires in fantasy depending solely on the mind, ignoring the senses and the outer world, quickly finds death when his life-breaths are exhausted, like a fire run out of fuel.

It is true that we, the senses, are bound to our respective attributes; true, also, that we have no knowledge of one another's attributes. But without us, you can have no perceptions whatever. Without us, no happiness can come to you.''''

CANTO 23

'The Brahmana said to his wife, "O blessed lady, there is an old story of the institution of the five sacrificing priests. The learned know as a tenet that Prana, Apana, Udana, Samana and Vyana are the five sacrificing priests." The Brahmana's wife said, "But I am convinced that there are in nature seven sacrificing priests. Expound to me now the creed of the five sacrificing priests."

The Brahmana said, "The wind nursed by Prana later takes birth in Apana. The wind nursed in Apana then becomes Vyana. Nursed by Vyana, the wind develops into Udana. Nursed in Udana, life-breath is generated as Samana. Those pure ones, in days of yore, asked the first-born Pitamaha, 'You must declare who amongst us is foremost, who will the first, the lord, of the others.'

Brahma said, 'He upon whose death all the life-breaths die in the bodies of living creatures, he upon whose moving they all move, is the foremost among you. Go now where you will.'

Prana said, 'Upon my extinction all the life-breaths become extinct in the bodies of living creatures. Upon my stirring again, so do they. I am the first and the foremost. Behold, I make myself extinct!'

Prana then extinguished himself. At this, Samana and Udana said, 'You do not dwell here, pervading all, as we do. You are not the first or foremost amongst us, O Prana. Only Apana is under your dominion.'

Prana then moved, and to him Apana said, 'When I become extinct, all the life-winds become extinct in the bodies of living creatures. When I move, they all stir. I am the first, the foremost. Behold, I extinguish myself!'

Both Vyana and Udana said to Apana, 'Apana, you art not the first or our lord. Only Prana is under your control.'

Apana stirred again. Vyana said, 'I am the first, the lord of all the life-winds. Attend to the reason for this. When I become still, all the life-winds do, as well, in the bodies of living creatures. When I stir, they move once more. So, I am the first and the lord. Look, I extinguish myself!'

Then Vyana stirred no more, at which Prana and Apana and Udana and Samana said to him, 'You are not the first or the lord of us, Vyana. Samana alone is under your dominion.'

Vyana stirred again, and Samana said to him, 'I am the first and the lord of you all, for when I am no more, all the life-winds die in the bodies of living creatures. When I move, they live again. Behold, I extinguish myself!'

But then he stirred again. Udana said, 'I am the font of all the life-winds, for when I am still, all the life-breaths are still in the bodies of living creatures. When I move they are enlivened again. Look, I extinguish myself!'

Udana, after making himself still, stirred again. Prana and Apana and Samana and Vyana said to him, 'Udana, you are not the first among us, only Vyana is under your dominion.'

To them, assembled together, the Lord of creatures, Brahma, said, 'No one among you is superior to the others. You are all endowed with distinct and different attributes, and you are all first and lords in your own spheres. There is one that is unmoving, and one that is moving; there are five life-winds. My own self is the first one of these. That one takes many forms. Become friendly to one another, and gratify one another: go in peace. Blessings be upon you, and do you five sustain one another!'"'

CANTO 24

'The Brahmana continued, "Another antique tale is told in this regard, about the conversation between Narada and the Rishi Devamata.

Devamata said, 'What is it, verily, that comes first into existence in a creature that takes birth? Is it Prana, Apana, Samana, Vyana or Udana?'

Narada said, 'By whatever the creature is created, that is what first comes to him. The life-winds exist in pairs, and move transversely, upwards and downwards.'

Devamata said, 'By which of the life-winds is a creature produced? Which amongst them is foremost? Tell me what the pairs of life-winds are which move transversely, upwards and downwards.'

Narada said, 'From sankalpa, the wish, arises kama, pleasure. It also arises from sound, from taste and from colour. From semen, united with blood, first flows Prana. Upon the semen being modified by Prana, flows Apana. Pleasure arises from the semen as well.

It arises from taste also. This is the form of Udana. Pleasure is produced from union. Semen is generated by desire. From desire is produced the menstrual flow. In the union of semen and blood, generated by Samana and Vyana, the pair that consists of Prana and Apana, enters, moving transversely and upwards. Vyana and Samana form a pair that moves transversely.

The Veda teaches that Agni is all deities. The knowledge of Agni arises in a Brahmana with intelligence. In the smoke of that fire is the guna called Tamas, Darkness. The guna known as Rajas, Passion, is in its ashes. The quality Sattva, Goodness, arises from that portion of the fire into which the oblation is poured. Those conversant with sacrifices know that Samana and Vyana are from the Sattva guna.

Prana and Apana are portions of the oblation of ghrita, clarified butter. Between them is Fire. That is the fine form, the seat of Udana, as the Brahmanas know. I will tell you about the pairs of opposites and what is distinct from them. Day and Night constitute a pair. Between them is Fire. That is the pure seat of Udana, as Brahmanas know. The existent and the non-existent form a pair. Between them is Fire. That is the lofty seat of Udana, as Brahmanas know. First is Samana, then Vyana, whose function is managed through Samana, then, again, Samana comes into operation. Only Vyana exists for tranquillity. Tranquillity is eternal Brahman. This is the exalted seat of Udana, as Brahmanas know,' said Narada."'

CANTO 25

'The Brahmana said, "Listen now, my lovely wife, to the ancient story of the Chaturhotra yagna, in its entirety and wonderful mystery. The agent, the instrument, the deed and Emancipation—these, beautiful one, are the four sacrificing priests by whom the universe is enveloped.

Listen to the assignment of causes regarding this subject. The nose, the tongue, the eye, the skin, the ear, the mind and the intellect—these seven must be understood as being created by the gunas.

Smell, taste, colour, touch, sound the fifth, the objects of perception and those of the intellect—these seven are caused by karma. He who smells, he who eats, he who sees, he who speaks, he who hears, the fifth, he who thinks, and he who knows—these seven are caused by the agent. Possessed of gunas, these enjoy their own qualities, agreeable or disagreeable. As for the Soul, the Atman, it is destitute of attributes or gunas.

These seven are the causes of Emancipation, Nirvana. In those who are learned and possessed of true understanding, the qualities, which are in the position of deities, consume the oblations, each in its proper place, and in accord to what has been ordained. The man without gyana eats diverse kinds of food, seized with a sense of mineness. Digesting food for himself, he is ruined through the sense of mineness. The eating of food that should not be eaten, and the drinking of wine, finish him. He destroys the food he eats, and is himself destroyed.

The man of learning, the gyani, however, possessed of true power, eats only to create through the food he consumes. In him, not the minutest transgression or sin arises from the food he takes. Whatever is thought of by the mind, whatever is uttered by speech, whatever is heard by the ear, whatever is seen by the eye, whatever is touched by the skin, whatever is smelt by the nose—all constitute oblations of ghrita. They should all, after restraining the five senses and the mind, the sixth, be poured into that eternal fire of great punya which burns within the body: the Atman, the Soul.

The sacrifice that is Yoga is the yagna that I am engaged in. The font of that sacrifice is that which yields the fire of knowledge. The upward life-wind Prana is the Stotra of that sacrifice. The downward life-wind Apana is its Shastra. The renunciation of everything is the excellent Dakshina of that sacrifice. Consciousness, Mind, and Understanding—these, becoming Brahma, are its Hotri, Adhwaryu, and Udgatri. The Prashastri, his Shastra, is truth. Cessation of separate existence, which is Mukti, is the Dakshina.

Those who understand Narayana recite some Riks on this subject. To the divine Narayana were animals offered in days of yore, then were sung some Samanas. On that subject, gentle one, know that there is an authority. The divine Narayana is the soul of all.”’

CANTO 26

'The Brahmana said, "There is one Ruler. There is no second besides Him. He dwells in the heart. I will speak of Him now. Impelled by Him, I move as He intends me to, like water along a slope. There is one Guru. There is no second besides Him. He dwells in the heart, and I will speak of Him now. Be instructed by that Guru.

They who are always full of wrath are like snakes. There is one Kinsman. There is no second besides Him. He dwells in the heart, and I will speak of Him now. Instructed by Him, kinsmen have kinsmen, and the Sapta Rishis, O son of Pritha, shine in the firmament.

There is one Dispeller. There is no second besides Him. He dwells in the heart, and I will speak of Him now. Having lived with that Guru, through dharma, Sakra attained to sovereignty over all the worlds. There is one Enemy. There is no second besides Him. He dwells in the heart, and I will speak of Him now. Taught by that Guru, all Nagas in the world are always full of animosity. In this regard, the Purana tells of the instruction of the Nagas, the Devas, the Asuras and the Rishis by the Lord of all creatures.

Seated around the Lord of all creatures, the Devas and the Rishis, the Nagas and the Asuras asked him, 'Tell us what is most beneficial to us all.' The Holy One spoke just one word to them: AUM, which is the Brahman in a single syllable. Upon this, they scattered in various directions. Amongst those who ran, in the Nagas there naturally arose the disposition to sting, to bite. In the naturally ostentatious Asuras arose pride. The Devas betook themselves to beneficence, and the great Rishis to self-restraint.

Though it was one Teacher to whom they went, and one Word they received as instruction, the Nagas, the Devas, the Rishis and the Danavas all had inherently different dispositions. It is that One who hears Himself when speaking, and apprehends what is said. Again, it is that heard from Him when He speaks. There is no second preceptor. All actions, karma, flow later in obedience to that One; and within the heart, the Teacher, the Listener, the Knower and the Enemy, all are pleased.

By sinning in the world it is He who becomes a sinner. Through auspicious karma in the world, it is He who becomes righteous. It is He who becomes wayward, degenerate, by becoming addicted to the pleasures of the senses, impelled by desire. It is He who becomes a brahmacharin, by devoting himself to conquering his senses. It is He, again, who relinquishes all tapasya and karma, and takes refuge in Brahman alone.

By moving in the world, yet identifying himself all the while with Brahman, he becomes a Brahmacharin. Brahman is his fuel; Brahman is his fire; Brahman is his origin; Brahman is his water; Brahman is his preceptor: he is rapt in Brahman. Brahmacharya is ever subtle, as understood by the wise. Having understood it, they betook themselves to it, instructed by the Kshetrajna, the Knower!"'

'The Brahmana said, "I have entered the great forest of Brahman, having crossed that impassable fastness of Samsara, which has purposes for its flies and mosquitoes, grief and joy for its cold and heat, heedlessness for its blinding darkness, cupidity and diseases for its reptiles, wealth for its one danger on the road, and lust and wrath for its robbers."

The Brahmana's wife said, "Where is that foremost forest, O you of profound wisdom? What are its trees, its rivers, its mountains and hills? How far is that forest?" The Brahmana said, "There exists nothing separate from it; there is nothing more blissful; nothing more awesome; nothing smaller; nothing vaster; nothing as minute. No joy anywhere can resemble its bliss. Regenerate ones, entering into it, at once transcend both joy and sorrow. They never again go in fear of any creature, nor does any creature fear them.

In that forest are seven great trees, seven fruits and seven guests. There are seven hermitages, seven forms of dhyana and seven kinds of initiation. Even so is that beginningless, endless forest.

The trees which fill that forest yield most excellent flowers, and fruits of five colours. These are of two kinds, besides. The trees which fill that forest yield flowers and fruits that are fragrant and of two colours. The trees which fill that forest produce flowers and fruits that are redolent and of one colour. The two trees that fill that forest give forth many flowers and fruits, besides, which are of unmanifest colours. There is one fire here, of a pure mind, sattvik, of the true Brahmana. The five senses are its fuel. The seven forms of Mukti flowing from them are the seven forms of Initiation. The gunas are the fruit, and the guests eat those fruits. There, in diverse places, the greatest Rishis accept hospitality. When, after being worshipped, they die, another forest shines forth.

In that forest, Intelligence is the tree; Emancipation is the fruit; Tranquillity is its shade. It has Knowledge for its shelter, Contentment for its water, and the Kshetrajna is its sun. Its end cannot be known, up, down, or around. Seven females always dwell there, with faces turned down, effulgent and endowed with the seeds of generation. They drain all the different vasanas from every creature, even as inconstancy does truth.

In that forest dwell, and from it emerge, the seven Rishis who are crowned with ascetic success, among whom Vasishta is the first. Glory, refulgence, greatness, enlightenment, victory, perfection and energy, these seven always follow them as rays do the sun.

Hills and mountains also exist there, all gathered together; and rivers and streams, bearing waters in their course, waters born of Brahman. And there is also a confluence of rivers in a secluded spot, for sacrifice. From there, those that are contented with their own souls go forth to the Grandsire. Those whose desires have been reduced, whose wishes have been directed to the highest vratas, and whose sins have burnt by tapasya, subsume themselves into their souls, attain to Brahman.

Those who know the forest of knowledge give praise to peace. Always keeping that forest in view, so as not to lose courage, they are born. Such is that sacred forest, which true Brahmanas understand, that they live their lives, naturally, in accord with the highest dharma, as ordained by the Kshetrajna, the indwelling, pervasive Knower.'"

'The Brahmana said, "I do not smell scents. I do not taste tastes. I do not see colours. I do not feel touch. I do not hear all the diverse sounds. Nor do I entertain purposes of any kind. It is Nature, Prakriti, which desires such objects of the senses as are pleasant; it is Nature, too, which abhors such objects as are unpleasant. Desire and aversion spring from Nature, like the upward and the downward life-winds, when souls have entered animate bodies.

Distinct from them are the others; in these are eternal dispositions; they, the Yogins, behold just the Soul of all creatures in the body. Dwelling in that, I am never attached to anything, through desire or wrath, through decrepitude and death. Having no desire for any object of pleasure, nor aversion towards any evil, my nature remains untainted, even as a drop of water resting on a lotus-leaf does not wet it. To that constant, eternal Self which witnesses diverse nature, all outward things are inconstant possessions. Though actions are performed, yet the assemblage of enjoyments does not attach itself to the Yogi, even as rays of the sun do not attach to the sky.

An ancient story of a discourse between an Adhwaryu and a Yati is told in this regard. Do you listen to it, glorious lady. Seeing an animal sprinkled with water at a sacrificial ceremony, a Yati said in censure to the Adhwaryu who sat there, 'This is destruction of life!' The Adhwaryu replied, 'This goat will not be destroyed. The yagnapasu meets with great good, if what the Vedas say on this matter is true. The part of this animal that is of earth will go to earth. That part of it that is born of water will enter into water.

His eyes will enter the sun; his ears will enter the different points of the horizon; his life-winds will enter the sky. I who adhere to the scriptures incur no sin by assisting at the sacrifice of this animal.'

The Yati said, 'If you see such good to the goat in disintegrating his life-winds, then this sacrifice is for the goat. What need have you for it? Let the brother, father, mother and friend of the goat give you their approval for its slaughter. Take him to them and seek their opinion. This animal is particularly dependent, and you must seek the consent of those upon whom he depends. Only when you have it will the sacrifice become fit for consideration.

I believe that the life-winds of this goat have returned to their sources. Only the inanimate body remains behind. For those who seek felicity through the lifeless body of a yagnapasu, which is comparable to fuel, the fuel of sacrifice is, after all, the animal himself. Abstaining from cruelty is the foremost of all duties: this is what the ancients have taught. If we deny this, then every manner of violence and sin becomes acceptable. We must rely on what we directly perceive and nothing more.'

The Adhwaryu said, 'You enjoy fragrances, which belong to the earth. You enjoy tastes, which belong to water. You see colours, which belong to light. You have sensations of touch, which belong to the wind. You hear sounds that have their origin in space. You think thoughts with the mind. You opine that all these have life. You do not, then, abstain from taking life. In truth, then, you are constantly engaged in slaughter. I say that there can be no act without killing of one kind or other. What think you of that, O regenerate one.'

The Yati said, 'The immortal and the mortal constitute the twin manifestation of the soul. Of these the immortal has always existed and always shall. The mortal never truly exists. The life-breath, the tongue, the mind, the quality of goodness, along with passion, all exist. The Atman is above and beyond these forms and hence is without duality or hope.

As for one who is liberated from these fleeting, merely apparent objects, who transcends all the pairs of opposites, who does not cherish any expectation, who is alike in and to all creatures, who is free from the idea of mineness, who has subdued himself, and is released from all his surroundings—for him no fear exists from any source!'

The Adhwaryu said, 'O best of intelligent men, one should indeed seek the company of the good! Listening to you, my understanding is illuminated. Illustrious one, I come to you, believing you to be a god, and I still say that I commit no sin by performing these rites with the help of holy mantras!'

The Brahmana continued, "The Yati remained silent after this. The Adhwaryu proceeded with his great sacrifice, but now freed from delusion. True Brahmanas understand Moksha, which is exceedingly subtle, and, having understood it, they live directed by the Kshetrajna, that Seer and witness of all things."'

CANTO 29

'The Brahmana said to his wife, "Another ancient story tells of a conversation between Kartavirya and the Ocean. There was a king called Kartavirya-Arjuna, endowed with a thousand arms. With his bow he conquered the Earth, extending to the shores of the ocean. Once, as he was walking along the seashore, proud of his might, he showered hundreds of arrows into its awesome body of waters.

The Ocean, bowing down to him, pleaded, with folded hands, 'Do not shoot your shafts at me, O Kshatriya! Your mighty missiles kill many creatures who dwell in me, O Purushavyaghra. Tell me what I can do for you to grant them safety and life.'

Arjuna said, 'If there is any bowman who is my equal and would stand against me in battle, name him to me!' The Ocean said, 'If you have heard of the Maharishi Jamadagni, O king, I say to you that his son is fit to receive you as a guest.' Kartavirya, inflamed, hastened to the asrama, where he found Rama himself. With his kinsmen, O lotus-eyed one, he began to create havoc around the Mahatman, infuriating him, until Rama's immeasurable tejas blazed forth and consumed Kartavirya's troops, O lotus-eyed one. Seizing his battle-axe, Rama flew at the thousand-armed Kshatriya and lopped off his arms as he would the branches of a great tree. Seeing Kartavirya slain and prostrate on the earth, his kinsmen, weapons in hand, rushed from every side at Parasurama, who had sat down again in dhyana. Rama once more took up his bow, leapt onto his chariot, and with storms of arrows swiftly chastened the enemy. Terrified by Jamadagni's son, some of the Kshatriyas fled into mountain-fastnesses, like deer hunted by a lion.

Of these, the sons of those who could no longer perform the svadharma of Kshatriyas, through fear of Rama became Vrishalas, for they could find no Brahmanas to be their priests. In this way, the Dravidas, Abhiras and Pundras, together with the Savaras, became Vrishalas, for they fell away from the Kshatriya dharma they were born into but could no longer uphold.

Jamadagni's ferocious son returned, again and again, to massacre the Kshatriyas begotten by Brahmanas upon the Kshatriya women who had lost their heroic princes. One and twenty times he slaughtered them all until a bodiless, heavenly voice heard by all, an Asariri, said to him sweetly, 'O Rama, Rama, desist! What punya do you see in butchering these inferior Kshatriyas over and over?'

In this way, O blessed wife of mine, his grandsires, led by Richika, addressed that Mahatman, calling him to stop his carnage of Kshatriyas. But Rama could not forgive the killing of his father Jamadagni, and he said to his Pitris, the greatest Rishis, 'It does not become you to forbid me.' The Pitris said, 'Best of victors, it does not become you to kill these inferior Kshatriyas. It is not right for you, being a Brahmana, to slay these kings.'

CANTO 30

The Pitris went on, 'An old story is told in this regard. Having heard it, you must do as it says, O Dvijottama. There was once a Rajarishi called Alarka, blessed with the most austere tapasya, conversant with dharma and truthful in speech, a great soul, steadfast in his vows. Having conquered with his bow the whole Earth extending to the seas, he set his mind to that which is abstruse, of the spirit. Sitting under a tree, he turned his thoughts away from his great feats and towards that which is sukshma, subtle.

Alarka said, "Only by mastering the mind does one's conquest becomes permanent. Even if surrounded by enemies, from now I shall aim my arrows inwards. The mind is unsteady; it sets all mortals to outward accomplishment. Therefore I shall aim my sharp shafts at the mind." The mind said, "These arrows you have, O Alarka, will never pierce me through. They will pierce only your own marmas, your vital organs; and, having been pierced, you will die. Do you look for other arrows with which to destroy me."

Reflecting on this, Alarka said, "Inhaling many perfumes, the nose only hankers ever more after them. I shall aim whetted arrows at the nose." The nose said, "These arrows will never pass through me, O Alarka. They will pierce only your own vital parts, and you will die. Do you look for other arrows with which to destroy me."

Reflecting on this, Alarka said, "The tongue, enjoying savoury tastes, only hankers further after them. I shall aim whetted shafts at the tongue." The tongue said, "These arrows, O Alarka, will not pierce me. They will only pierce your own vital parts and you will die. Do you look for other arrows with which to kill me."

Reflecting on this, Alarka said, "Touching diverse things, the skin only hankers further after them. I will flay the skin with arrows flighted with the feathers of the kanka." The skin said, "These arrows will not, O Alarka, pierce me. They will pierce your own vital parts, and you will die. Do you look for other arrows with which to destroy me."

Reflecting on this, Alarka said, "Hearing different sounds, the ear only hankers after them ever more. I will loose whetted barbs at the ear." The ear said, "These arrows will not, O Alarka, pass through me. They will only pierce your own vital parts, and you will die. Do you then look for other arrows with which to kill me."

Hearing these words and reflecting upon them, Alarka said, "Seeing many colours, the eye hankers after them only ever more. Hence, I will put out the eye with my sharpest arrows." The eye said. "These arrows will not, O Alarka, kill me at all. They will pierce only your own vital parts, and you will die. Do you look for other arrows with which to destroy me!"

Reflecting upon these words, Alarka said, "The intellect forms many conclusions, using reason. I will loose whetted arrows at the intellect." The intellect said, "These arrows will not, O Alarka, pierce me at all. They will only pierce your vital parts, and you will die. Do you look for other arrows with which to kill me!"

Alarka set himself immediately in that very place, to perform severe penance, but even through that stern tapasya did not acquire weapons with which to consume those seven. The Dvijottama, most intelligent of men, pondered for a long time, but failed to find anything better than Yoga. Concentrating his mind one-pointedly on a single object, he remained perfectly still, absorbed in Yoga. At long last he slew all seven senses with a single astra of his spirit, naturally and effortlessly, by entering into the highest communion with his Atman.

Filled with wonder, that Rajarishi then sang this sloka: 'Alas that I wasted so much time on outward conquests! Alas that I ever courted the pleasures of sovereignty! Only now have I learnt that there is no joy, no bliss or happiness greater than Yoga!'

O Rama, Bhargava, you too must understand this now. Stop your slaughter, for it will bring you no lasting felicity, and set yourself instead to the most austere tapasya. Only then will you find true goodness.' Thus addressed by his manes, Jamadagni’s son ceased his bloodletting, practised the most austere penances and attained Moksha, the final destination and the most difficult to achieve.”’

'The Brahmana said, "There are three enemies in the world, said to be nine-fold in terms of their attributes: These are three Gunas, each with three attributes. Exultation, satisfaction and joy are the qualities belonging to Sattva, Goodness. Avarice, anger and aversion are of Rajas, Passion. Lassitude, procrastination and delusion belong to Tamas, Darkness. Cutting these down with subtle arrow-storms, the man of intelligence, free from procrastination, possessed of a tranquil soul, and with his own senses under subjection, then ventures to vanquish others.

In this regard, those who know about the great and ancient cycles of time, relate some slokas sung by King Ambarisa, who had indeed acquired a tranquil soul. When diverse kinds of sin were in the ascendant, and when the righteous were afflicted, Ambarisa of great fame put forth his strength to assume sovereignty. Subduing his own faults and worshipping the righteous, he attained to great success and sang these slokas:

'I have subdued many faults. I have vanquished all foes. But there is one, the greatest vice, desire, which deserves to be destroyed but which I have not vanquished! Controlled by desire, this Jiva fails to attain to freedom. Afflicted by desire, one falls into dark ditches without knowing it. Ruled by desire, one indulges in forbidden deeds.

From greed arises desire. From desire flows anxiety. Cut off, O cut off, that greed with sharp-edged swords. The man who succumbs to desire acquires many traits that are of Passion. Then he falls into Darkness, and is born repeatedly, with the bonds of body united, and is compelled to action.

Upon expiring, his bodily elements scattering, he meets with death, which is caused by birth itself.

Understanding this, and subduing greed by intelligence, one's only desire should be for sovereignty over one's soul. This is true sovereignty; there is none other. The Atman, properly understood, is the king.' So said the famed King Ambarisa on the subject of sovereignty—that monarch who did indeed slay the one supreme fault, greed."'

CANTO 32

'The Brahmana said, "My wife, another tale from antiquity is told about a conversation between a certain Brahmana and King Janaka. Once, intending to punish with exile a Brahmana found guilty of some offence, King Janaka said to him, 'You will no more dwell within my dominions.'

The Brahmana replied to that best of kings, 'Tell me, O King, what the boundaries are of your kingdom. I am ready to dwell in the dominions of another king. Verily, I wish to obey your command, O Bhumipala, in accord with the Shastras.'

The king of immeasurable tejas said not a word in reply to the celebrated Brahmana, but only heaved hot sighs repeatedly. Like the planet Rahu swallowing the Sun, a darkness of the intellect had suddenly overwhelmed him, and he sat plunged in thought. When after a short while the cloud of oblivion passed and the king was comforted, he spoke to the Brahmana.

Janaka said, 'Although a vast and peopled domain is subject to me within this my ancestral kingdom, yet I have failed to find it. I searched Mithila for it. When I failed to find it in Mithila, I sought it among my own children. When I failed to find it even there, a dark shadow, a black stupor, seized my mind. When it passed, the light of intelligence returned to me. Then I thought, either I have no dominion, or everything is my dominion. Either even this body is not mine, or the whole Earth is mine. At the same time, O Dvijottama, I think that it is as much mine as it belongs to others.

Do you, therefore, dwell here as long as you choose, and do you enjoy whatever is here as long as you please.’

The Brahmana said, ‘When you have such a vast and peopled ancestral kingdom, tell me, how have you rid yourself of the notion of possession, of mine-ness? And how, too, have you concluded that nothing and all things, belong to you and constitute your kingdom?’

Janaka said, ‘I have understood that all things are mortal and fleeting, Hence, I do not find anything that may be called mine. Meditating upon what the Veda says about possession, in truth, I could find nothing at all which I could call my own. Even thus did I rid myself of the notion of mine-ness.

Hark now to the insight by which I concluded that nothing, but also everything, is mine, and that my kingdom consists of all things. I have no desire to possess the fragrances my nose scents; thus conquered, through relinquishment by me, all the earth is mine, and always subject to me.

I do not desire for myself the tastes that dwell upon my tongue; thus, I conquered water, and that element is mine forever. I do not desire for myself the colours or the reflections in my eyes; thus, light, conquered, became forever mine. I do not desire for myself the sensations of touch upon my skin; thus, conquering wind, I make that element forever mine. I do not desire for myself the sounds that are in my ear; vanquishing sound, the very realm of sound becomes mine forever. I do not desire for myself the mind that is always in my mind. Thus slaying Mind, I become its lord forever. Everything that I do is for the Devas, the Pitris, the Bhutas and Sadasyas.’

The Brahmana, smiling, now said to Janaka, ‘Know that I am Dharma, who have come here today to test you. You are verily the One who sets in motion this wheel that never turns back, this Chakra which has Goodness for its rim, Brahman for its hub, and Gyana for its spokes!’”’

'The Brahmana said to his wife, "My gentle one, I do not dwell or move in the world in the manner you have censured by virtue of your own understanding. I am a Brahmana possessed of Vedic gyana; I am emancipated, a Jivanmukta. I am a vanaprastha; I observe the dharma of a grihasta; I keep vratas. I am not what you see in me as good or bad. I pervade everything in this universe. Whatever creatures exist in the world, mobile or unmoving, know that I am the destroyer of them all, even as fire is the destroyer of all kinds of wood.

Sovereignty over Bhumi and Swarga, on one hand, and Knowledge of the Self, on the other: my wealth is this, Atmagyana. This is the one path for Brahmanas, an understanding they bring to grihas or to asramas, to gurukulas or to sannyasa. Whatever be their numerous and distinct outward symbols, they worship only one knowledge. Whatever rules they keep, or ways of life they follow, those who have discovered the understanding which has peace and transcendent bliss for its essence attain to the Single Being, even as many rivers flow into the ocean.

The path can be traversed only by using the intellect and the understanding, not the body. The body is bound to action, and actions have beginnings and ends. Hence, blessed wife, you need have no apprehensions about the hereafter. My heart is intent on the true Brahman, and it is into my soul that you will come."'

CANTO 34

'The Brahmana's wife said, "Small is my intelligence, and confused, and uncleansed my soul: I cannot comprehend what you say. Tell me simply how one such as I might come to the knowledge of which you speak. Tell me of the source from which this knowledge flows."

The Brahmana said, "Know that the intelligence devoted to Brahman is the lower arani fire-stick; the preceptor is the upper arani twig; tapasya and the shastras create the friction. From this springs the fire of knowledge."

The Brahmana's wife said, "Where is the symbol of Brahman, which is called Kshetrajna, described, so that it might be seized?"

The Brahmana said, "He is without symbols, and without attributes. Nothing exists that may be regarded as His cause. But I will tell you how or not He can be sensed and found, even as bees do flowers.

The means to discover Him is to first cleanse the understanding through karma. Those whose intellects have not been so cleansed, through their own ignorance invest the Brahman with knowledge and other attributes. The truth is that nowhere is it laid down that this or that should be done or not in order to achieve Mukti.

Knowledge of the Soul arises only in him who sees and hears. Hence, in this world one should experience and understand as many parts, unmanifest and manifest, and past count, as one is capable of comprehending. Indeed, one should comprehend diverse objects of diverse import, and all objects of direct perception. Then, from the long practice of contemplation and self-restraint, there naturally arises the direct, ineffable knowledge of that above which nothing exists, and absorption into it."

Then, through her husband's grace, true understanding came to his wife and, upon the destruction of her illusions, her mind became that which is eternal and transcendent.'

Arjuna says, 'Where is that Brahmana's wife, O Krishna, and where is that greatest of Brahmanas, both of whom attained Mukti? Tell me about them, O you of unfading glory.'

The blessed Lord says, 'Know that my mind is the Brahmana, and that my intellect is the Brahmana's wife. He whom I spoke of as Kshetrajna, the Knower of the field of karma, why, that is me, O Dhananjaya!'"

CANTO 35

"Arjuna says, 'Expound to me the Brahman—that which is the highest object of knowledge. Through your grace, my mind is delighted with these subtle disquisitions.'

Krishna says, 'The old story of the discourse between a guru and his sishya is told on the subject of Brahman. Once upon a time, O scorcher of foes, an intelligent disciple asked a certain Brahmana of rigid vows, who was his guru, as he sat at his ease, "What is the highest good, O my master? Fervently wanting to attain to that which constitutes the highest good, I throw myself at your feet, Holy One. Most learned Brahmana, bowing my head, I beg you to explain to me what I ask."

To that disciple, Partha, his guru replied, "Dvija, I shall explain to you everything about which you may have doubts." Listen, O Kurusottama, you of great intelligence, to what he said.

That ever-devoted sishya said, with folded hands, "Where did I come from? Where did you come from? Explain that which is the highest truth. From what source have all creatures, mobile and unmoving, sprung? By what do creatures live? What is the limit of their life? What is truth? What is penance, O learned Brahmana? What do the good and the wise call the gunas, the attributes? What paths are deemed auspicious? What is happiness? What is sin? Holy One of excellent vows, I beseech you to answer these questions exhaustively and accurately. Who else is there in this world to resolve them? Answer me, O greatest of all knowers of dharma. I burn to know, and you are celebrated through all the worlds as a master of the dharma of Mukti. There is no one more competent to remove every kind of doubt. Terrified by samsara, I have grown anxious to attain Mukti."

Parantapa, Kurusottama, to that disciple who humbly sought instruction, who was, besides devotion to his preceptor, possessed of serenity and self-restraint, who always conducted himself in a manner agreeable to his instructor and so constantly attended his master as to have become almost his shadow, for the sake of that follower who led the life of a Yati and Brahmacharin, O Partha, his wise guru, keeper of the sternest vratas, duly answered all his questions.

The guru said, "All this was declared in ancient days by Brahma himself. Lauded and practised by the greatest of Rishis, and depending on knowledge of the Vedas, it involves considering what constitutes the Real Entity. We regard knowledge to be the highest goal, and renunciation as the best penance. He who knows with certainty the true object of gyana, the unchanging and eternal Atman abiding in all creatures, which is without beginning, end or decay, succeeds in going wherever he wishes and comes to be regarded as supreme.

That learned man who sees all things dwelling in one place and their departure as well, and who sees unity in multifarious creation, succeeds in freeing himself from misery. He who does not covet anything or cherish the least notion of possession, although living in this world, comes to be revered as one with Brahman. He who knows the truth about the qualities of Pradhana, primordial Nature, who knows the creation of all existence, who is divested of the notion of mine-ness and is without pride, succeeds, beyond doubt, in emancipating himself.

Understanding fully that Great Tree which has the unmanifest for its seed and sprout, the intellect for its trunk, higher consciousness of the self for its branches, the senses for the cells whence its twigs issue, the five great elements for its flower-buds, and the gross elements for its smaller boughs; which is eternal, ever rich with leaves and flowers; upon which all existence depends—discerning this, one severs all illusion with the sword of knowledge, attains to immortality and casts off birth and death.

O you of great wisdom, let me tell you about the past, present and future, Dharma, Artha and Kama, all well known to conclaves of Siddhas, which pertain to remote and fathomless cycles of time, and which are, indeed, eternal. These constitute what is called Sanatana Dharma, the highest good. Understanding them in this world, men of wisdom attain to success.

In days of old, the Rishis Brihaspati and Bharadwaja, Gautama and Bhargava, Vasishta and Kashyapa, Viswamitra and Atri, met together in order to question and illumine one another. They came together having traversed every worldly path, and after they had exhausted the karma that each of them had done.

Setting the sage son of Angiras at their head, they journeyed to Brahmaloka, where they saw the resplendent Pitamaha, perfectly cleansed of all sin. Bowing their heads to that Mahatman seated at his ease, the great Rishis, with profound humility, asked him this grave question regarding the highest good.

'How should a good man conduct himself? How could one be released from sin? What paths are auspicious? What is truth, and what is sin? By what deeds are the two paths, northern and southern, obtained? What is destruction? What is Emancipation? What is birth and what is death of all things and beings that exist?'

I will tell you, O sishya, what the Pitamaha said to them, in accord with the Shastras. Do you attend to what I say. Brahma said, 'It is from Truth that all creatures, mobile and immobile, have been born. They live by the penance of karma. Understand this, O you of excellent vows. In consequence of their own actions they live, transcending their own origin. For Truth, when united with gunas, becomes possessed of five attributes.

Brahman is Truth. Tapasya is Truth. Prajapati is Truth. It is from Truth that all creatures have sprung. Truth is the universe of being. It is refuge in Truth that is sought by Brahmanas, who are always devoted to Yoga, who have transcended anger and sorrow, and who always regard Dharma as the high path.

I will tell you of these Brahmanas who are restrained by one another, who possess gyana, and who belong to the four varnasramas. The wise say that Dharma is one, albeit having four parts. Dvijas, I will tell you about the auspicious path which leads to felicity. Men of wisdom have always walked that path in order to find union and identity with Brahman. This is the highest path and exceedingly difficult to comprehend. Hear about it, in every particular, you most blessed ones, and attend to what is the ultimate goal and rest.

The first asrama along the eternal path is brahmacharya; the second is grihasta; then comes vanaprastha, and finally sannyasa, which fetches the aspirant to the Adhyatma. Light, Akasa, the Sun, Wind, Indra and Prajapati—one sees these as long as one does not attain to Adhyatma.

Listen to how you can attain to final Adhyatma, and Mukti. But first understand the other asramas. The vanaprastha dwells in the forest, subsisting upon fruits and roots and, later, air; this asrama is prescribed for the three twice-born varnas. The grihastasrama is ordained for all the varnas. Those who know say that Dharma has Faith for its main component. These are the paths that lead to the Gods, and the good and wise tread them through their karma. These paths are the causeways of piety. One of unwavering vratas, who faithfully follows any of these asramas, becomes enlightened and in time understands the creation and destruction of all creatures.

Hear now about the essences comprising all created things and beings. The Paramatman, the unmanifest, ego, the ten and one organs of knowledge and action, the five mahabhutas, great elements, the specific characteristics of the five elements—these constitute eternal creation. The number of these attributes is four and twenty, and one more.

The man of wisdom, who understands the creation and destruction of all these attributes, that man among all creatures is never deluded. He who understands properly the elements, the qualities, the deities, succeeds in cleansing himself of all sin. Freed from all bonds, such a man enjoys every realm of spotless purity.'"

"Brahma said, 'That which is unmanifest, which is indistinct, all-pervading, everlasting, immutable, is known as the city of nine gates, possessed of the three gunas, consisting of the five elements, and encompassed by the eleven, including the distinguishing mind, with Understanding for its ruler.

The three Nadis in it, the Gunas, are its constant support; these are constant: Tamas, Rajas and Sattva: darkness, passion and purity. They are coupled with one another; they exist, depending on one another; they take refuge in one another, follow one another, and are fused with one another.

The five principal elements, the Panchamahabhutas, are characterized by these three gunas. Sattva is equal to Tamas, and Tamas to Rajas; and Rajas is equal to Sattva, as well. Where Darkness is restrained, Passion is seen to flow; where Passion is restrained, Goodness is seen to flow. All three prevail from time to time over one another.

Tamas has the night, or obscurity, for its essence. Also known as delusion, it has three characteristics. Sin characterizes Tamas, and the dark guna is always present in all sin. Darkness is the essence of Tamas, and it appears in conjunction with the other gunas. Restless activity is the essence of Rajas, which makes for ceaseless doing, when it prevails over the other two Gunas. Splendour, lightness and faith—these are the essence, which is of light, of Sattva, which the good and the wise hold in regard. Listen while I declare to you the true nature of the three Gunas, individually and together, and understand them well.

Complete delusion, ignorance; illiberality, indecisiveness, sleep, haughtiness, fear, greed, grief, the censure of good deeds, loss of memory; unlikeness of judgment, lack of faith, violation of all norms of conduct, want of discrimination, blindness in thought and action, vileness of behaviour, boastful assertions of achievement when there has been no performance at all, presumption of knowledge in actual ignorance, hostility, an evil disposition, foolish reasoning, crookedness, an incapacity for friendship, all-round wickedness, heedlessness, inertia, stubborn inflexibility, lassitude and stupor, lack of self-control, degeneracy—all these are of dark Tamas.

Whatever other states of mind exist in the world and are associated with delusion, all pertain to Tamas. Frequently speaking ill of other people, mocking the Devas and Brahmanas, illiberality, vanity, delusion, wrath, an unforgiving nature, hostility towards all creatures: these, too, are characteristics of Darkness. Undertakings that are without merit, from being vain and useless; gifts which are without value, the giver being unworthy, the time being inappropriate, the gift itself being impure; gluttony—these also belong to Darkness.

Slanderous talk, vanity, lack of forgiveness and faith, and general animosity, are all characteristics of Darkness. All men in this world who are marked by these and other similar faults, and who endlessly flout and violate the restraints laid down by the Shastras, are regarded as belonging to Tamas, the Guna of Darkness.

Hear from me now of the wombs into which men of darkness and sin are forced to take birth. Ordained to hell, they devolve and plunge down into being born in brute species. They become immobile things, or animals, or beasts of burden; carnivores, or snakes, or worms, insects and birds; oviparous creatures, or quadrupeds of diverse kinds; lunatics, deaf or dumb humans, or men afflicted by dreadful maladies and looked upon as unclean. These men of evil, always evincing the signs of their dire sins, plunge deep into darkness, into hellish existence. Their course of rebirths is forever downward. In Tamas they sink into deeper, denser darkness.

There can be redemption even for these, but hear now the means whereby they can rise again towards light and even attain to the realms that exist for men of pious deeds. Sinners who are born into bestial species succeed in redeeming themselves by lingering around the homas and yagnas of true Brahmanas devoted to their svadharma, great souls who wish for the weal of all creatures. Sinful ones who witness the yagnas of such Brahmanas will succeed, verily, in becoming like those Brahmanas themselves. Indeed, they will find Swarga for themselves, as the Vedas have declared.

Born into lower species, growing old and dying after serving their lives as creatures less than human, thus paying for their old sins, they are born into humankind again, likely into the lowest orders. Coming to sinful births and becoming Chandalas or men who are devoid of hearing or speech, they attain to higher and higher castes, over many births, one after another successively, transcending the Sudra varna, and other consequences of old tamasic deeds whose traces abide in the course of its migrations through birth and death.

Attachment to the objects of desire is delusion. Here, even Rishis and Munis and Devas become misguided, plunging madly after pleasure. Darkness, deception, the great delusion, the great obscurity called wrath, and then death, that blinding oblivion—these are the five great afflictions. As for wrath, that is the great darkness, not aversion or hatred as is sometimes told.

Learned Dvijas, I have now told you about the colour, the source and the nature of Tamas. Who is there that truly understands it? Who truly sees it? Why, that is the very essence of the Dark Guna: seeing as reality that which is far from real. Yes, I have described Tamas to you, in various ways, its higher and lower forms. And he who is always aware of the nature of Tamas will surely one day free himself from everything that belongs to Darkness.'"

"Brahma said, 'Best of beings, hear now from me about Rajas, which is the Guna of Passion.

Most blessed ones, these are the characteristics of Rajas: injuring others, beauty, striving, pleasure and pain, cold and heat, lordship and power, war, peace, disputations, dissatisfaction, endurance, might, valour, pride, wrath, exertion, confrontations, jealousy, desire, malice, battle, the sense of mine and mine-ness, protection of others, slaughter, bonds, affliction, buying and selling, dissevering, piercing the armour of enemies, spilling blood, fierceness, cruelty, vilifying, pointing out the faults of others, being immersed in worldly affairs, anxiety, animosity, reviling others, false speech, false or vain gifts, hesitancy and doubt, boastfulness, praise and censure, laudation, prowess, defiance, attendance on the sick and the weak, obedience to the commands of preceptors and parents, service or ministrations, harbouring thirst and desire, cleverness and adroitness of conduct, strategy, heedlessness, contumely, possessions, and diverse embellishments and adornments which prevail in the world among men, women, animals, inanimate things, houses, grief, incredulousness, vows and regulations, actions with the expectation of their fruits, diverse deeds of public charity, the rites of Swaha salutations, the rituals of Swadha and Vashat, officiating at the sacrifices of others, imparting instruction, performance of yagnas, study, the making of gifts, acceptance of gifts, rites of expiation, other auspicious deeds, the wish to win, affection engendered by the merits of a thing or person, treachery, deception, disrespect and respect, theft, killing, secrecy and concealment, vexation, wakefulness, ostentation, haughtiness, attachment, devotion, contentment, exultation, gambling, indulgence in scandal, all matters and relations arising out of women, attachment to dance, music and song—all these, learned Brahmanas, have been said to belong to the Rajoguna.

Men on Earth who reflect on the past, present and future, who are devoted to Dharma, Artha and Kama, who are driven by desire, exult in affluence that gratifies their every wish, are enveloped by the Guna of Passion. These men have downward courses. Repeatedly reborn into this world, they give themselves up to pleasure. They covet what belongs to this world as well as the fruit of the hereafter. They make gifts, accept gifts, offer oblations to the Pitris, and pour libations on the sacrificial fire. These are the ways of Rajas, in their variety. I have also described the karma that Rajas generates. The man who rightly understands the Rajoguna and what it entails succeeds in freeing himself from all that belongs to Passion.'"

"Brahma said, 'Attend now to the nature and indications of the third Guna, Sattva. It is rightful, beneficial to all creatures in the world, and constitutes the conduct of the good.

Joy, satisfaction, nobility, enlightenment, happiness, liberality, fearlessness, contentment, faith, forgiveness, courage, non-violence, equability, truth, straightforwardness, the absence of wrath, the absence of malice, purity, intelligence, prowess—these are the hallmarks of the Sattva Guna. He who is devoted just to the dharma of Yoga, who regards knowledge to be vain, conduct, social service and even the varnasrama to be vain, attains to what is highest in the world hereafter. Freedom from the notion of mine-ness, freedom from egoism, freedom from expectations and desire, and looking upon all things with an equal eye—these constitute the eternal religion of the good.

Confidence, modesty, forgiveness, renunciation, purity, absence of laziness, cruelty and delusion, compassion for all creatures, absence of a disposition to slander, exultation, satisfaction, rapture, humility, natural good conduct, purity in all actions which have the attainment of peace for their aim, righteous understanding, freedom from attachments, dispassion, continence, complete renunciation, freedom from the very thought of possessions, freedom from expectations, unbroken observance of righteousness, belief that gifts are in vain, sacrifices are in vain, study is in vain, vows are in vain, receiving gifts is in vain, the observance of one's svadharma is in vain, and that penances are in vain—those Brahmanas in this world whose demeanour is marked by these virtues, who adhere to dharma, who abide in the Vedas, are said to be wise and possessed of true vision.

Casting off all sins and freed from grief, men of wisdom attain to Swarga and create diverse bodies for themselves. Attaining the great powers of self-governance and restraint, of anima, or minuteness, these high-souled ones create through the operation of their own minds, like the Devas themselves who dwell in Swargaloka. Such men follow paths that lead them ever upwards, evolving constantly. They are veritable gods who can change all things. Attaining Heaven, they transform whatever they wish by their very nature. They acquire and enjoy whatever objects they choose.

Best of all Dvijas, these are the ways of those who live in the Sattva Guna. Understanding these, one gains whatever one desires. The virtues of the Sattva Guna have been particularly enumerated, described and lauded, as well as the nature and conduct of those whom this attribute of Goodness rules. The man who lives in the knowledge of these, enjoys all things without any vestige of attachment.'"

CANTO 39

"Brahma said, 'These Gunas are not entirely separate from one another. Rajas, Sattva and Tamas are always found in a state of union. They are attached to one another. They depend on one another. They have one another for their refuge. They follow one another.

As long as Sattva exists, so does Rajas; there is not doubt about this. As long as Tamas and Sattva exist, so does Rajas. They make their journey together, in union, moving collectively. They move in a body, whenever they act, with or without cause. However, they do not have equal influence; at any time, one or the other dominates. But the manner in which they increase and diminish will now be declared.

Where Tamas dominates, in the lower creatures, the beasts, Rajas has a lesser sway, and Sattva still less. Where Rajas is copious, in creatures of middling evolution, Tamas has lesser power, and Sattva still less. Where Sattva rules abundantly, in creatures of higher evolution, of upward courses, Tamas and Rajas are diminished.

Sattva is the fount that restrains the senses. It is the great enlightener. No dharma has been laid down that is higher than Sattva. They who abide in Sattva evolve upwards; who dwell in Rajas remain on a middling course; and whom Tamas rules, constantly devolve. Tamas prevails in the Sudra; Rajas in the Kshatriya; and the Sattva Guna, the highest, in the Brahmana. The three co-exist thus in the three varnas. Even upon a cursory view, the three are seen to exist in union, never in a state of separation.

Seeing the Sun rise, evil men are gripped by fear; evil ones belong to Tamas, to darkness and night. Heat torments wayfarers. The sun is the highest Sattva; heat is Rajas. Surya is Sattva; Agni is Rajas; while the solar eclipse on Parvana days is the time of Tamas.

The three Gunas dwell in all bodies of light. They act by turns in diverse places in different ways. Tamas exists in great measure in inert, unmoving things. Rajas is marked by constant activity and change. Quiescence and calm characterize the Sattva Guna.

Threefold is the Day; the Night, as well, has been ordained to be threefold. So also are fortnights, months, years, seasons and conjunctions. All the gifts of life, all daana, are triune. Threefold is sacrifice that flows. Three are the worlds; three the great gods; threefold the paths, and triune is knowledge.

Consider: the past, the present and the future; Dharma, Artha and Kama; Prana, Apana, and Udana: all these are also fraught with the three Gunas. All that exists in this world is permeated and ruled by the three Gunas, acting and prevailing by turn in all things and all circumstances, and always in unmanifest form.

Endless is the creation of the three Gunas, Sattva, Rajas and Tamas. The Unmanifest, which subsumes the three, is darkness, uttermost mystery, unperceived, holy, constant, unborn, the womb, eternal, Prakriti, change, decay, death, Pradhana, creation, absorption, vastness, immutable, unmoving, being and non-being: those who meditate upon the Atman should know all these as being names for That. He who properly knows these names for the Unmanifest, and the Gunas, as well as the pristine workings of the three, knows the truth about all duality and distinction; freed from the body, he is liberated from the Gunas and arrives at absolute freedom and undying bliss.'"

CANTO 40

"Brahma said, 'From the unmanifest first sprang Mahat, the Great Soul, endowed with measureless Intelligence, and this was the source of the Gunas. That was the first creation. Mahat is Paramatman, it is Intelligence, Vishnu, Jishnu, Sambhu of boundless valour, Intellect, the means of acquiring knowledge, the means of perception, as also fame, courage and memory. Knowing this, a wise Brahmana never encounters delusion.

Mahat has hands and feet on every side; he has ears everywhere. He stands pervading everything in the universe. Of great power, that Being is in the heart of all. Minuteness, lightness and affluence are his. He is the lord of all, identical with light, and he is Akshara, who knows no decay.

In Him dwell all who comprehend the nature of the final understanding, who are devoted to goodness, absorbed in dhyana, devoted to Yoga, who are firm in truth, who have subdued their senses, who are possessed of true knowledge and free from greed, who have conquered anger, who are ever of cheerful heart, who are blessed with wisdom, who are not bound by notions of mine and yours, and who are free of egoism.

These, all the bonds of attachment severed, attain to real and singular greatness. The one who attains that sacred and highest goal, the Paramatman, is liberated from delusion, from this worldly samsara.

The Self-born Vishnu is the Lord of the first creations. He who knows the Lord lying in the cave, the Supreme, Ancient Being, of Universal Form, the Golden One, the ultimate goal of all the wise—that most intelligent man comes to life eternal, transcending the mind and the intellect as well.'"

CANTO 41

"Brahma said, 'The first and original Mahat was Ego. When it came into being as I, it was the second creation. Mahat is the source of all creatures, for these have issued from its modifications. It is pure effulgence and the supporter of consciousness. It is Prajapati. It is a deity, the Creator of gods, and of Mind. It is that which creates the three worlds. It is that which feels, "I am all this".

Mahat is the eternal refuge for sages who are content with knowledge relating to the soul, Rishis who have meditated on the Atman and found success through Vedic study and sacrifices. Through the consciousness of the Atman, beings enjoy the Gunas. That source of all creatures, that Creator of all creatures, creates them through the Gunas; Mahat is the fount of all change, and the flow of time. It illuminates the universe with its own light.'"

"Brahma said, 'From Mahat came the Panchamahabhutas, the five great elements: earth, air, ether, water, and the fifth, light. By these, and through sound, touch, colour, taste and smell, all creatures are deluded. When at the destruction of the Mahabhutas, the dissolution of the universe approaches, O you wise ones, a great fear comes over all living creatures. Every existence dissolves into that from which it is created. The Pralaya reverses the process of creation, drawing back what Mahat once put forth.

Indeed, Creation and Dissolution are born from one another. When all creation, mobile and unmoving, is dissolved, wise men endowed with profound Memory remain untouched. Sound, touch, colour, taste and smell are impermanent and known as Maya, delusion. Caused by desire, unreal, not differing from one another, depending upon one another, connected to flesh and blood and existing outside the soul, these are powerless in themselves.

Prana and Apana, Udana, Samana and Vyana, these five life-breaths are always closely attached to the Atman. Together with speech, mind and understanding, they constitute the universe of eight ingredients. He whose skin, nose, ear, eyes, tongue and speech are restrained, whose understanding does not stray from the true and eternal path, whose mind is pure and never burnt by the eight fires, succeeds in attaining to the most hallowed and auspicious Brahman, beyond which nothing exists.

Hear now about the sensual eleven organs that have sprung from Mahat. They are the ear, the skin, the two eyes, the tongue, the nose, the two feet, the anus, the organ of generation, the two hands, the tenth, speech and the eleventh, the mind. These constitute the group of organs that the seeker must first subdue. Then Brahman will shine forth in him. Five amongst these eleven are called organs of knowledge, and five, organs of action. The five that begin with the ear are linked to knowledge. The rest, however, which have to do with action, are without distinction. The mind belongs to both. The intellect, or understanding, is the twelfth, and the highest. Learned men, having plumbed these, feel they have accomplished everything.

I will describe these now for you, individually.

Akasa, ethereal space, is the first element. The ear signifies it; sound expresses it. The Four Quarters rule over this element.

Vayu, the wind, is the next Mahabhuta. Skin is its sense; touch its manifestation; and touch is its Lord as well.

The third element is Light. Its sense is the eye; among perceptions it is colour; and the Sun is its ruler.

The fourth element is Jala, water; it is signified by the tongue; in the perceived world, taste; and Soma, the Moon, has lordship over it.

Bhumi, earth, is the fifth bhuta; the nose is its organ; scent its perception; and Vayu rules over it.

Thus, the five elements each have three components. Now hear about the other organs. Brahmanas who know the truth say that the two feet are emblems of the Atman; movement are their expression; and Vishnu rules them.

The Apana Vayu, whose motion is downward, is the lower vent, the anal; excretion is its expression; and Mitra has lordship over it.

The generative organ, the linga, is the vital seed; and Prajapati is its Lord.

The two hands, again, denote the soul; karma, deeds, signify them; and Indra rules them.

Speech, Vak, relates to all the Devas; it is whatever is uttered; Agni rules over it.

Manas, the mind, moves within the the five elements. It is thought, and Chandramasa, the Moon is its Lord. It is Ahamkara, the Ego which causes all Samsara, this worldly life. It is consciousness of selfhood; and Rudra is its Lord.

The Intellect, Mahat, impels the six senses. It is that which is to be understood, and its ruling deity there is Brahma.

All existence is founded in three elements, and there is no fourth. These are land, water and ether. Fourfold is the way of all birth. Some are born of eggs; some are born of seeds, germs, which spring up through the earth; some are born of the earth itself; and some are born of wombs. All living creatures are born in one of these four ways.

There are inferior species and those that range the sky. These are known to emerge from eggs, as are those that crawl on their breasts. Insects and the like are born from earth, swamp and filth. This is said to be the second manner of birth and is inferior. Creatures that sprout bursting through ground after lying dormant for a time are the seed- and germ-born ones. Creatures with two or several legs and feet, and also those that move crookedly, are the womb-born ones; and some among them are malformed.

Of two kinds is the eternal womb of Brahma: tapasya and punya karma. This is the doctrine of the wise. For all who are born, the ancients have taught, karma is of various kinds, such as sacrifice, gifts made at sacrifices, and the exemplary meritorious duty of study. One who understands this, comes to be regarded as being possessed of Yoga; such a man is freed from all his sins. This is the doctrine of Adhyatma.

O Munis who know dharma deeply, those that know Adhyatma are considered true Gyanis. Unite the senses, the objects of the senses, and the five great elements, and restrain them in the mind through dhyana; when all things are reduced in dhyana, one no longer regards the pleasures of life. Wise men of knowledge regard Adhyatma, inner joy, as the only true happiness.

Hear me now about renunciation for all beings by means both gentle and difficult, relinquishment leading to attachment to what is subtle and spiritual, fraught with auspiciousness. To treat the Gunas as being without essence in themselves, to free oneself from worldly attachments, and to lead a solitary life which recognizes no distinctions, but which is replete with Brahman, is to reach the source of all real, eternal happiness.

The learned man who absorbs all desires into himself, from all sides, even like the tortoise withdrawing all its limbs, or the imperturbable Ocean that absorbs the rivers flowing into it, who is liberated from samsara and without passion becomes perennially happy, Sadananda. Restraining all desires within the soul, destroying his thirst, concentrated in dhyana, and being a good-hearted friend to all creation, he becomes fit to be absorbed into Brahman.

By abandoning inhabited places and firmly repressing the wild senses which ever hanker after their objects of pleasure, the man of contemplation causes the Adhyatma fire to blaze forth in him. As a fire fed with fuel burns bright, even so, from restraining the senses, the immortal Atman puts forth its transcendent effulgence. When a man of tranquil soul beholds all entities in his own heart, then by the pristine light of his own Self he attains to that which is subtler than the subtle, and without equal: the final Being.

The body has Agni, fire, for colour; Jala, water, for blood and other fluids; Vayu, air, for the sense of touch; Bhumi, earth, for the gross sheath of the mind—flesh and bones; Akasa, ether, for sound. This body of flesh and blood is pervaded by disease and sorrow; it is overwhelmed by five currents, the five elements; it has nine doors and two deities; it is rife with passion; it is made up of the three gunas; its unholy nature renders it unfit to even be seen; it has three constituent elements, vata, pitta and kapha, wind, bile and phlegm; it delights in attachments of every kind; and it is full of delusions.

It is difficult to move in the mortal world that rests on Mahat as its support. The body is, in this world, the wheel of Time that continually revolves. It is a horrible and unfathomable ocean called maya, delusion. It is this body that stretches, contracts, and awakens the very universe with the Immortals. By restraining the senses, one casts off lust, wrath, fear, greed, enmity and falsehood, which are perennial and, therefore, most difficult to relinquish. He who, in this world, subdues the three gunas and the panchabhutas of the body, has the Brahman for his seat. He attains to Infinity. Crossing the river that has the five senses for its steep banks, the mental inclinations for its waters, and delusion for its great lake, one must conquer both lust and anger. Such a man, freed from all faults, then beholds the Highest, his mind concentrated within the Mind, and seeing the Self in himself.

Understanding all things, he sees his own eternal Atman in all creatures, at times as one and at others as many, changing form from time to time. He perceives the many like countless lights emanating from and belonging to the one Light. Verily he is Vishnu, and Mitra, and Varuna, and Agni, and Prajapati. He is the Creator and the Ordainer: he is the Lord possessed of ineffable puissance, with faces turned in all directions. In him, the heart of all creatures, the Paramatman, becomes resplendent. He is praised by all conclaves of learned Brahmanas, Devas and Asuras, Yakshas and Pisachas, the Pitris and Pakshis, tribes of Rakshasas and bands of ghostly beings, and all the great Rishis.'"

"Brahma said, 'Among men, the royal Kshatriya is endowed with Rajas, the middle Guna; among mounts, the elephant; among denizens of the forest, the lion; among all sacrificial animals, the sheep; among all those that live in holes, the snake; among cattle, the bull; among feminine creatures, the mule.

In this world, the Nyagrodha, the Jambu, the Pipala, the Salmali, and Sensapa, the Meshasringa and the Kichaka are the foremost among trees. The greatest of mountains are Himavat, Patipatra, Sahya, Vindhya, Trikutavat, Sweta, Nila, Bhasa, Koshthavat, Guruskandha, Mahendra and Malayavat. Likewise, the Maruts are the first among the Ganas. Surya is the Lord of all the planets, and Chandramas of all the constellations. Yama is the Lord of the Pitris; Sagara is the Lord of all rivers. Varuna is the king of the waters. Indra is the king of the Maruts. Arka is the king of all hot bodies, and Indra of all luminous ones. Agni is the eternal Lord of the elements, and Brihaspati of the Brahmanas. Soma is the Lord of plants and herbs, and Vishnu is the greatest of those endowed with might.

Tashtri is the king of Rudras, and Siva of all creatures. Yagna is the foremost of all initiatory rites, and Maghavat of the Devas. The North is the Lord of all the points of the compass; Soma of great energy is the Lord of all learned Brahmanas. Kubera is the Lord of all precious gems, and Purandara of all the other Devas. Such is the highest creation among all entities.

Prajapati is the Lord of all creatures. Of all entities, I, who am full of Brahman, am the foremost. There is none higher than myself or Vishnu.

The great Vishnu, who is full of Brahman, is the King of kings, above all. Know him to be the ruler, the Creator, the uncreated Hari. He is the ruler of men and Kinnaras, Yakshas and Gandharvas, Nagas and Rakshasas, Devas and Danavas.

Among those followed and worshipped by men full of desire is the great Goddess Maheswari of beautiful eyes. She is also called Parvati. Know that the Devi Uma is the highest and the most auspicious of women. Among women that are a source of pleasure, the best are the Apsaras who possess great splendour.

Kings always wish to acquire piety, and Brahmanas are causeways of piety. Therefore, the king should always strive to protect the twice-born ones. Kings in whose dominions good men languish are regarded as bereft of the virtues of their order. In the hereafter, such kings are forced to tread dark and sinful paths. Kings in whose dominions good men are protected, rejoice in this world and enjoy happiness in the hereafter. Such Mahatman Rajarishis attain to the Highest. Understand this well, O Dvijottamas.

Now listen to the eternal indications of dharma. Non-violence, abstaining from harming any living being, is the highest dharma. Violence is the sign of unrighteousness, of adharma.

Splendour is the nature of the Devas. Men have karma for their way. Akasa has sound for its characteristic; Wind has touch; colour belongs to light, and taste to Water. Earth, which supports all beings, has smell for its characteristic. Words belong to Speech, refined into vowels and consonants. Mind has thought, while thought belongs to Buddhi, the Intellect. Whatever the mind thinks of, is verified by the Intellect. There is no doubt that Mahat, through perseverance, perceives all things.

Dhyana, meditation, is inherent to the mind. The way of the good man, the Yogi, is to live unperceived. Devotion, Bhakti, has karma for its means. Knowledge is the emblem of renunciation. Keeping knowledge in view, the man of understanding, the Gyani, observes renunciation. The man who has truly renounced, who has real knowledge, who transcends all the pairs of opposites, as also darkness, death and decrepitude, attains to Brahman, the highest goal. All this is dharma, and the paths of duty.

Listen now to the perception of the qualities. Smell, that appertains to Earth, is perceived by the nose. The air dwelling in the nose is the agent in the perception of smell. Taste is the essence of water; the tongue, in which Soma dwells, perceives taste. The essence of light is colour, which the eye perceives. Aditya, who dwells in the eye, perceives colour.

Touch, Sparsha, pertains to Vayu, and is sensed by the skin. The quality of Akasa is sound, which is seized by the ear. All the Quarters, which dwell in the ear, have been appointed to apprehend sound. The quality of the mind is thought, which is known by the Intellect. The upholder of consciousness, Chit, living in the heart, apprehends the mind. Buddhi is known through determination or certitude, and Mahat in the form of Gyana, knowledge.

Unperceived, pristine Prakriti is the knower of all things that transcend certitude—of this have no doubt. The Kshetrajna, which is eternal and Nirguna, without attributes, cannot be known by symbols: the Kshetrajna is pure knowledge. The Unmanifest dwells in the symbol called the Kshetra, and is that in which the worlds and its qualities are created and absorbed. I always see that Brahman, and hear it, although it is hidden. Purusha knows it: therefore is he called Kshetrajna.

The Kshetrajna also perceives the activity of the Gunas, as well as their absence. The Gunas, which are created repeatedly, have no intelligence of their own and do not recognize themselves or the entities in the constant process of creation, fraught with a beginning, middle and end. No one other than the Kshetrajna attains to that which is the Highest, the Brahman transcending the Gunas and all that are born from them. He who fathoms dharma, casting off the Gunas, and indeed the Intellect or Mahat, and thereby has all his sins destroyed, he enters into the Kshetrajna, the final Knower.

He who is free from all the pairs of opposites, who never bows his head to anyone, who is divested of Swaha, who is immutable and homeless, is the Kshetrajna. He is the Supreme Lord.'"

CANTO 44

"Brahma said, 'Hear now the truth about all that has a beginning, middle and end, and which has a name and attributes, as also the means of apprehension.

The Day was first; then arose Night. The Months have the lit, waxing fortnights first. Among constellations Sravana is first; Winter, of dew, is first among the Seasons. Bhumi is the source of all scent; and Jala of all tastes. Surya is the source of all colours, and Vayu of all sensations of touch. Of sound, the source is Akasa. These are the qualities of elements.

Listen now to which are the first and the highest of all entities. Of luminaries, Surya is the first. Agni is foremost among the elements. Savitri is the first of all branches of learning. Prajapati is the Lord of all the Devas. Prana, the life-wind, is the first of all winds. The syllable Om, is the first of all the Vedas; the life-wind Prana is the first among all winds.

All that is called Savitri which is prescribed as worship in this world. The Gayatri is the first of all mantras; of yagnapasus, the goat; among four-legged creatures, the cow; among humans, Dvijas; among birds, the eagle. The first sacrifice is the pouring of ghrita into the sacred fire.

Of reptiles the foremost is the snake. The Krita is the first of all the Yugas; of this there is no doubt. Gold is the best among all precious things; barley among plants. Food is the first of all that is eaten, and water of all that is drunk.

Of all immobile creations, the Plaksha is the first, that ever-holy field of Brahman. Of all Prajapatis I, Brahma, am the first. The self-created Svayambhuva Vishnu is my superior. Of mountains, great Meru is the first-born; of the cardinal and subsidiary points of the horizon, the East; among rivers, Ganga of three courses; of water bodies, the Ocean.

Iswara is the supreme Lord of all the Devas Danavas, and Pisachas, Nagas and Rakshasas, Manavas, Kinnaras and Yakshas. Mahavishnu, who is full of Brahman, than whom there is no higher being in the three worlds, is the first in all the universe.

Of the varnasramas, the grihastasrama is the best; the Unmanifest Brahma is the source of all the worlds as, indeed, the end of everything. Days end with the sun's setting and nights with the sun's rising. The end of pleasure is always sorrow, and the end of sorrow, pleasure. All accumulations have exhaustion for their end, and all ascents end in falls.

All associations have dissociation for their end, and life has death. All karma ends in destruction, and all that is born is certain to die. Every mobile and immobile thing in this world is transient. Sacrifice, gift, penances, study, vows and sacred observances: all these have destruction for their end. Only true Knowledge has no end. Hence, one possessed of a tranquil soul, who has conquered his senses, who is freed from the sense of ownership, devoid of egoism, is released from all his sins by pure knowledge.'" "Brahma said, 'The wheel of life turns on. It has Mahat for its strength; Manas is the axle-rod on which it revolves; the senses are its fetters, the Panchamahabhutas are its nave, and Samsara is its round. It is overwhelmed by decrepitude and grief, and has diseases and calamities for its progeny. That wheel revolves in time and place; toil and action are the great noise it makes. Day and Night are the rotations of that wheel; heat and cold encircle it. Pleasure and pain fire its joints, and hunger and thirst are the nails which secure it. Sunshine and shade are the ruts it makes; it can be stirred in the blink of an eye.

The terrible waters of delusion envelop the wheel; blindly, ceaselessly it revolves, without consciousness. It is measured by months and fortnights. Being ever-changing, it is irregular; and it spins through all the worlds. Penances and vows are its mud. Passion's force is its mover. It is illuminated by great Ahamkara, and sustained by the Gunas.

Frustration at unfulfilled desires are the fastenings that bind it firm; it turns in the midst of grief and death, and is endowed with deeds and their instruments by which deeds are performed. It is large and is ever extended by attachments; desire and greed make it unsteady.

The Wheel is created by manifold Ignorance, attended upon by fear and illusion, and binds all beings with maya, the great delusion. It moves towards joy and pleasure, and has desire and wrath for its possessions. It consists of creations beginning with Mahat, down to the gross elements. It is characterized by ceaseless creation and destruction. Its speed is like that of the mind, and it has the mind for its frontiers.

This wheel of life, which is associated with pairs of opposites and devoid of consciousness, the universe with the very Immortals, should be cast off. Among all creatures, the man who understands properly the motion and stoppage of this wheel of life is never deluded. Freed from all impressions, sensory and of the mind, divested of all pairs of opposites, released from all sins, he attains to the highest goal.

Grihasta, Brahmacharya, Vanaprastha and Sannyasa—these four asramas of life all have the Grihastasrama for their foundation. Whatever codes of law are prescribed in this world, their observance is beneficial and always highly regarded. He who has first been purified by rituals, who has duly observed vratas, who is well-born, and who understands the Vedas, must return from his Guru's house after his tutelage and marry.

Then, devoted to his wedded spouse, conducting himself with dharma, with his senses restrained, and full of faith, he must perform the five sacrifices. He is known as a righteous man, a Sishta, who eats what remains after feeding the gods and his guests, who faithfully observes Vedic rites and within his means performs sacrifices and makes gifts, who is not unduly active with hands and feet or with his eye, who is devoted to tapasya, who does not speak too much and who knows his bounds.

One should always wear the sacred thread and clean white clothes, carry a bamboo-staff, and a kamandalu of holy water, keep pure vows and associate with good men in satsanga. Giving daana and practising self-restraint all the while, a man's conduct must be worthy; his appetite and lust should be firmly controlled, and he should practise universal compassion.

Having studied, the good man must teach; he should perform yagnas himself and officiate at the sacrifices of others. He should give with a pure heart gifts he himself has received. These six should always characterize the man of dharma's life. Three of these should constitute the livelihood of the Brahmana: teaching, officiating at the sacrifices of others, and accepting gifts from good men. As for the other three, the giving of gifts, study, and sacrifice—these are earners of punya.

Performing tapasya, being self-restrained, living with universal compassion and forgiveness, and looking upon all creatures with an equal eye—the man who knows dharma never neglects these three. The learned Brahmana of pure heart, who lives in the Grihastasrama, while keeping firm vows, devoted and discharging all duties to the best of his power, surely attains to Swarga.'"

"Brahma said, 'Duly studying thus to the best of his power, and living as a Brahmacharin, he who is devoted to his svadharma, who is learned, observes penances with senses restrained, always does what is agreeable and beneficial to his Guru, remains pure and steadfast in the practice of dharma, should, with the leave of his master, eat whatever food he receives, never decrying it.

He should eat havishya made from what he receives as alms, and should stand, sit and move as his preceptor directs him. He should pour libations on the fire twice a day with a concentrated mind after purifying himself. He should always carry a staff made of the wood of the bilwa or the palasa. The robes of the regenerate man should be of linen, cotton or deer-skin, or in hue entirely brown-red. He should also have a sacred girdle made of munja grass.

He must wear jata, matted locks, on his head, and perform his ablutions every day. He must don the sacred thread, study the scriptures, divest himself of greed, and be firm and unwavering in the observance of vratas. He must gratify the Devas with oblations of pure water, his mind restrained as he does so.

Such a Brahmacharin is indeed worthy of praise. His mind fixed in dhyana and his vital seed drawn up, he that is so dedicated succeeds in conquering Swarga. Having attained the highest place, he need not return to birth. Cleansed by every purificatory rite, and having lived as a Brahmacharin, he should leave his village and dwell as a vanaprastha in the forest, never again returning to an inhabited place. He should perform his ablutions morning and evening, clad in animal skin or the bark of trees. Honouring guests when they come, he should offer them shelter and sustain himself on fruits, leaves, common roots and syamaka. Depending on the regulations of his initiation, and abjuring sloth, he must subsist on such water as he finds, on the produce of the forest, or on air.

Without hesitation or reservation, he should offer roots and fruit, or whatever other food he may have to his guests, honouring them as gods come to his dwelling. Observing silence, he must eat only after gratifying with food the gods and his guests.

His mind must be free of any trace of envy. He should allow his hair and beard to grow freely, eat just enough to sustain his body, and depend upon the gods. Self-restrained, ever forgiving, practising universal compassion, performing regular sacrifices and devoting himself to the study of the scriptures, he observes the dharma of truth.

His body always pure, his senses restrained, owning true intelligence, his mind focused in dhyana, the vanaprastha attains to the highest felicity. A grihasta, brahmacharin or vanaprastha who seeks Moksha must lead a life of exemplary conduct. Swearing non-violence towards every living thing, he must relinquish all karma, contribute to the happiness of all creatures, practise universal friendliness, subdue his passions and senses, and lead a chaste life. He must make a fire and subsist upon food obtained without asking and without exertion, which has come to him spontaneously.

He must make his round of mendicancy in places where the cooking fire has been extinguished and no smoke curls any longer from it, and where the household has already eaten. He who knows the path of Mukti seeks alms only after the cooking vessels have been washed. He never rejoices when he receives anything, nor is he dejected when he does not. He waits for the proper time to set out on his round of seeking alms just enough to support life, with his mind controlled and serene. The ascetic does not seek earnings as others do, nor does he eat when honoured; rather, he conceals himself in order to shun gifts of honour. He should not partake of the leavings of another's meal or eat anything bitter, astringent, pungent or sweet. He should eat only as much as he needs to keep himself alive.

He who knows about Nirvana never deprives another creature of its nourishment while seeking his own. He cannot stay with friends or kin, nor ever accumulate any possessions. On his rounds of mendicancy, he ought not to follow another who is also out begging alms or make a parade of his piety, but seek seclusion in an empty house or a mountain cave or a forest, at the foot of a tree or beside a river, freed from passion. In summer, he must pass only one night in an inhabited place; during the rains he may remain in one place, but otherwise he must be always on the move, like a worm on the face of the earth, his path pointed out by the sun. Out of compassion for all living creatures, he should walk with his gaze directed to the earth.

The man on the path of liberation performs all his daily kriyas with pure sanctified water, his ablutions with clean water fetched from a river or drawn from a well or tank. Ahimsa, brahmacharya, truth, simplicity, freedom from anger, self-restraint, naturally and habitually never speaking harshly to anyone, and never speaking ill of anyone behind their backs: the man who seeks Mukti cleaves to these eight vows unwaveringly.

He must be sinless, without falsehood or deceit. Abjuring any attachment, he must offer any guest who comes to him whatever food he can, while he himself eats just enough to support his life. He should eat only food he has obtained by righteous means, and never from the dictates of desire. He should accept by way of alms only food and the simplest clothing, no more than meet his barest needs.

He must not accept gifts or make them but, out of compassion for all fellow creatures, always share whatever he has. The man of wisdom can never appropriate what belongs to another, nor take anything without being asked and, having enjoyed anything, he must never become so attached to its pleasure that he desires it again. Indeed, when he wishes to perform any rite or make an offering he can only take earth and water, stones and leaves, flowers and fruits which belong to no one, and only as they come to him. He cannot make his livelihood as an artisan, nor should he covet gold or wealth of any kind.

He must be without resentment, refrain from preaching, and keep himself away from polemics. He must have no belongings and eat only what is consecrated with faith. He must never enter into intimate relations of any sort with any creature, or perform or enable any action that involves expectation of fruits or destruction of life or hoarding of material goods. Truly, he must live a life like amrita. Rejecting all objects, content with very little, he should range homeless over the earth, viewing and treating equally all creatures and things around him, moving and immobile.

He whom all creatures trust is regarded as the best of those who understand the way of Moksha. He can never cause hurt or annoyance to another, and is himself never irate with anyone. He must neither dwell on the past nor feel anxious about the future, but live wholly in the moment, detached, his mind absorbed in dhyana. Neither with eyes, thought nor speech should he defile anything or anyone, nor commit any offence, either openly or in secret.

Withdrawing his senses like the tortoise its limbs, he should make his mind one-pointed, develop a profoundly serene heart and disposition, and seek to master every subject. Freed from all the pairs of opposites, pleasure and pain, joy and grief, heat and cold, never bending his head in reverence, abstaining from rites that require the utterance of Swaha, he unshackles himself from ahamkara, and mine-ness. With a cleansed soul, he must have no desires, neither to acquire what he does not have, nor to safeguard what he does. Without expectations, divested of the gunas, wedded to tranquillity, he repudiates the slightest attachment and depends on no one.

Attached to his Atman and nothing besides, knowing all things, one is certain to attain Nirvana. He surely escapes death who has experienced the Atman, which is without flesh, which has no hands or feet or back, no head and no belly; experiences no smell, taste, or touch, no colour, no sound; which transcends the functions of the three gunas and is absolute, untainted and unchanging; which can only be known directly as the final achievement; which is unattached and beyond fear, unfading and divine; and, lastly, which, though dwelling in one body, yet dwells in every living being and thing.

There the Intellect does not reach, nor the senses, nor the gods, nor the Vedas, nor Yagnas, nor regions of bliss, nor tapasya, nor vratas. The attainment of Mukti by men of true Gyana is ineffable, beyond comprehension, or expression in symbols. Hence the man who knows the nature of what is beyond symbols should observe the truths of dharma.

The learned man, becoming a grihasta, adopts conduct conforming to the true knowledge. Though beyond maya, he must practise dharma even as though he is deluded by this life, never finding fault with it. He might even live in such pious conformity that others find fault with him. He who lives thus is known to be the greatest of sages.

The senses, the objects of the senses, the five great elements, mind, intellect, ego, the Unmanifest, and Purusha—it is after fathoming all these rightly that the seeker is freed from all bonds and attains Nirvana. He who knows the Truth, and has transcended his bondage, must, at the hour of his death, meditate upon the One. Then, depending on no other, he comes to Moksha. Freed like the wind in space, with all his accumulated karma exhausted and no distress of any kind, he attains to his highest goal.'"

CANTO 47

"Brahma said, 'The ancients who were utterers of verities say that Vairagya, Renunciation, is real penance. Brahmanas who dwell in that which originates in Brahman, understand Knowledge to be the Parabrahman, the First, the eternal. Brahman is the distant, final goal, and its attainment depends also upon knowledge of the Vedas. It is free from all the pairs of opposites, it is Nirguna, without qualities and attributes; it is eternal; it is endowed with qualities beyond cognition: it is Supreme. It is through gyana and tapasya that men of wisdom behold that Highest.

Verily, they of untainted mind, they who are cleansed of every sin and have transcended all passion and darkness, attain to that Immortal Place. They who remain devoted to renunciation, and who know the deepest truths of the Vedas, through penance find the Supreme Lord who is peace and bliss. Penance, it has been said, is light; a good life leads to piety; true knowledge is the highest aim and being. Renunciation is the best penance. He who understands the Atman through discerning things accurately, the imperturbable Self, identical with Knowledge, which resides in all entities, becomes ubiquitous. The learned man who perceives attachment and detachment, and the underlying unity in diversity, is released from suffering.

He who desires nothing, who despises nothing, can be absorbed into Brahman even while living in this world. He who knows the truths about Pradhana, and understands Pradhana as existing in all creatures, who is free from the sense of mineness and egoism, is surely liberated. He who is freed from all the pairs of opposites, who does not bend his head to anybody, who has transcended the rituals of Swadha, comes through peace alone to that which is eternal, without attributes or qualities. Abandoning all karma, good and bad, issuing from the gunas, and casting off both truth and untruth, he finds Moksha.

Having the Unmanifest for its seed, the Intellect for its trunk, with the great principle of Egoism for its branches, the Senses for its little sprouts, the five Great Elements its large branches, the objects of the senses for its twigs, with perennial leaves and the flowers which always adorn it, and with fruits both sweet and bitter always being yielded—that is the eternal tree of Brahman, the support of all creatures. Cutting down that tree using the sword of knowledge of the truth, the man of wisdom severs the bonds of attachment that cause birth, decrepitude and death and, freeing himself from ahamkara, finds Mukti.

There are the two birds, companions that perch on the tree of life, which are immutable and have no intelligence of their own; the other, different from these two, is called the Intelligent. A seeker is liberated from all his sins when that self which has no knowledge of nature, which is without intelligence becomes conversant with that which is beyond Prakriti, comes to understand the Kshetra and apprehends everything, illumined by an intelligence transcending all attributes, qualities and manifestations.'"

"Brahma said, 'Some regard Brahman as a tree, others as a great forest. Some regard Brahman as unmanifest; others as transcendent and free from every distress. They say that this universe is created from and absorbed into the Unmanifest.

The man who, when his end comes, finds equilibrium, attains to the self even for the space of a single breath, fits himself for immortality. Restraining the self in the self, even for the space of a wink, one goes through the tranquillity of the self, to the inexhaustible gains of those blessed with true Gyana. Restraining the life-breaths by controlling them through pranayama, by the ten or the twelve, the seeker attains to that which is beyond the four and twenty. Thus, by acquiring a tranquil soul, he attains to the fruition of all his wishes and beyond.

When the Sattva Guna predominates in that which arises from the Unmanifest, it becomes fit for immortality. They who know Sattva laud it highly, saying that there is nothing higher. By inference we know that Purusha is dependent on Sattva. Dvijottamas, it is impossible to attain to Purusha by any other means. Forgiveness, courage, non-violence, equability, truth, sincerity, knowledge, charity and renunciation are manifestations of the Sattva guna: it is through these that the wise infer the identity of Purusha and Sattva. Of this there is no doubt.

Some gyanis, devoted to knowledge, assert the unity of the Kshetrajna and Prakriti. They are mistaken, for Nature differs from Purusha, albeit there is both distinction and association between the two, unity and diversity. That is the doctrine of the learned. In the gnat and udumbara we find both unity and apartness. The relationship between Purusha and Prakriti is like that between water and the fish which swims in water, like water drops and the lotus-leaf upon which they rest.'

At these words, some doubts arose in those learned Brahmanas, foremost of men, and they questioned the Pitamaha further."

CANTO 49

"The Rishis asked, 'Which among all duties is deemed to be the most worthy of being performed? We see that the diverse modes of karma are contrary. Some say that karma survives the body; others that it does not exist; while yet others hold that doubt and ambiguity are all that is certain; and there are those who have no doubts. Some claim that the Brahman is not, in fact, eternal. Some say that it exists, and others that it does not. Some say it is one, others that it is two, and still others that it is mixed. Some Brahmavadis surely regard it to be one; others that it is distinct, and others again that it is manifold.

Some of the wise say that both time and space exist; others refute this. Some wear matted jata on their heads and deer-skins on their bodies; others have shaven crowns and go naked. Some never bathe, while others regularly perform ablutions. These differences of views and ways are found among Devas and Brahmanas who know Brahman and are blessed with perceptions of truth. Some of them eat, while others fast. Some praise action; others uphold complete tranquillity. Some seek Mukti, while others do permit certain kinds of enjoyment. Some desire diverse kinds of wealth; some embrace poverty. Some say that karma must be performed; others disagree. Some are devoted to a life of non-violence; others are addicted to killing. Some hanker after merit and glory, others believe that these are hollow.

Some are devoted to goodness; others are established on doubt. Some are for pleasure, some for pain. Some hold dhyana dear, some yagna, while others, also learned ones, believe in daana. Many of the wise resort to tapasya, while others laud the study of the Shastras. Some advocate Gyana and Vairagya, knowledge and renunciation. Others who ponder the elements declare it is Prakriti. Some extol everything; others, nothing.

O Pitamaha, greatest of gods, dharma seems full of perplexing contradictions of many kinds. We are deluded and cannot arrive at any conclusion. There are those who espouse karma, action, chanting, 'This is good.' Whoever is attached to a certain course of action claims that his way is the best. We are confused and distracted and desire to know what is good. It is befitting, best of all beings, for you to declare to us the actual connection between the Kshetrajna and the Kshetra.

The illustrious Creator of the worlds, of fathomless intellect and the soul of righteousness, then expounded to the Brahmarishis the answer to their question."

"Brahma said, 'Listen to what a guru told his sishya once in this regard, and let that quieten your bewilderment. Non-violence is said to be the first and the highest dharma. It is the ultimate seat, free from fear, and the final sign of holiness.

The ancients who were seers of the Brahman said that knowledge is the highest happiness, and a man is indeed liberated from all sin by pure knowledge. Those who engage in violence and killing, who are godless in their ways, will find hell for their greed and delusion; while those rush headlong into action propelled by desire, are born repeatedly into this world, and sport in joy. Those men of learning and wisdom who engage in karma without desire and attachment, with faith and concentration, are said to see the truth clearly.

Listen now, best of men, to how the Kshetrajna, the Knower, is bound to and free from Prakriti. The relation between the two is that between the subject and the object. Purusha, the Soul, is always the subject, and Prakriti, Nature, the object. And they do, indeed, exist after the manner of the Gnat and the Udumbara. Being solely an object of enjoyment, Nature is without intellect and knows nothing. He, however, who enjoys Prakriti, is the Kshetrajna, the knower. Kshetrajna is the one who enjoys, while Nature is enjoyed.

The wise have always said that Prakriti is comprised of the Gunas and the resultant pairs of opposites. Purusha, on the other hand, is without these; He is eternal, eternally free, the ubiquitous in-dweller in all things, and walks with knowledge. He enjoys Nature as a lotus-leaf does water, which rests upon the leaf but never wets it.

Enlightened with knowledge, he is never tainted, even if comes into contact with all the Gunas; Purusha is unattached like the unsteady drop of water on the lotus-leaf. Thus the scriptures conclude that Prakriti is the property of Purusha, and the relation between these two is like that between matter and its maker.

As one goes into a dark place taking a light with him, even so do those who seek the Supreme travel with the light of Nature. As long as matter and the Gunas exist, like oil and wick, so long does the lamp shines. The flame is extinguished when matter and the Gunas are exhausted.

Prakriti is manifest, while Purusha is unmanifest. Understand this, O knowing Brahmanas. Now listen to something more: not a thousand explanations can enlighten one whose intellect is dull; he will not come to knowledge. However, he who is blessed with intelligence succeeds in finding happiness, even through the most minimal explanations. Understand that the accomplishment of dharma depends on one's natural endowments. Being inherently blessed, the man of intelligence surely attains supreme felicity.

Even as a wayfarer without provisions, journeys in discomfort and might well die before he reaches his destination, so does a paucity of understanding and dharma operate on the fruits of action. A man benefits greatly from scrutinizing in himself what is agreeable and what is not.

The progress in life of a man who has no perception of truth is like the blind careen of one who recklessly rushes down a long road he has never seen before. The lives of the intelligent are like the journeys of men who travel along a well-known way in a swift chariot yoked to fine horses.

Having climbed to the top of a mountain, one should not look back down to the earth left far below. Seeing an insensible and afflicted man along the way, the man of intelligence continues going ahead as long as there is a road before him. Only when he finds no path in front for his chariot does the man of wisdom alight and continue on foot.

Thus does the man of intelligence journey who knows the laws ruling Gyana and Bhakti, Yoga and Satya. Conversant with the Gunas, such a man travels understanding what lies ahead of him, for he is farsighted. The deluded and ignorant man plunges headlong into a lake of dread, without a boat, surely courting death; while the man of wisdom and discrimination enters the water cautiously, in a boat with sturdy oars, crosses easily, without tiring himself, and abandons the boat when he gains the far shore. Such a one is aware, and free of arrogance. These are like the others on the road of life, one ill-provided and going on foot, while the wise one resorts to a chariot for as far as it will bear him.

The wise yatri knows that a chariot cannot take him across water, even as a boat cannot across solid ground. He has no attachment or illusions about either chariot or boat, and uses both when he needs them; he is not confined by either as, say, a fisherman is to his boat, but uses the conveyance appropriate to the element he needs to cross over.

Thus, O Dvijottamas, there are different and distinct means used by wise men to pass through and transcend different circumstances and times; they all take him towards his final destination.

And as men perform karma in this world, so do they reap its fruits. That which has no smell, no taste, no touch or sound, which is meditated upon by the sages, is called Pradhana. Pradhana is unmanifest. Mahat is a development of the unmanifest Pradhana. Ahamkara is an evolute of Pradhana when it has become Mahat. From Ahamkara come the Panchamahabhutas; and from the five great elements come forth the objects of the senses.

The Unmanifest is of the nature of seed; in its very essence it is Creative. The Paramatman has the virtues of a seed, and Ahamkara, which is a creation of Mahat, owns the nature of a germ and ceaselessly, unendingly, creates. The Mahabhutas have the nature of both seed and creations. The objects of the five great elements are also endowed with the nature of seed, and yield multifarious creations.

These have Chitta, consciousness or perception, for their attribute. Among them, space has one attribute; wind has two; light is invested with three gunas, and water with four. Earth, teeming with creation, mobile as well as unmoving, owns fives attributes. Bhumi is a goddess; she is the womb of all creatures and abounds with every conceivable manner of thing, bright and dark.

Sound, touch, colour, taste and smell—these are the five qualities of earth, O Dvijottamas. Smell always belongs to earth, and smell is of many kinds. Listen to these. It can be agreeable, disagreeable, sweet, sour, pungent, diffusive, compact, oily, dry or clear—of these ten kinds is the sense of smell that belongs to the earth.

Sound, touch, likewise colour and taste, belong to the element of water. Attend to the qualities of taste: sweet, sour, pungent, bitter, astringent and saline—six are the varieties of taste.

Sound, touch and colour are the three attributes of light. Colour is white, dark, red, blue, yellow and grey, short, long, minute, gross, square and circular—of twelve sorts is colour, which belongs to light. Venerable Brahmanas, knowers of dharma and truthful in speech, understand these.

Sound and touch are the two qualities of wind. Touch is of various kinds—rough, cold, hot, tender, clear, hard, oily, smooth, slippery, painful and soft—so say Brahmanas who know dharma, and who are seers of truth, their tapasya crowned with success.

Akasa, ethereal space, has only one quality, which is sound, Nada. The scale of sound is comprised of shadaja, rishabha, gandhara, madhyama, panchama, nishada and dhaivata—seven. Besides these, there are sounds agreeable and sounds discordant, compact, and complex. Thus, sound born of space is of ten kinds. Space is the highest of the five elements. Ahamkara, Ego, is above it; above Ego is Intellect, Mahat. Beyond Mahat is the Atman. Above Atman is the unmanifest Pradhana; beyond that is Purusha.

He who knows who is superior and who inferior among existing beings, who knows the laws laid down in the Shastras with respect to all actions, and who himself is the soul of all creatures, attains to the Unfading Soul.'"

CANTO 51

"Brahma said, 'Since the mind is the ruler of the five elements, in creating and controlling them, the mind is the soul of the elements. The mind always rules over the Mahabhutas. The Intellect has power, and is called the Kshetrajna. The mind yokes the senses as a charioteer yokes fine horses. The senses, the mind, and the intellect are always united with the Kshetrajna. The individual soul, the Jivatman, mounts the chariot to which mighty steeds are yoked, with Mahat for its reins, and goes where it will.

With all five senses harnessed, with the mind for its charioteer, and the intellect for its eternal reins, is the great ratha of the Brahman. The man of learning and understanding knows the Brahmaratha and is never overcome by delusion, even whilst living in the world, in the midst of all creatures.

The forest of Brahman begins with the Unmanifest and ends with material creations. It includes mobile and immobile entities, it receives light from the Sun and the Moon, and is adorned with planets and constellations. Networks of rivers and ranges of mountains embellish it on every side, as do seas and lakes and diverse water bodies, providing sustenance for all creatures. The Unmanifest Brahman is the final goal of every creature, the ultimate Gift.

In the forest, the Kshetrajna moves eternally. When the Pralaya arrives, all the material entities in this world, mobile and rooted, are the first to find dissolution. Next to dissolve are the Gunas which constitute these creations and, after them, the five great elements upon which the Gunas are founded. Such are the layers of creation.

Devas, Manavas, Gandharvas, Pisachas, Asuras and Rakshasas, all have sprung from Prakriti, and not from Karma, not from any other cause. The Brahmas, who are Creators of the universe, are born here again and again. All that springs from them dissolves, when the time comes, into those very Panchamahabhutas, like waves receding and being lost in the ocean.

All the Mahabhutas are beyond the lesser elements that compose the universe. He who is released from the five elements comes to the highest goal.

The omnipotent Prajapati created all this from just his divine mind, through tapasya; through tapasya, the Rishis attained to the status of Devas. Through dhyana and tapasya do those who achieve perfection, who subsist on fruits and roots, commune in Yoga with the Spirit of God; and they perceive all of the Trilokas—Swarga, Bhumi and the Patalas.

Medicines and herbs and all the diverse sciences are acquired through tapasya alone, for all acquisition has penance for its root. Whatever is difficult of acquisition, difficult to learn, difficult to vanquish, difficult to pass through, all are achievable by tapas, for penance is irresistible.

He who drinks, he who kills a Brahmana, who steals, who kills a foetus in the womb, who violates his guru's bed—all these can exorcise their sins through tapasya well performed. Manavas, Pitris, Devas, sacrificial animals, beasts and birds, and all other creatures mobile and immobile, find salvation through tapasya.

Thus did the Devas, blessed with great powers of maya, attain Swargaloka. Those full of egoism who perform rigorous karma, but with expectations of karma's fruit, approach the presence of Prajapati; but true Mahatmas, are free of ahamkara and the sense of mineness, attain to the greatest and highest worlds through the pure contemplation of Yoga; they find Nirvana. These, who know the Atman, their hearts always joyful, gain true Communion, and eternal bliss.

Great souls, free from ego and mine-ness, who are reborn after attaining to the fullness of Yoga contemplation, enter into the highest place, the Unmanifest Brahman, from which there is no return. Liberated entirely from Tamas and Rajas, the gunas of darkness and passion, and cleaving solely to Sattva, a man is released from every sin and creates all things.

Such a one is known to be the Kshetrajna, in perfection. He that knows Him, knows the Veda. Attaining to pure knowledge by yoking the mind in dhyana, the Yogi should sit immaculate, self-restrained. Man inexorably becomes that on which his mind is set. This is an eternal mystery. That which has the Unmanifest for its beginning and gross materiality for its end, is without the Gunas, in truth.

But do you understand That whose nature is Nirguna? Of two syllables is Mrityu, death; of three syllables is the eternal Brahman, Pranava, the Aum. Mineness is death, and its opposite is eternal. Men led by clouded intellects laud action, karma—never those who are counted among the truly great, the Ancients.

Through karma a spirit is born with a body, which is constituted of the sixteen. Adhyatma Gyana consumes the Purusha, which is the Atman that retains a consciousness of the body. This ultimate knowledge is what those who quaff Amrita accept as being true. These, whose vision extends to the far shore of samsara, the ocean of life, have no attachment to karma, to action.

The transcendent Purusha, in truth, is full of gyana and not of karma. He does not die who understands Him that is immortal, immutable, incomprehensible, eternal and indestructible—Him that is the yoked Soul in perfect communion, and who is past all attachments. He who thus understands the Soul, prior to which nothing exists, which is uncreated, immutable, unconquered, and incomprehensible, even to the drinkers of Amrita, certainly becomes himself incomprehensible and immortal.

Expelling all outward impressions and restraining the soul in the Soul, Atmanatmanah, he understands that auspicious Brahman, than which nothing greater exists. Upon his understanding becoming clear, he attains to peace. The indication of peace is what turns the world into a dream. This is the goal of the emancipated ones, seekers of Nirvana intent on knowledge. They are unmoved witnesses to all the external phenomena of samsara, remaining unmoved by these.

This is the goal of those who are unattached to the world; this is the eternal usage. This is the final acquisition of true gyanis. This is the eternal dharma, beyond reproach, the goal which is attained by one who is alike to all creatures, who is perfectly detached, who has no expectations, and who looks upon all things equally.

I have now told you everything, O Dvijottamas. From now do as I have said and you will find Mukti.'" Spoken to thus by Brahma, those great sages lived as he counselled and attained realms of utmost felicity. Do you also, blessed one, live by the words of Brahma, O you of pure soul, and you will find eternal success and peace," the ancient Brahmana said to his sishya.'

Krishna continues, 'Thus instructed in the principles of the Sanatana Dharma by his guru, the sishya did everything he was told, O Arjuna, and attained Nirvana, he came to the condition beyond which there is never any more grief.'

Arjuna asks, 'Who was that guru, O Krishna, and who was his disciple, Janardana? Tell me this, Lord, if you consider me worthy of knowing it.'

Krishna says, 'I am the Guru, O Mahabaho, and know that the mind is my sishya. Through my love for you, Dhananjaya, I have revealed this mystery to you. If you have any love for me, perpetuator of the Kuru race, now that you have heard the instructions of the way of the Soul, O you of noble vows, you must live your life by them. When you practise the religion, your sins will leave you like darkness at dawn, and you will find absolute freedom.

Once before, I expounded this same dharma to you, Mahabaho, when the hour of battle came. And now, O Bhaarata, it has been a long while since I saw my father, and I must go to him. So give me leave, Phalguna, my task here is accomplished.' Arjuna says to Krishna, 'We will go today from here to Hastinapura, city of elephants. Meeting Yudhishtira Dharmaraja there, you will tell him of your intention, and then return to Dwaravati.'" Vaisampayana said, “Krishna summons Daruka, saying, ‘Let my chariot be yoked.’ Daruka returns quickly to say, ‘Your chariot is ready.’ Arjuna orders his attendants and soldiers, ‘Prepare yourselves, we leave today for Hastinapura.’ His men hasten to do his bidding, Rajan, and soon return, telling the Partha of mighty tejas, ‘We are equipped to move.’

Krishna and Arjuna then climb onto their ratha and set out on their journey, loving friends engaged in delightful conversation. Dhanajaya says to the Lord of the Vrishnis, ‘By your grace, Yudhishtira has won the war. All his enemies have been killed, and he has regained his kingdom whole, without a thorn in it. Madhusudana, in you the Pandavas have the most powerful protector. With you as our raft we crossed the Kuru sea.

Krishna, this universe is your creation, and I salute you, O Soul of the Universe, best of all beings in it. I know you in such measure as you have allowed me in your boundless love. O slayer of Madhu, the soul of every creature is born of your tejas. All this great creation, nurture and destruction is your Lila, your playful sport. Earth and sky, Lord, are your maya. The universe, with all its mobile and unmoving bodies, is founded in you. You create the four kinds of beings. You create the Earth, the Sky and Heaven, O slayer of Madhu. The stainless light of the Moon is your smile. The seasons are your senses. The ever-moving wind is your breath, and death, existing eternally, is your anger. In your grace the Goddess of Prosperity dwells. Verily, Sree is always established in you, O you of ultimate intelligence. You are the sport in which creatures engage; you are their refuge and contentment; you are their intelligence, their compassion, their inclinations, their beauty.

At the end of the cycle of time, it is you, O sinless one, who come as destruction. In an age I could not begin to enumerate all your attributes. You are Atman and Paramatman. I bow to you, O you of eyes like lotus-petals. Irresistible One, I have learnt from Narada and Devala and Dwaipayana, as well as from Bhishma, that all this Akhanda rests on you. You are the one Lord of all creatures.

And Janardana, Anagha, whatever you have told me to do, out of your love and favour for me, I will accomplish in entirety. How wonderful is what you have done for the Pandavas, destroying Dhritarashtra's son in war. Before battle even broke out, you had consumed the enemy host, which I then vanquished on the field. Though the victory appeared to be mine, Lord, it was you who killed Duryodhana on Kurukshetra, and Karna, and the sinful Saindhava, as well as Bhurisravas.

Devakinandana, you are pleased with me, and I will do as you have told me, without hesitation or doubt. I will go to Yudhishtira and ask him to give you leave to return to Dwaraka. Lord, O absolute knower of dharma, I accept that it is time for you to depart. You will indeed soon see your father Vasudeva, my matulan. Janardana, you will see the irresistible Baladeva and all the other lords of the Vrishnis.'

Conversing thus, the two arrive at the city named after the elephant, where they ride cheerfully into Dhritarashtra's palace like that of Indra himself. Entering the Kuru sabha, O King, they see seated before Dhritarashtra and Gandhari of great wisdom the sage Vidura, Yudhishtira and the mighty Bhimasena, the two sons of Madri and the unvanquished Yuyutsu, Kunti and the beautiful Krishnaa, the other royal women of Bhaarata's race, Subhadra first among them, and all the ladies who wait on Gandhari.

Approaching Dhritarashtra, the two Parantapas announce themselves to the blind king and touch his feet, as they do the feet of Gandhari and Kunti, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja and Bhima. Embracing Vidura, they enquire after his welfare. In the company of these, Arjuna and Krishna return to sit before Dhritarashtra again. When night falls, Dhritarashtra dismisses all the Kurupraviras, Krishna as well, and they depart to their own apartments. Krishna retires with Arjuna to his chambers. Duly worshipped and provided with every comfort and luxury, the divine Krishna of fathomless intellect passes the night in contented sleep, with Dhananjaya for his companion.

When day breaks, the two heroes perform their morning ablutions and rituals, put on fine raiment and ornaments and come to Yudhishtira's palace where the Dharmaraja sits with his ministers around him. The two Mahatmans, Krishna and Arjuna, come before Yudhishtira even like the Aswins before Indra. Greeting the king, who is overjoyed to see them, the incomparable Vrishni and the great Kuru hero sit themselves down with his leave.

The astute Yudhishtira can see that a topic for discussion is looming. He says, 'Kshatriyas, O you foremost ones of the Yadu and the Kuru vamsas, it seems that you have something to say to me. Tell me what is in your hearts. I will do whatever it is that you want. Do not hesitate.' Arjuna humbly approaches his brother and says, 'Krishna here has been long away from his home, O King. With your leave, he wishes to return to Dwaraka to see his father. If you think it proper, allow him to go now to the city of the Anartas. Great Kshatriya, it becomes you to give him your leave.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O lotus-eyed one, be you blessed. Madhusudana, leave this very day for Dwaravati to see your father, greatest of the Sura vamsa. Kesava, Mahabaho, you have my leave, for surely it has been a long time since you saw my uncle and the Devi Devaki. Meet Vasudeva and the mighty Baladeva, and convey my worship to both, as they deserve. But, O Krishna, think daily of me, as also of Bhima, of Phalguna and Nakula and Sahadeva. And, sinless one, having seen the Anartas, your father and the Vrishnis, Mahabaho, you must return here for my Aswamedha yagna.

Go now, peerless Krishna, and take with you gems and other wealth; O hero of the Satwatas, take whatever else you like. It is through your grace, Kesava, that all our enemies have perished and the world has come under our dominion.' Krishna, foremost of men, answers Yudhishtira Dharmaraja of the Kuru vamsa, 'Mahabaho, all jewels and gemstones, all the gold and wealth, and all this Earth, are yours and yours alone. Whatever riches are in Dwaravati, my lord, are also yours.' Dharmaputra replies, 'Tathaastu, so be it,' and then he worships Krishna of ineffable tejas. Krishna then goes to meet his aunt Kunti. He offers her worship and walks around her in pradakshina. She blesses and embraces him in return, worshipping him in her heart, as do all the others present, Vidura first among them.

Then, setting Subhadra beside him, and with the blessings of Yudhishtira and Kunti, Mahabaho Janardana sets out from Hastinapura in his blazing chariot, followed beyond the city gates by a crowd of citizens. The Kshatriya who flies the banner of Hanuman on his ratha is accompanied by Satyaki, Madri's two sons, Vidura of fathomless intelligence, and great Bhima, his tread like that of an elephant. Then, Mahatejasvin Janardana asks all those extenders of the Kuru kingdom and Vidura to turn back and says to his sarathi Daruka and to Satyaki, 'Let our horses fly!'

With that, and Satyaki of the line of Sini in his own chariot beside him, Krishna Parantapa rides home towards Dwaraka, even like Indra of a hundred sacrifices returning to Devaloka after slaying all his enemies."

Vaisampayana said, “When Krishna sets forth, the Pandavas and the other great Parantapas of the Kuru vamsa embrace him one by one, then sadly return with their attendants to the city of elephants. Arjuna repeatedly clasps the Vrishni hero in his arms. He remains rooted to the spot, gazing after Govinda until he disappears from sight and indeed, so it is with Krishna. Attend to the signs and omens that attend the Avatara’s departure from Hastinapura. The wind blows high before the chariot, sweeping the ground clear of dust and brambles. Indra rains down scented showers and scatters celestial blooms over Krishna.

As the Mahabaho rides on, he arrives at a parched desert where he encounters the Maharishi Utanka, of measureless tejas. The lotus-leaf-eyed Krishna worships the ascetic, and is worshipped in return. Krishna inquires courteously after the Muni’s welfare. The Brahmanottama honours Madhava, and says to him, ‘O Saurin, when you went to the Kurus and the sons of Pandu, did you succeed in establishing a lasting fraternal accord between them?

Tell me everything, Kesava. Have you come after resolving the enmity between your kinsmen, who are, I know, so dear to you? Will the five sons of Pandu, and the sons of Dhritarashtra now enjoy the world together in gladness with you, O best of the Vrishnis? Will all the kings of the world find felicity in their respective kingdoms as a result of the peace you made between the Kuru cousins? O son, has the faith I have always had in you borne fruit among the Kauravas?’

The Blessed and Holy One replies, ‘I did everything I could, great sage, to effect a reconciliation among the Kuru princes. Alas, when I could not succeed, there was a great and terrible war between them in which all the scions of Bharata and the other kings of the earth perished with their followers and kinsmen. Neither by force nor by intelligence can anyone change the course of destiny, O sinless Mahamuni, as you well know.

The Kauravas would not heed the counsel which Bhishma and Vidura gave them respecting me. They encountered their cousins in battle and became guests in the halls of Yama. Only the five Pandavas remain alive. All their sons, friends and kinsmen were slaughtered, as were all the sons of Dhritarashtra, with their sons and kinsmen.’

Rage grips Utanka. His eyes wide with wrath, he says to Krishna, ‘You could have made peace between the Kurus, your own kin and dear to you. But you did not do so, O slayer of Madhu, and for that I will now curse you. You could have compelled your cousins to desist from carnage, but you did not, O Madhava, and I will curse you for your indifference which has soaked the earth with the blood of noble Kshatriyas whose hearts were seized by delusion.’

Krishna replies, ‘O scion of Bhrigu’s race, I ask your forgiveness but, before you pronounce your curse on me, you must listen to what I have to say about the Atman. Also know, best of Munis, that no man, even one of your ascetic merit, can overcome me. I have no wish to see all your punya destroyed in that vain attempt. You have a vast store of blazing tapasya. You have pleased your gurus and your elders. Dvijottama, I know that you have observed brahmacharya since your very childhood. I have no wish to see the loss or even the diminution of your great tapasya, achieved with so much effort.’”

"Utanka says, 'O Kesava, expound that faultless Adhyatma to me. When I have heard your discourse, I will decide if I should bless or curse you, Janardana.'

Krishna says, 'Know that the three Gunas, Tamas, Rajas and Sattva, exist depending on me as their source and their refuge. So also, O Dvija, know that the Rudras and the Vasus have sprung from me. In me are all creatures, and in all creatures do I exist; know this, and have no doubt about it. Know, regenerate one, that all the tribes of the Daityas, all the Yakshas, Gandharvas, Rakshasas, Nagas and Apsaras have sprung from me.

Whatever is deemed existent and non-existent, manifest and unmanifest, mortal and immortal—all have me for their soul. The fourfold courses of dharma attached to the four modes of life, and all the Vedic karmas, have me for their soul. Whatever is non-existent, whatever is existent and non-existent, and whatever transcends that which is existent and non-existent, all that constitutes the universe—are from me. There is nothing higher or beyond me, who am the eternal God of gods.

O Bhargava, know that all the Vedas with their root in the original syllable Pranava, the AUM, are one with me. Know, O son of Bhrigu's race, that I am the sacrificial stake; I am the Soma rasa; I am the Charu prepared at sacrifices and offered to the Devas; I am the Homa; I am the rituals which sacrificers perform to gratify the gods; I am the pourer of the sacrificial libation, and I am the Havis or libation that is poured.

I am the Adharyu. I am the Kalpaka; and I am indeed the most sanctified Havis. It is me whom the Udgatri hymns with his songs. In all rites of expiation, O Brahmana, the utterers of auspicious mantras and benedictions fraught with peace hymn my praises, who am the artificer of the universe.

Know, O Dvijottama, that Dharma is my first-born child, sprung from my mind, whose essence is compassion for all creatures. Constantly transforming myself, I take birth in diverse wombs to uphold that son of mine, with the help of men now living or those gone from this world. I do this to protect and establish righteousness. In the forms that I assume to accomplish my purpose, I am known in the three worlds as Vishnu, Brahma and Sankara.

I am the origin and I am the death of all things. I am the Creator of all that exists, and its Destroyer. Knowing no change myself, I am the scourge of all those that live in sin. In every Yuga I mend the causeway of Dharma, entering into diverse wombs from my desire to do good to my creatures.

When I live among the Devas, O Bhargava, I act in every respect as a Deva. When I live in the order of the Gandharvas, I act in every respect as a Gandharva; when among the Nagas, as a Naga. When among the Yakshas or Rakshasas, I conduct myself as one of them. And now I have taken birth as a human, and I must act like a man.

I appealed to the Kauravas, yes, even piteously. Yet, deluded and stupefied as they were, they would not listen to me. Then I was filled with anger and frightened them by showing them a glimpse of my Viswarupa, to warn them of the consequences of not heeding what I said. But when I resumed this human form, adharma gripped them again, and they were once more in the clutches of time and fate. Punishment for their sins inexorably overtook the sons of Dhritarashtra.

All of them have been killed righteously in battle and have, without doubt, found Swarga. Dvijottama, the Pandavas have acquired great fame. This is all I have to say to you.'”

CANTO 55

"Utanka says, 'I know you, O Krishna, to be the Creator of the universe, and do not doubt that it is through your grace that I have this knowledge. O you of unfading glory, by being devoted to you my heart has found blissful peace. Know, O Parantapa, that my heart is no longer inclined to curse you. If, Janardana, I deserve the least grace from you, show me once your sovereign form, your Viswarupa.'

Pleased with Utanka, the Holy Lord then shows Utanka that eternal Vaishnava Rupa which Arjuna saw on Kurukshetra. Utanka sees Krishna's cosmic, universal form with countless awesome arms; its splendour is that of the light and fire of a thousands suns. Krishna stand revealed before the Rishi as God, filling all space and all time, his faces on every side.

Seeing that Viswarupa, the Brahman is wonderstruck, spellbound.

Utanka says, 'O I bow to you, whose handiwork is the universe; I bow to you, O Soul of the universe, O Parent of all things! You cover all the Earth with your feet, and with your head you fill the firmament. Your body fills all that lies between Swarga and Bhumi; all the cardinal points of the sky are covered by your arms. O you of unfading glory, you are all this, everything that exists! I cannot stand this vision, Lord of blazing light, and I beg you, withdraw this immortal form of yours and return to your human shape, which also I know is eternal!'

O Janamejaya, Krishna then, gratified, says to Utanka, 'Ask me for a boon!' Utanka replies, 'For now this is all the boon I wish for, O glorious one, foremost of all beings—that I have seen this form of yours.' Krishna, however, says again to him, 'A vision of my Viswarupa cannot be fruitless.

Ask me for something.' Utanka says, 'I must not refuse you, O Lord. Water is scarce in deserts such as this one. Grant that I have water wherever and whenever I wish for it.' Returning to his human form, the Supreme Lord says to Utanka, 'Whenever you want water, think of me!'

Krishna then rides again towards Dwaraka.

Later, one day, the illustrious Utanka was wandering through the waterless desert, parched with thirst. The Rishi thought of Krishna's boon, and at once he saw a naked hunter, a fierce-looking Chandala, smeared with dirt, surrounded by a pack of dogs and carrying a sword and a bow and arrows. Utanka saw a copious stream of water issuing from the hunter's linga. The wild Chandala said to Utanka, 'O Bhargava, take this water from me and quench your thirst, for I am moved by great pity for you, seeing you so parched in this desert.'

Utanka showed no inclination to accept the water; afflicted with hunger and thirst, he gave way to wrath and even began to censure Krishna in his mind. The hunter repeatedly said to the Rishi, 'Drink!' But the ascetic refused the water thus offered. Instead he spoke harshly to the Chandala, who immediately vanished with his pack of dogs. Seeing that wondrous occultation, Utanka was abashed. Yet, thinking still that Krishna had deceived him in the boon, he staggered on through the arid desert. Then Krishna himself appeared before the Brahmana as the hunter had done. Utanka said to him, 'Foremost of beings, it was scarcely proper for you to offer water to me, the foremost of Brahmanas, in the form of a hunter's urine!'

Krishna assuaged him with soft words, explaining, 'I offered you water in an appropriate form but you did not divine it. I had asked Indra himself for nectar for you. I said to him, "Give Amrita to Utanka in the form of water." Indra replied, "It is not right for a mortal to become immortal. Let some other boon be granted to Utanka." He said this to me repeatedly, O you of Bhrigu's race, but I insisted, "Amrita must be given to Utanka." The Lord of the Devas then said, "If Amrita is indeed to be given to him, I will assume the form of a Chandala and offer it to him. If he accepts, let him drink the nectar of immortality, but if he shuns me, on no account will it be offered to him again."

Having made this compact with me, Vasava appeared before you as the hunter to offer you the Amrita. But you shunned him because he came as a Chandala. Ah, great was your fault—yet I will do whatever I can to slake your thirst. On the days, O Dvija, when you feel thirsty, water-laden rain-clouds will rise over this desert and give you fragrant, sweet water to drink. Those clouds, O son of Bhrigu's race, will become known in the world as the clouds of Utanka!' Utanka was filled with joy and to this day, O Bhaarata, those clouds of Utanka appear and bring rain to deserts."

Janamejaya asked, “With what tapasya was the high-souled Utanka endowed that he could pronounce a curse on Vishnu himself, who is the source of all puissance?”

Vaisampayana said, “O Janamejaya, Utanka was endowed with the most austere penances. He was devoted to his guru. Blessed with awesome tejas, he abstained from worshipping anyone else. All the children of the Rishis, O Bhaarata, wished that their devotion to their gurus should be as great as that of Utanka. Gautama’s satisfaction with Utanka, of all his numerous disciples, and his affection for him were great indeed, O Janamejaya.

Gautama was gratified with the self-restraint and purity of conduct that characterized Utanka, with his deeds of prowess and the services he rendered to his guru. One after another, thousands of disciples received Gautama’s permission to return home after the completion of their tutelage, but Utanka was not allowed to leave the asrama. In the course of time, decrepitude overtook Maharishi Utanka but, because of his devotion to his guru, he was not conscious of it.

One day, he set out to fetching fuel for his preceptor’s sacred fire, and returned bearing a heavy load of wood. Toil-worn, hungry and labouring under the load he bore on his head, he flung his burden down to the ground, O chastiser of foes. One of his matted locks had got caught in the wood. When the dry branches were thrown down, with them fell that lock of matted white hair.

Only then, seeing that his hair had turned white, did Utanka realize that he had grown old and, overcome by a shock of grief, began to weep. At her father's command, his guru's daughter, who knew every dharma, whose eyes were like the petals of a lotus, whose hips were full and round, moved forward to contain Utanka's tears in her cupped palms, with her head bent down. The tears burned her hands and she was forced to let them fall onto the earth. The Earth herself could not bear the scalding tears of Utanka! Gautama asked his sishya, 'Why, my son, are you so grief-stricken today? Tell me calmly and quietly, O learned Muni. I wish to hear it in detail.'

Utanka said, 'With my mind devoted to you and my every thought dwelling only on you, with being always absorbed in doing what pleased you, I have lived here for so long that old age has overtaken me without my knowing it. I have never known any worldly happiness. Although I have lived with you for a hundred years, you have not given me leave to go, while so many other disciples of yours, many much younger than me, have left with your sanction. Why, thousands of great Brahmanas have completed their tutelage with you, and have left and gone on to become gurus themselves, with sishyas of their own!'

Gautama said, 'Through my love and affection for you, and because of your devoted services to me, Dvijottama, a long time has passed without my being aware of it. If, Bhargava, you now wish to leave my asrama, do so without delay, you have my leave.' Utanka said, 'What shall I give you, my guru, as dakshina, before I leave?' Gautama said, 'To serve and gratify the guru is a sishya's highest dakshina; and in these you have pleased me exceedingly, more than any other disciple. Today, if you became a youth of sixteen years, Brahmana, I would give you my own daughter to be your wife, for no other woman could wait upon your blazing tejas, or gratify you.'

Immediately, Utanka became a youth and took his guru's daughter for his wife. He went to Gautama's wife and said, 'What shall I give you as my final dakshina? It is my fervent wish to please you, with my very life. If you wish for the most wondrous and priceless gemstone in the world, I will fetch it for you through my tapasya.' Ahalya said, 'I am already most pleased with you, Brahmana, with your unremitting devotion, O sinless one. That is enough. Be you blessed, and go wherever you wish.' But Utanka said again, 'Command me, O my mother, for it is only meet that I do you some great service.' Ahalya said, 'Blessed one, then bring me the heavenly earrings which the wife of Saudasa wears. If you do this, your dakshina to your master will be paid in full.'

Utanka said, 'Tathaastu, so be it!' and, Janamejaya, he resolved to fetch those precious earrings for his preceptor's wife. Losing no time, Utanka went to Saudasa, who had been cursed by Vasishta to be a Rakshasa.

Meanwhile Gautama observed to his wife, 'Utanka is not to be seen today.' Ahalya told her husband how Utanka had gone to fetch the jewelled earrings of Saudasa's queen. Gautama reproved her, 'You have not been wise in sending him on such a task. Vasishta has cursed Saudasa to be a Rakshasa, and that king will kill our Utanka.' Ahalya said, 'Swami, I did not know this when I sent Utanka. But through your grace, let him not meet with any harm.' Gautama said, 'Let it be so!'

Meanwhile, Utanka met King Saudasa in a deep and lonely forest."

Vaisampayana said, “Seeing the king who had become a Rakshasa, his face frightful, his long wild beard smeared with human blood, the Brahmana Utanka was not in the least agitated. Terrifying to behold, like another Yama, Saudasa loomed over Utanka and said, ‘Brahmanottama, by good fortune you have come to me at the sixth hour of the day when I am looking for food.’ Utanka said, ‘O King, know that I have come for the sake of my guru. The wise have said that a man must not be harmed while he is serving his preceptor.’ The king said, ‘Best of Brahmanas, food has been ordained for me at the sixth hour of the day. I am hungry and I cannot allow you to escape with your life today.’

Utanka said calmly, ‘Let it be so, O King, let us make a compact between us. When I no longer range the world in service of my guru, I will come to you again and yield myself to you. Best of kings, I have heard that the object I seek for my preceptor is in your possession, and I solicit you for it. Daily you make gifts of the most priceless gemstones to superior Brahmanas. You are one from whom gifts may be accepted in dharma, and know that I am one worthy of receiving daana from you. Having taken for my master what you give, I will return and submit myself to you. This I solemnly swear, and I do not lie; never in my life have I spoken an untruth, not even in jest: what then of a grave occasion such as this?’

Saudasa said, ‘If I do indeed possess what you want for your guru and I am able to give it to you, and if I can be regarded as one from whom such a gift is acceptable, tell me what it is you want.’ Utanka said, ‘O Saudasa, in my estimation you are indeed a worthy person from whom gifts may be accepted. I have come to beg as alms the jewelled earrings worn by your queen.' Saudasa said, 'Learned and regenerate Rishi, those earrings belong to my wife and it is she who should be asked for them. Do you, therefore, solicit some other thing from me, and I shall give it to you, O you of excellent vows.'

Utanka said, 'If I am an authority on this question, then yours is no excuse. Give those jewelled earrings to me. Be truthful in speech, O King.' The king said once more to Utanka, 'At my word, go to my good queen, and ask her for what you want. Commanded by me and asked by you, she will surely give you those precious earrings of hers.' Utanka said, 'Where, O ruler of men, can I meet your queen? Why do you not go to her yourself?' Saudasa said, 'I cannot see her today, for the sixth hour of the day has come. You will find her near a resplendent fountain.'

Utanka left Saudasa's presence and, finding Queen Madayanti, told her what he had come for. When she heard that her husband had sent him, that Devi of the large eyes said to the sagacious Utanka, 'If is as my husband said, O Brahmana, you must assure me, sinless one, that you speak the truth. Bring me some sign from my husband. These celestial earrings of mine, wrought with priceless gemstones, are such that the Devas and Yakshas and Maharishis remain on the lookout for a chance to bear them away. If set down upon the Earth at any time, they are likely to be spirited away by Nagas; if worn by anyone who eats impure food, the Yakshas would take them away; and if anyone wearing them were to fall asleep, the Devas would take them.

Brahmanottama, the reason these precious things are coveted by the Devas, Rakshasas and Nagas is because ceaselessly, day and night, these marvellous earrings yield gold. At night, they shine brightly, attracting the subtle and powerful rays of the stars and constellations. Holy One, anyone who wears them is at once freed from hunger, thirst and fear of every kind. Whoever wears these earrings is also free from the fear of poison, fire and indeed every kind of danger. If a small person wears them, they shrink in size accordingly; if the wearer be tall or large, they expand. Such are the magical properties of my earrings, and they are praised and honoured throughout the three worlds. I cannot part with them carelessly, so bring me some sure sign from my husband.'" Vaisampayana said, "Utanka went back to King Saudasa, who was always well-disposed towards his friends, and asked him for some sign to convince Madayanti. Best of the Ikshwakus, Saudasa gave him the sign. 'Say to my queen that her husband said, "This accursed condition of mine is intolerable, and I see no refuge or salvation for myself. Know it to be my wish, and give away the jewelled earrings to the Brahmana."'

Utanka went back to the queen and repeated what her lord had said, at which Madayanti gave Utanka her earrings. Having acquired them Utanka went back again to the king and said to him, 'I want to know, O Rajan, the secret import of the words which you sent to your queen.'

Saudasa said, 'Kshatriyas have honoured Brahmanas from the very beginning of creation. However, through time, kings have also given much offence to the holy ones. As for myself, I am always bent in humility before them, yet it is through a Brahmana's curse that you see me in this wretched condition. I see having Madayanti for my queen as my only hope for redemption. Indeed, O best of Mukti-seekers, I do not see any other hope of deliverance for me by which I may enter the portals of Swarga, or even continue living in this world. It is impossible for a king who is hostile to Brahmanas to live in this world, or attain to happiness in the next. You and your guru are great Brahmanas, and that is why I have given you my jewelled earrings. Now it is for you to keep the solemn compact you made with me today.'

Utanka said, 'O King, I will surely honour the pact I made with you. I will come back and surrender myself to you. But, O Parantapa, I have a question I want to ask you.' Saudasa replied, 'Say, learned Brahmana, what is on your mind, and I will answer you without hesitation.' Utanka said, 'Knowers of the laws of dharma say that Brahmanas are restrained in speech. They say one who wrongs his friends is regarded as vile as a thief. Today, O King, you have become my friend. So I ask you, as my friend, best of men, for your sage counsel. As for myself, I have now obtained what I wanted and what I came to you for. You are a flesh-eater, a Rakshasa who feeds on men. Tell me, is it appropriate for me to come back to you, or not?'

Saudasa said, 'If it is proper for me, best of Brahmanas, to advise you as my friend, I would have to tell you to never come back. Bhargava, this is what would benefit you and is in your own best interest. If you return to me, Brahmana, you will surely meet with death.' At Saudasa's words, Utanka took his leave of the king and, taking the marvellous earrings with him, set out for his guru Gautama's asrama to deliver his gift to his preceptor's wife. Going with some speed, in a hurry to please Ahalya, he secured the gift he bore even as Queen Madayanti had warned him to, tying the earrings safely in the folds of his black deer-skin.

Having gone some distance, he felt hungry and saw before him a bilwa tree whose branches bent down with the weight of the ripe fruit they bore. He climbed the tree and, tying his deer-skin in the fork of a low branch, began to pluck the bilwa fruit. As he was intent on his task, some fruit fell onto the black antelope hide in which the earrings were carefully secreted. The knot securing the skin to the tree came undone, and it fell down to the ground: the sparkling earrings lay exposed.

A serpent of the race of the great Naga Airavata saw the shining jewels, and, seizing the earrings, slid into a large anthill. Utanka, filled with anger and panic, leapt down to the ground and, picking up his Brahmana's staff, began to poke the anthill with it to fetch the snake out. Burning with rage, the Brahmana savaged the anthill and the ground beneath it for thirty-five days, never pausing.

Bhumi Devi, the Goddess Earth, trembled from the unendurable force of Utanka's staff, her body torn and bleeding, but Utanka continued his excavation relentlessly, digging a path down to the underworld where the Nagas dwell. Indra, armed with his Vajra, flew down in his chariot drawn by green horses to the ferocious Brahmana. The Deva king saw Utanka at his task. Assuming the form of a Brahmana concerned by the distress of Utanka, Indra said to him, 'You cannot make a path down into Nagaloka, that realm is thousands of yojanas deep. No danda can make a path that long.'

Utanka said, 'If I do not recover those earrings from the realm of the Nagas, I will die before your very eyes in the attempt, O Dvijottama.' Recognizing that there was no way he could dissuade Utanka from his purpose, Indra infused the Muni's staff with the power of his thunderbolt. At that the Earth helplessly succumbed, O Janamejaya, yielding a way to the nether world where the Nagas dwell.

Down the path went Utanka the Brahmana, and saw the Nagaloka stretching away for thousands of yojanas on every side. He beheld golden walls encrusted with marvellous gemstones, shining and iridescent, as far as his eyes could see, many pellucid rivers and tanks of pure shimmering water with flights of broad crystal steps. Utanka saw numerous trees on which were perched beautiful and exotic songbirds, and heard the magical music of those warblers. He saw the awesome gate leading into that realm, full five yojanas high and a hundred yojanas wide. Dispirited, he despaired of retrieving the earrings.

Then there appeared before him a black horse with a white tail. Its face and eyes were of a coppery hue, and it blazed with light and energy. The great horse said to Utanka, 'Do you blow into the Apana dwara of my body, my anus, and you shall have back the earrings stolen from you by a scion of the race of Airavata! Do not hesitate to do my bidding, O son; you did it often in the past in your guru Gautama's asrama.' Utanka said, 'How did I know you in my master's hermitage? Tell me how I did in the past what you now bid me do.' The wonderful black steed said, 'Know, learned Brahmana, that I am the guru of your guru, for I am Agni Jatavedas! You have always worshipped me for your guru's sake, with a pure heart, and body. It is for that reason that I have come here to help you accomplish what you want. Do not delay, do as I say!'

Utanka did as he was commanded. Gratified with him, Agni blazed up to consume everything around. From the pores of his body dense banks of smoke issued and spread, suffusing Nagaloka, O Bhaarata, enveloping it in a pall of darkness. Cries of alarm rang out from the palaces of the Airavatas. Led by Vasuki himself, O Janamejaya, the Nagas were panic-stricken. Shrouded in that dense smoke, the great edifices became invisible, like blithe woods and hills suddenly engulfed by a mighty forest. The Nagas, their eyes red and streaming, came out of their mansions to investigate. When Mahatman Utanka of blinding tejas told them why he had come, the Nagas prostrated themselves before him in abject worship. Setting all their aged and young before him, they bowed their heads and, folding their hands, cried, 'Have mercy on us, Holy One!'

Offering him padya to wash his feet and arghya to worship him, the Nagas returned the heavenly earrings to Utanka. Taking the precious ornaments, then worshipping and circumambulating the Fire God in pradakshina, Utanka set out for his guru's asrama and arrived there swiftly. He gave the earrings to Gautama's wife Ahalya and told his preceptor all that had transpired with Vasuki and the other Nagas. So it was, O sinless Janamejaya, that Mahatman Utanka fetched those jewelled karnikara for his guru's wife, and such was the prowess of that exceptional Brahmana gained by his most austere tapasya. This I believe is what you wanted to know about that Sage."

Janamejaya asked, “What did the mighty-armed Govinda of great renown do after conferring his boon on Utanka?”

Vaisampayana said, “Krishna, accompanied by Satyaki, rides on towards Dwaraka in his chariot yoked to his magnificent steeds of unparalleled swiftness. Passing lakes and rivers, forests and hills, he comes at last to Dwaravati, city of the sea. The festival of Raivataka has begun when the lotus-eyed Krishna arrives at the city of the Anartas with Satyaki Yuyudhana beside him. Raivataka hill shines with many-coloured splendour, clothed in brightness and beauty, covered with diverse koshas, mantles of jewels and gems. Decked with colourful garlands of gold and festooned with flowers, its great trees resembling the kalpavrikshas of Indra’s Nandana, and its many golden pillars bearing lighted lamps, the hill is lustrous in beauty both by night and by day.

Even at twilight it seems to be high noon, such is the light around the caves and fountains. On all sides, brilliant flags wave in the air with little bells that tinkle in the breeze. Raivataka hill rings with the melodious songs of the Vrishnis, both men and women. Ah, that hill is as enchanting as Meru with his treasures of precious gemstones. As men and women sing aloud, excited and full of joy, the swell of their music echoes to the very skies, O Bhaarata.

People give vent to their exhilaration with cheers and loud whoops of delight. The sound of thousands of voices raised together in merrymaking fills the ear and the heart with gladness. Shops and stalls abound, dispensing diverse viands, festive articles and all manner of goods. Music from vinas, venus and mridangas fill the clear, crisp air. All kinds of food and drink are freely distributed and the blind, the stricken and the distressed are showered with lavish gifts. With all this, the mountain festival upon Raivataka is auspicious indeed.

Many are the sacred caves and shrines upon the breast of that mountain, O Kshatriya, within which dwell great sages of the highest tapasya and dharma. Pavilions and mansions built for the heroes of Vrishni's race to sport in during the magnificent festival glitter day and night, making the hill as resplendent as Swarga. In truth, upon Krishna's return to his home, that prince of mountains is like Indra's own Amaravati.

Welcomed ecstatically by his kinfolk, Krishna goes gladly to his own splendid palace. Satyaki also goes to his own mansion, his heart full of joy and satisfaction. Krishna has returned home after a long while, having accomplished the most difficult feats on the field of war, even as Indra triumphed over the Danava hosts. The heroes of the Bhoja, Vrishni and Andhaka clans all come forward to receive the great one, like the Devas going to receive him of a hundred sacrifices. Krishna of fathomless intelligence honours them in return, and enquires after their welfare. With a gratified heart he then greets his father and mother. The Mahabaho is embraced by both of them and soothed with tender blessings and caresses. He assumes his throne with all the Vrishnis sitting around him. Having washed his feet and dispelled his fatigue, Krishna of indefatigable tejas, in response to his father Vasudeva's questions, now recounts the great deeds and events of the Mahabharata yuddha."

"Vasudeva says, 'O Vrishni, I have often heard men describe from hearsay the wonderful battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas. You, however, have seen it with your own eyes. Sinless one, tell us the whole story of how war broke out between the high-souled Pandavas, on the one side, and on the other Bhishma and Karna, Kripa and Drona, Salya and many more—indeed, the multitudinous Kshatriyas hailing from diverse realms, all varied in mien and attire, and all masters of arms.'

Urged by his father, and in the presence of his mother, Krishna of the lotus-petal eyes recounts the Great War in which all the Kaurava heroes perished. 'Most wonderful were the feats of all those Kshatriya Mahatmanas on the field,' he says, 'And because of their vast numbers, not in hundreds of years can all those exploits be told. I will tell you only about the most noteworthy of them, in brief, the majestic deeds of the kings of the Earth. O you of godlike splendour, Bhishma of the Kuru vamsa became the Senapati of Duryodhana's army, with the eleven divisions of the Kaurava princes under his command, even like Vasava of the celestial forces.

Shrewd Dhrishtadyumna, protected by the blessed Arjuna, was created Senapati of the seven aksauhinis of the sons of Pandu. For ten days the battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas raged, under the command of these two. So awesome and fierce was it that one's hair stood on end. On the eleventh day, Sikhandin, with Arjuna at his side, cut down Gangaputra Bhishma. He lay pierced through, yet alive, on his pitiless Kshatriya bed of arrows, waiting like an ascetic until the Sun turned from his southward journey to embark again on his auspicious northerly course; only then did that hero give up his prana and leave his lacerated body.

With Bhishma's fall, Drona became Duryodhana's Senapati, even as Kavya did of the lord of the Daityas. That greatest of Dvija warriors led the nine surviving Kaurava aksauhinis, supported by Kripa, Vrisha and others. The Panchala prince Dhrishtadyumna, sagacious knower of all the devastras, still led the Pandava legions. Bhima watched over him even as Mitra does over Varuna. Supported by the remnants of the Pandava army after the carnage that Bhishma brought to that force, the intrepid Kshatriya Mahatman Dhrishtadyumna fought ferociously against Drona. The Panchala prince keenly remembered the injury done by Drona to his father Drupada and had, indeed, sworn to kill the Acharya. Fierce and dreadful was the battle between the two, during which kings from many domains lost their lives. Five days that fearsome contention lasted, and finally Drona, exhausted, succumbed to the ferocious fire-born prince.

After Drona's death, Karna became Senapati of Duryodhana's army. By then only five Kaurava aksauhinis remained of the original eleven, and of the Pandava forces, just three. Kurukshetra turned into a veritable sea of Kshatriya blood. Innumerable heroes had been slaughtered on both sides, and the legions of the sons of Pandu took the field again, with Arjuna protecting them. On the second day of his command, the dauntless and mighty Karna died at Arjuna's hands, even like an insect drawn irresistibly to a blazing fire and consumed by it.

With the fall of Karna, the heart went out of the Kaurava army, and the three aksauhinis remaining to them were listless and without hope. Then Salya, Lord of the Madras, became Duryodhana's Senapati, and his three surviving Kaurava aksauhinis faced the Pandava army, now reduced to just a single aksauhini after losing Maharathas and Rathikas beyond reckoning, elephants and horsemen, and those remnants unnerved and dejected at the great carnage of seventeen days.

Now King Yudhishtira fought at the head of his diminished force as if he had saved his greatest strength and force for the end of the war. Before half the first day of the Madra king's command, Yudhishtira killed Salya. Soon after, Sahadeva of mighty prowess slew the deceitful Sakuni of the Gandharas, the very root of the enmity between the Kuru cousins, even as he had sworn he would on the day Panchali had been so cruelly shamed in the Kuru sabha.

When Sakuni fell, Duryodhana, his teeming army by now razed, his spirit all but broken, fled the field of battle, taking just his great mace with him. Leonine Bhimasena, his wrath unappeased, pursued him and found him hiding in the waters of the Dwaipayana Lake. With the few troops remaining of their own decimated forces, the Pandavas surrounded the lake, full of glee at having cornered Duryodhana. Pierced by his cousins' taunts like arrows of fire, Duryodhana emerged from the water, mace in hand, to face the sons of Pandu, challenging any of them to single combat to the death, with the Kuru kingdom forfeit to the victor. Bhima accepted his loathed cousin's challenge and, after a pitched duel, at last killed Dhritarashtra's evil son in the presence of the kings who remained alive.

After this, one night, while the remnants of the Pandava army slept in their encampment, Drona's son Aswatthama, maddened by his father's death at the hands of Dhristadyumna, crept into their camp and savagely slaughtered all the sleeping men and youths. Their sons murdered, their forces razed, only the five Pandavas remain alive, and Satyaki and I. As for the awesome Kaurava force, Kripa, the Bhoja prince Kritavarman and Aswatthama are its only survivors. Dhritarashtra's son Yuyutsu, who had crossed over to the side of the Pandavas before the war began, also escaped being killed.

After the slaying of Suyodhana with all his allies and followers, Vidura and Sanjaya have come to be with Dharmaraja Yudhishtira. Such, in brief, was that war to end all wars, which raged for eight and ten days, my lord. So many kings of the Earth, slain on Kurukshetra, have ascended into Swarga.' Hearing of that apocalypse from Krishna, the Vrishnis are filled with grief and pain."

Vaisampayana said, “When Krishna finishes his narrative of the Mahabharata yuddha, it is plain that he has said nothing of how Abhimanyu died. That compassionate one has no wish to recount the incident that he knows would cause his father the most sorrow: the death of his grandson. But Krishna’s sister Subhadra cries out, ‘Tell us about the death of my son Abhimanyu!’

With these words, she falls down in a faint. Seeing his daughter felled by grief, Vasudeva also collapses in a swoon. When they revive, Krishna’s father says to the Lord, ‘Lotus-eyed, you are famed across the world for always speaking the truth. Why then, Parantapa, do you not tell me today about the killing of your sister’s son? His eyes were so like yours, Krishna, tell me how he died. Ah, since my heart does not shatter in a hundred pieces and life depart this aged body, it does indeed seem, O Vrishni, that no one can die before his appointed hour.

Oh, tell me Krishna, when he fell, what did my grandchild cry out to his mother? O what did that angelic youth of the restless eyes say to me with his last breath? I trust he was not killed fleeing the field with his back to his enemies? I hope the light did not fade from his face while he fought. O Krishna, he was a doughty fighter; I can still hear his youthful voice boasting to me about his skill at arms. I hope my child does not lie on the field slain deceitfully by Drona and Karna and Kripa and others? Tell me, Krishna, about Subhadra’s son who could challenge even Bhishma and Karna.’

Even more afflicted than his suffering father, Krishna says to Vasudeva, 'His face did not lose its lustre as he fought in the van of the Pandava army. Fierce though that battle was, he did not turn his back on it for a moment. Having dispatched thousands of kings of the Earth, he was brought to grief by Drona and Karna, and finally, by Dussasana's son. If they had fought him one by one, without intermission, Abhimanyu would have killed them all—why, even Indra, had the Vajradharin come to fight him. But his enemies cunningly lured his father Arjuna away from the main battle by having the Samsaptakas challenge Partha. It was when Arjuna was far away that Drona and throngs of powerful Kaurava warriors set upon Abhimanyu. Then, O father, after your grandson slaughtered countless enemies, he succumbed to the son of Dussasana.

Extinguish this grief of yours, for your child has found Swarga for himself through his valour. Those whose minds are cleansed never grow dispirited even when faced with calamity. When he single-handedly contained Drona, Karna and all the rest, how could our splendid child not have found heaven? Irresistible one, quell this grief of yours; do not suffer yourself to be moved by wrath. That conqueror of hostile cities has attained the sacred realm gained by a valiant death from the edge of a weapon.

Subhadra was pierced through when she saw Kunti broken by our child's vile slaying, and screamed in sorrow like a female osprey that had lost its young. When she met Draupadi, my sister cried to her in anguish, "O Panchali, where are all our sons? I want to see them, I want to see them all!" Hearing Subhadra's lament, all the royal Kaurava women embraced her, beat their breasts and wept, sitting around her. To Abhimanyu's young wife Uttaraa, she cried, "O blessed girl, where has your husband gone? When he comes back, you must tell me, without a moment's delay. Ah, Virataputri, my Abhimanyu had but to hear my voice in the passage outside, when he would run out of his apartments to see me. Why does he not come out today?

Alas, Abhimanyu, all your uncles, the great Maharathas, are alive and well. They would bless you each morning as they saw you emerge at dawn, accoutred for battle. Describe to me as you used to the events of the day, my Parantapa, and your own exploits on the field. Why do you not answer your mother, weeping so bitterly?"

Deeply afflicted at seeing her daughter-in-law in that state, Kunti said to her gently, "Ah Subhadra, though Krishna, Satyaki and Arjuna himself watched over him, your young son has yet been slain, for fate willed it so. O daughter of the Yadus, he was irresistible in battle but mortal, after all. Have no doubt in your heart that he has found Swarga for himself through his death on the field of war. You are born into a noble race of Kshatriyas. Do not grieve, O you of restless glances, of eyes like lotus-petals. Turn your gaze to the young Uttaraa here, who is quick with child, and do not yield to grief. This auspicious princess will soon bring forth Abhimanyu's son. Turn your thought to that child and the future."

And setting aside her own sorrow, Kunti, deep knower of every dharma, turned her attention to the funeral rites for Abhimanyu with the acquiesence of Yudhishtira, Bhima, Nakula and Sahadeva who resembled Yama himself. In her dead grandson's name she gave many gifts to deserving Brahmanas, and bestowed many cows upon them.

This done, Kunti turned to Virata's daughter Uttaraa, now Abhimanyu's inconsolable widow, "Immaculate Virataputri, you must not give way to your grief, however dreadful. For the sake of your husband, O sweet and round-hipped girl, care for the child in your womb." And, so saying, Kunti lapsed into silence. With her leave, I have brought Subhadra here. It was even thus, O giver of honours, that your daughter's son met his death. I beg you, cast off your burning grief, irresistible one. Do not set your heart on sorrow but turn away from it.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Having listened to Krishna, mighty Vasudeva does indeed master his anguish and set himself to perform the obsequies of Abhimanyu. Krishna also performs the sacred rites for the ascension into Swarga of his splendid nephew, who had been the darling of Vasudeva. He duly feeds six million Brahmanas of tejas with the best food and gives them many fine clothes, gratifying them with wealth in excess of every expectation, Wonderful to behold are the piles of gold, the countless kine, splendid beds and rich garments that are given in daana, and the Brahmanas loudly declare, "Let Krishna's wealth multiply!'

Then, turn by turn, Vasudeva of Dasarha's race, and Baladeva, Satyaki, and Satyaka, each perform the sacred kriyas for dead Abhimanyu. Yet grief rends them and they find no comfort. It is the same with the sons of Pandu in Hastinapura: having lost glorious Abhimanyu, they, too, have lost peace of mind. Virata's daughter Uttaraa does not eat at all for many days, O King, plunging her close family in anxiety for fear that Abhimanyu's child in her womb might also perish.

Seeing all this with his mystic vision, Vyasa arrives. The Mahamuni, tejasvin, says to Kunti and Uttaraa, 'Abandon this grief, my child, for you will have a great and splendid son, through my solemn word and Krishna's power. That son of yours will rule the Earth after the Pandavas have departed it.' To Arjuna Vyasa says, in the hearing of Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, gladdening both their hearts, 'O Bhaarata, your grandson will become a Kshatriya Mahatman, a Rajarishi, a righteous ruler of this Bhumi to her very seas. Kurusottama, O Parantapa, cast off this misery. Have no doubt that it will be as I say, and as Krishna himself has said. As for Abhimanyu, he has found Devaloka, the realm of the gods he has conquered by his own magnificent deeds. You should not grieve for him, and neither should any of the other Kurus.'

The words of his grandsire, the Rishi, touch Arjuna, who does indeed shed his great dejection. And Janamejaya, you who know all the ways of dharma, your father grew in Uttara's womb even like the moon waxing during the bright fortnight.

Now Vyasa urges Yudhishtira, the royal son of Dharma, to perform the Aswamedha yagna, the great horse sacrifice. And with that he vanishes before all their eyes. Yudhishtira turns his attention to securing the wealth he will need to undertake that great yagna."

Janamejaya asked, "O Dvija, what does Yudhishtira do when Vyasa Muni tells him to perform the Aswamedha yagna? How does that king obtain the wealth buried by Marutta of old?'

Vaisampayana said, "Having heard the Dwaipayana's words, Yudhishtira summons all his brothers, Arjuna, Bhima and Madri's twins, on an auspicious day at a proper time, and says to them, 'Kshatriyas, you heard what the wise sage said, out of his love for us and his desire to see us prosper, that sage of untold tapasya and deep dharma, great Vyasa of wondrous feats, who also is our fervent well-wisher, our guru and grandsire. You have also heard what Bhishma said, and Govinda too of high intelligence. Remembering their words, O Pandavas, I am resolved to do what they have told me to; by obeying these great ones we will all find blessedness and prosperity, for all of them are Brahmavadis, speakers of the truth.

O perpetuators of the Kuru vamsa, the war has stripped the Earth of her wealth, and us as well. Kshatriyas, that is why Vyasa has revealed the secret of the treasure of Marutta of old, which lies buried in the north. If you consider that ancient treasure to be sufficient to serve our purpose, and much more, how shall we bring it to Hastinapura? Bhima, tell me what you think we should do.'

Folding his hands, Bhima says in reply, 'I agree entirely with you that we must fetch Marutta's hidden wealth to Hastinapura. If we succeed in retrieving the wealth of the son of Avikshita, O Mahabaho, we can surely and easily perform the Aswamedha yagna, rid ourselves of the sins of the war and find felicity of every kind. Yes, this is what I believe.

Let us bow our heads to the high-souled Girisa, Lord of the Mountains, offering him due worship, and go forth to find Marutta's treasure. Be you blessed, my brother. Gratifying with word, thought and deed the God of gods, along with his ganas and other companions and followers, we shall certainly acquire the olden treasure. The fierce Kinnaras who protect it will surely yield it to us if the Lord Vrishabdhvaja, Sankara of the Bull emblem, is pleased with us.' Yudhishtira Dharmaputra is gratified by what Bhima says. The others, led by Arjuna, also approve heartily, saying, 'Tathaastu, so be it!'

Thus set on retrieving the treasure of Marutta, the sons of Pandu go forth with their army under the constellation of Dhruva, Brahmanas utter blessings over them, and the heroes fervently worship Lord Mahadeva Siva with offerings of modakas, payasa of wheat and cakes made of meat, before they set out on their quest with their hearts light and full of hope.

The wisest Brahmanas, who daily feed and worship their sacred fires, utter blessings over them, chanting auspcious mantras, while the Pandavas circumambulate the priests with bowed heads and folded palms. Then they take formal leave of their uncle Dhritarashtra, wracked by grief for his dead sons, his wife Gandhari and their mother, large-eyed Pritha. Leaving Dhritarashtra's son Yuyutsu behind to look after the affairs of state, Yudhishtira and his brothers set out, while the people of the city of elephants throng the streets to bless their enterprise."

Vaisampayana said, “They set out, their hearts cheerful, accompanied by men and animals of equal confidence and enthusiasm. The earth resounds with the clatter of their chariot and carriage wheels. Hymned by Vabdhis and Sutas and Magadhas, their army behind them, the Pandavas look like so many Adityas effulgent with their own lustre. The royal white parasol unfurled over his head, Yudhishtira is as radiant as Soma, Lord of the Stars, on a full moon night. As he proceeds, Pandu’s eldest son graciously acknowledges the loud cheers and blessings showered on him by his joyful people. As for the soldiers that follow the king, their hubbub seems to fill the sky.

The host crosses many lakes and rivers, forests and pleasure gardens, and come at last to the majestic mountains. Arriving where the treasure of Marutta of old lies buried, Yudhishtira makes camp with his brothers and his troops, O Bhaarata, in an auspicious and level place. Surrounding his own tent are the fine tents of great Brahmanas, all endowed with tapasya, vairagya and deep gyana, chief amongst them his own priest Agnivesya, a master of the Vedas and all their angas. When the holy ones have performed sacrificial rites for the success of their mission, they spread themselves across the encampment, Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and all else who have come on the expedition. The Brahmanas oversee the swift construction of the camp by laying out six roads and nine divisions, setting Yudhishtira and his brothers with their ministers at its heart. Yudhishtira has a separate enclosure erected for the great elephants that have come with his force.

When everything is satisfactorily arranged, he says to the Brahmanas, 'Dvijottamas, now do what you consider necessary for the success of our quest. Ascertain and decide upon an auspicious tithi and nakshatra for us to begin. Let it be as soon as possible, rather than allowing a long time to elapse while we wait in suspense.'

The Brahmanas are delighted by what the king says. Skilled in the performance of every religious rite and eager to please and serve him, they reply as a man, 'Why this very day is a favourable one, with a most auspicious asterism ruling it. We will strive to complete the rituals even today. Maharajan, we will fast today, taking only water, and you must all do the same.'

The royal sons of Pandu pass that night without any food; they lie upon austere beds of kusa grass, even like five fires of a great yagna. The night wears on as they listen to the discourses of the learned Brahmanas on diverse subjects. When a cloudless morning dawns, those best of Brahmanas speak formally to the royal Dharmaputra."

"The Brahmanas say, 'Let offerings be made to the high-souled Mahadeva of three eyes. After dedicating these offerings, O King, we can begin to seek what we have come for.'

Yudhishtira duly makes solemn offerings to the God who delights in mountain-breasts for his pillow. Gratifying the sacrificial fire with libations of sanctified ghrita, according to the ordinance, the priest Dhaumya prepares charu to the accompaniment of mantras and appropriate rites. He takes up many flowers and sanctifies them with the holiest mantras; he solemnly offers modakas and wheat payasa and meat to Lord Siva. With more diverse blooms and with the finest fried paddy, Dhaumya, great knower of the Vedas, performs the remaining rites to Sankara.

He then makes the ordained offerings to the ghostly Ganas who form Mahadeva's entourage; next, to Kubera, Lord of the Yakshas, and to Manibhadra; then to the other Yakshas and the foremost Gana companions of Siva, the priest offers due worship, having filled many vessels with food, with krisaras and meat and kivapas mixed with sesame seeds. The king gives away thousands of cows to the Brahmanas. He then directs the offerings to the night-ranging followers of Siva. Charged with the scent of smoking dhupas, and filled with the fragrance of flowers, that whole realm, sacred to the Devadeva, O King, becomes delightful.

Having performed the worship of Rudra and of all the Ganas, Yudhishtira, setting Vyasa ahead of him, goes towards the place where Marutta's treasure is buried and once more worships Kubera, Lord of Treasures, bowing to him with reverence and paying him every bodily and spiritual homage with diverse kinds of flowers and meat-cakes and krisara. He worships the foremost of all gemstones, Sankha and Nidhi, and the Yakshas who are the lords of all jewels. Then the king of great power, having worshipped the foremost Brahmanas and evoked their blessings, and being further strengthened by their energy and auspicious mantras, finally commands the excavation to begin to unearth the ancient treasure.

He soon discovers numberless golden, jewel-encrusted vessels of diverse and beautiful forms—bhringaras and katahas, kalasas and vardhamanakas, and countless bhajanas of beautiful cast. Yudhishtira Dharmaraja has these treasures stored safely in great karaputas. A part of the treasure is borne upon the shoulders of his men in stout scales of wood with baskets slung at both ends.

Indeed, O King, there are many other means of conveyance there to bear away that wealth of the son of Pandu. There are sixty thousand camels and a hundred and twenty thousand horses; and of bull-elephants, O monarch, there are one hundred thousand. There are as many chariots and carriages, and she-elephants as well. Of mules and men the number is past counting.

Such is the vast hoard Yudhishtira unearths. Sixteen thousand gold coins are placed on the back of each camel; eight thousand in each chariot; four and twenty thousand on each elephant, while proportionate loads are set on horses and mules and on the backs, shoulders and heads of men.

Having secured and loaded the great treasure of Marutta, Yudhishtira worships Mahadeva Siva again, then sets out for home and the city of the elephant, with the leave of his Island-born grandsire Vyasa, setting Dhaumya at the head of his train. Each day they march a goyuta, some four miles, with their priceless burden, staggering under the weight of the treasure, yet joyful. Yes, glad indeed are the sons of Pandu as they make their slow way back to Hastinapura."

CANTO 66

Vaisampayana said, "Meanwhile, Krishna of great tejas returns to Hastinapura, bringing his Vrishnis with him. When he left for Dwaraka Yudhishtira had entreated him to come back, and when he knows that the time for the Aswamedha yagna has arrived, that greatest of men returns to the Kuru capital.

Krishna comes with Baladeva at the head of the train, accompanied by Subhadra. He brings with him Rukmini's son, Yuyudhana, Charudeshna, Samba, Gada, Kritavarman, the heroic Sarana, Nisatha and Unmukha. The Avatara comes especially to comfort Draupadi, Uttaraa and Kunti, and also to console all the distinguished Kshatriya women who had lost their protectors to the Great War. Dhritarashtra and Vidura Mahatman receive Krishna and his party with all honour, and Krishna remains in Hastinapura, adored by Vidura and Yuyutsu, his every need catered for.

It is while the Vrishni heroes are in the Kuru city, O Janamejaya, that your father, the great and invincible Parikshit, is born. Having been struck by the Brahma weapon of Aswatthama even while he was in his mother's womb, your royal father, the son of Abhimanyu, is stillborn. He neither stirs nor breathes when he comes forth from the womb.

The people of Hastinapura roar with joy when they hear that Uttaraa had been delivered of a prince, so that the sky rings with their celebration to all quarters of the compass. But soon after they learn that their prince has been born lifeless, and a hush engulfs the city, as reverberant as its previous glad tumult.

His own senses and mind agitated to hear that Parikshita is stillborn, Krishna rushes towards the inner apartments of the palace, taking Satyaki with him. He sees his aunt Kunti run out sobbing piteously, calling his name aloud. Behind her are Draupadi and Subhadra, and the wives of the kinsmen of the Pandavas, with tears streaming down their faces.

Kunti, daughter of the Bhoja vamsa, says to Krishna, her voice choked with tears, 'O Vasudeva, Mahabaho, when Devaki gave birth to you she became the greatest of all mothers. You are our refuge, and our glory. The race of Pandu depends upon you as its protector, O Yadava, most powerful one. This child of your sister's son has come out of the womb killed by Aswatthama. Bring him back to life, O Kesava, Yadunandana—you had sworn so, when Aswatthama had infused a blade of grass with the Brahmasirsa. Your words then were "I will revive that child if he comes out of the womb dead." That child, O son, has indeed been born dead—ah, look at him, Madhava. You must rescue us all—Uttaraa, Subhadra, Draupadi and me, Yudhishtira, Bhima, Arjuna, Nakula and Sahadeva, In this child are bound the life-breaths of the Pandavas and my own prana. O Dasarha, on this child depends the ancestral offerings of Pandu, as of Dhritarashtra, and of Abhimanyu, too, that magnificent nephew of yours who was so much like you. I beg you, Janardana, bless all of us today.

Parantapa, over and over, Uttaraa repeats the words that her husband Abhimanyu said to her. Arjuna's son had said to this daughter of Virata, "My blessed wife, your son will go to live with my uncles, the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, in Dwaraka. From them he will learn the astra shastra and all the devastras, he will learn all about dharma and artha." That is what that Parantapa, that irresistible hero, Subhadra's son Abhimanyu, had said to Uttaraa, out of his great love for her. O Madhusudana, we bow our heads at your lotus feet, we beg you to make Abhimanyu's words come true. Ah, look at the time that has come upon us all and the world.

Saying this, Kunti of the large eyes raises her arms above her head and falls to the ground. All the women with her, their eyes clouded with tears, repeatedly wail, 'Alas, alas! Vasudeva's nephew has been born dead!'

Krishna gently raises Kunti up, and comforts her."

Vaisampayana said, “When Krishna lifts Kunti up, Subhadra takes up her lament, crying aloud to her brother, ‘O you of eyes like lotus-petals, look at the grandson of wise Arjuna, stillborn—the only heir to the dwindling race of Kurus, dead. That blade of grass lifted by Drona’s son to destroy Bhima, fell on Uttaraa, on Vijaya and me. Kesava, that astra is still lodged in my heart since I do not see this child with his father, my son.

Ah, what will the Yudhishtira Dharmaraja say? What will Bhimasena and Arjuna and the two sons of Madravati say? O Vrishni, when they hear that Abhimanyu’s child was born dead, they will consider themselves cheated by Aswatthama. Abhimanyu was for certain the favourite of all the Pandavas. What will those heroes say when they hear that they have been vanquished by the astra of Drona’s son?

O first among all men, look at Kunti and Draupadi standing here. When Drona’s son sought to destroy the foetuses in the wombs of the Pandava women with the Brahmasirsa, Parantapa, you said in wrath to Aswatthama, “Wretch of a Brahmana, vilest of men, I will frustrate your evil design! I will revive the grandson of Kiritin.” I heard you, Krishna, and I know your power. Irresistible one, I worship you today and beg you to give life to Abhimanyu’s son. If you do not fulfill your pledge, be certain that I will cast off my life, O chief of the Vrishni vamsa. If you cannot revive Abhimanyu’s son now, even when you are alive and here among us, of what use can you ever be to me, Krishna? Mighty one, revive this son of Abhimanyu, this child, whose eyes are so like his—like the rain-cloud that revives lifeless crops on an arid field.

Krishna, you are the soul of dharma and truth, your power is beyond all resistance. Scourge of your enemies, you must keep your solemn word, for I know that, if you wish, you can revive all the three worlds—what need I say of this precious child born dead to your sister's son! I know your power, and that is why I implore you to show your kindness to the sons of Pandu. Surely, it is only just that you show mercy to Uttaraa and to me, knowing that I am your sister, a mother who has lost her son, one that has thrown herself upon your protection.'"

CANTO 68

Vaisampayana said, "Thus entreated by those women, himself stricken with grief, the slayer of Kesin says in a resounding voice, 'Tathaastu! So be it!' so that his words echo through the entire antahpura and revive hope and joy in everyone there, like one pouring cool water over one afflicted with heat and sweat.

Krishna enters the birth chamber where your father was born. He finds it adorned and sanctified with garlands of white flowers and pots full of holy water on every side, fragrant with burning charcoal drenched in ghee, with tinduka wood, and mustard seeds, O Mahabaho, with shining, noble weapons beautifully arrayed, and several fires lit all around.

Many elder women of the royal household, called in as midwives for your grandmother Uttaraa, throng the labour room, and many skilled and gifted physicians. Experts have placed every imaginable charm and token to keep away dark spirits and Rakshasas. Seeing that immaculate labour room, Krishna is delighted and exclaims, 'Excellent! Excellent!' Observing his face radiant with good cheer, Draupadi rushes to Virata's daughter Uttaraa and tells her, 'It is your father-in-law Krishna, Narayana himself of the inconceivable soul, the invincible one!'

Uttaraa stems her streaming tears, covers herself properly, and waits for Krishna, even as the Devas do for Vishnu. But when Krishna draws near, her anguish cannot be contained, and she cries out, 'O lotus-eyed Lord, look at us, robbed of our child! Both Abhimanyu and I are slain, Madhusudana. I bow to you in worship, O hero, I beg you give life again to my child consumed by the astra of Drona's son! If only Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, or Bhimasena, or you, my Lord, had said to that terrible day, “Let Aswatthama’s deadly blade of grass kill Uttaraa!” this would never have happened, Krishna. Ah, what has Drona’s ruthless son gained by this cruel killing of a child in its womb?

This self-same mother worships you, Parantapa, with head bowed. I will surely kill myself, O Govinda, if this child does not revive. I had invested all my hope and faith in him. When these have been frustrated by Drona’s son, what need have I to bear the burden of life any more, O Kesava? O Krishna, I had prayed that I would salute you reverently with my child in my lap. Alas, O Kesava, that hope has been destroyed. First of Beings, with the death of this child of Abhimanyu of the restless eyes, all hope in my breast has been destroyed. I know how much you loved your nephew. Look at his son now, killed by Brahma’s inexorable astra.

This is an ungrateful child, Krishna, as ungrateful as his father, as heartless, for look how, even in the face of the Pandavas’ victory and prosperity, he has abandoned this world for Yama’s halls. I had sworn that if Abhimanyu fell on the field of war, I would follow him immediately out of this life. But ah, I was too fond of my life and did not keep the oath I swore. I was cruel to my love. If I go to him now, what will Phalguna’s son say to me?’” Vaisampayana said, “The helpless Uttaraa with piteous cries implores Krishna to revive her child, until she falls to the ground as if demented. Seeing the young mother deprived of her infant lying on the ground, her body uncovered, Kunti and the other Bharata women begin again to wail aloud. Echoing with lamentation, the palace of the Pandavas is turned into a house of sorrow and dire mourning, a place where nobody can remain.

Virata’s daughter lies as if struck dead, till she regains consciousness. Taking the lifeless babe in her lap, she speaks to it. ‘You are the son of a Kshatriya who knew all about dharma, and lived by what he knew. How can you fail to fold your hands in worship to this chief of Vrishnis, you sinner? O son, go to your father and tell him from me—difficult as it is for any creature to die before its time, I am still alive when I should be dead, having lost everything that makes my life auspicious and worth living.’

She says to Krishna, ‘Mahabaho, I shall seek Yudhishtira Dharmaraja’s permission to swallow poison or cast myself on the pyre. Oh, my heart must be made of stone, for I have lost both my husband and my child and it has not yet broken into a thousand pieces.

Oh, get up, my son, and look at your great-grandmother! Look at her face bathed in the tears that gush ceaselessly from her eyes, look her drowning in a sea of sorrow. Look at the adored princess of the Panchalas, and the helpless princess of the Satwatas too. And look at me, like a deer pierced by a hunter. Yes, rise, my son, and look at the face of this Krishna,

Lord of all the worlds, this fountain of all wisdom, who eyes are so much like your dead father's!'

Now the other women raise Uttaraa up and make her sit again. Calming herself a little, she joins her palms together in worship and touches her head to the ground at Krishna's feet. The Lord of all touches water with his fingers to perform achamana and withdraws the power of the Brahmasirsa. He addresses Uttaraa in words that resound through the universe: 'I never speak falsely or in vain. What I have said will come to pass. In the presence of all the worlds I will make this child live again. Never have I told a lie, even in jest. Never have I turned my back on a battle. By that punya, let your child have life again! Even as dharma is dear to me, as Brahmanas are especially dear to me, let Abhimanyu's dead son revive! Never have I had any difference with my friend Arjuna. By that truth let your child live! As satya and dharma are always established in me, by that punya let your son have life again! As I killed Kamsa and Kesin righteously, by that truth let your child come alive!'

No sooner has he spoken than the child stirs, O best of the Bharatas, he breathes, and his limbs begin to move."

CANTO 70

Vaisampayana said, “As Krishna withdraws the power of the Brahmasirsa, your father comes alive and, lo, he illumines the chamber of his birth with his great tejas. All the Rakshasas that have gathered flee the room and many perish. A great Asariri speaks from the sky, crying, ‘Excellent, O Kesava, excellent!’ The Brahmasirsa blazes out from the infant’s body and courses its way back to Brahma, Pitamaha of all the worlds. Your father breathes and moves, O King, revealing already signs of his great spirit and might. The Bharata women are overjoyed.

At Krishna’s command, the Brahmanas chant mantras of benediction, while the rejoicing women of the Kuru antahpura begin to sing Krishna’s praises. The wives of the Bhaarata lions, Kunti, Draupadi and Subhadra, Uttaraa and the other noble women present, consorts of brave and strong warriors, are beside themselves with joy, like shipwrecked sailors who have found a boat to take them ashore.

Wrestlers and actors, bands of bards and eulogists, astrologers and those who enquire after the slumbers of princes, all are lustily crying out the praises of Krishna Janardana and calling down blessings upon the Kuru vamsa. Uttaraa, ecstatic, rises with her child in her arms and reverentially worships Yadunandana. Krishna full of joy himself, bestows on the child gifts of precious gemstones. The other lords of the Vrishni vamsa do the same.

Then, O king, puissant Janardana, embodiment of truth, gives a name to your father. ‘Since this son of Abhimanyu has been born at this time when his race was almost extinct, since he has passed through the trial of death, let him be called Parikshit, the tested one!'

Your father grows, O hero, gladdening the people of Hastinapura. When he is a month old, the Pandavas return to their capital, bringing Marutta's profuse treasure with them. Hearing that they are near, Krishna comes out of the Kuru city to receive them. The citizens of Hastinapura embellish their homes and deck the city with garlands in profusion, with beautiful pennons and standards bearing diverse emblems. To bless the sons of Pandu, Vidura orders worship to be offered to the gods established in their respective temples. The main streets are adorned with flowers, the joyful hum of voices is like the muted sound of the sea, and the festive dance and song of performers brings the city to resemble the mansion of Vasravana himself. Bards and eulogists, O Rajan, accompanied by beautiful women spread out across the city.

The celebrant winds make the festive pennons fly gaily, fluttering one way and another, as if to indicate the cardinal points to the people of Hastinapura. All ministers and high officials emerge and declare a day of rejoicing for the entire kingdom, to celebrate the successful enterprise of retrieving Marutta's ancient treasury of jewels."

Vaisampayana said, "Hearing that the Pandavas are near, Krishna Parantapa, taking his ministers with him, goes out to receive them. Greeting one another with the customary rituals, the Pandavas and Vrishnis enter Hastinapura together, filling earth and sky with the hum of their voices and the clatter of their chariot wheels.

The Pandavas return to their city in high spirits, their friends and soldiers around them, and the treasure of Marutta before them. They come, first of all, to Dhritarashtra and touch his feet, announcing themselves by name. The foremost ones of Bharata's vamsa then pay their respects to Subala's daughter Gandhari, and to Kunti, and go on to greet Vidura and Yuyutsu, Dhritarashtra's son by his Vaisya wife.

Many others arrive to pay homage to the Pandavas, blazing in glory. The Kshatriyas are told the joyful news, O Bhaarata, about the miraculous and thrilling birth of your father Parikshit. Hearing of that feat of Krishna, the sons of Pandu worship sagacious Devakinandana who is worthy of adoration.

Within a few days Satyavati's son Vyasa of burning tejas comes to Hastinapura. The perpetuators of Kuru's race receive the great Rishi according to custom; together with the princes of the Vrishni and the Andhaka vamsas, they offer worship to the sage. After some conversation on assorted matters, Dharmaputra Yudhishtira says to Vyasa, 'It is my wish to devote the treasure we have brought through your grace, to performing the Aswamedha yagna. I seek your blessing for this, O best of ascetics. We are all at your disposal, O Rishi, and Krishna Mahatman's.'

Vyasa says, ‘You have my permission, O King, to what now needs to be done. Do you worship the gods by performing the horse sacrifice with profuse gifts. The Aswamedha, Rajan, is a cleanser of sin. I have no doubt that when you have worshipped the gods with the horse sacrifice, you will be purified of all the sins of the war.’

Yudhishtira Dharmatma then sets his heart on the preparations for the horse sacrifice. Having sought Dwaipayana Vyasa’s counsel on everything needed for the Mahayagna, the most eloquent Yudhishtira comes to Krishna and says, ‘Purushottama, through you the devi Devaki has come to be known as the most fortunate of all mothers! You of unfading glory, I have come to ask you to help me accomplish the great task I have in mind, Mahabaho.

Kurunandana, it is through your grace and power that we have acquired and enjoy everything that we have today. It is you who have conquered the whole world with your prowess and intelligence. I ask you therefore to undergo the rites of initiation for the Aswamedha yagna so as to be its Yajaman. You are our highest Guru and Lord. If you perform the sacrifice, O you of the Dasarha vamsa, I shall be cleansed of every sin. You are Sacrifice; you are the Indestructible One; you are All. You are Dharma; you are Prajapati. You are the goal of all creatures. Of this I am certain.’

Krishna says, ‘It is worthy of you to say so, O Parantapa. You have become the goal of all creatures, I am certain, for your righteousness has brought you to shine in the greatest glory among all the Kuru heroes, casting others into the shade. You are my king and you are my senior. So with my approval, freely given, you must worship the Gods with the Aswamedha yagna and assign to me whatever tasks in its performance that you please. I pledge myself to accomplish whatever you bid me to, sinless one. Bhimasena, Arjuna and Madri’s twins, when you are the sacrificer, will be sacrificers too.’” Vaisampayana said, “Thus addressed by Krishna, the sagacious Yudhishtira Dharmaputra salutes Vyasa and says, ‘Mahamuni, initiate me as Yajaman when you deem that the proper time has arrived for the yagna. This my sacrifice depends entirely on you.’

Vyasa says, ‘Son of Kunti, Paila, Yagnavalkya and I shall, without doubt, accomplish every rite at the proper time. Your initiation as the sacrificer will be performed on the day of the full moon of the month of Chaitra. Let all that is needed for the yagna be readied, O best of men. Let Sutas and Brahmanas well versed in the lore of horses after careful examination select a worthy horse for your Aswamedha yagna. Then, by the injunctions of the scriptures, let that steed range across Bhumi, with her girdle of seas, proclaiming your blazing glory, O King!’

Yudhishtira, son of Pandu and lord of the Earth, answers, ‘So be it!’ and indeed he accomplishes all the Brahmavadin’s directions. Everything that is needed for the sacrifice is duly procured, and the Dharmaraja of immeasurable soul informs the Krishna Dwaipayana that all is in readiness for the yagna.

Vyasa, Mahatejasvin, says to Dharma’s royal son, ‘We are ready to initiate you in the sacrifice. Let the sphaya and the kurcha and everything else that we use during the sacrifice be made of gold. Let the horse also be loosed today, in accordance with the Shastras, and let the animal, duly protected, wander over the Earth.’ Yudhishtira says, ‘You, O regenerate one, must make the arrangements to loosen the horse and send it forth to roam across the world at its will. You must decide, O Rishi, who will ride with the horse to protect it wherever it goes.'

Krishna Dwaipayana replies, 'He who is born after Bhimasena, he who is the greatest of all bowmen and called Jishnu, who is endowed with great patience and who can overcome all resistance and enemies—he will protect the sacrificial horse. He who destroyed the Nivatakavachas can conquer the whole world by himself. He has all the devastras and his body is like a Deva's in strength and endurance. His bow and quivers are not of this world. He must follow the horse.

He is well versed in both dharma and artha. He is a master of all the great arts and sciences. O first among kings, he will have the steed roam and graze at its will as the scriptures agree. This mighty-armed prince of dark complexion, blessed with eyes that resemble the petals of the lotus, this Kshatriya, the father of Abhimanyu, will ably protect the horse. Bhimasena also is endowed with great tejas and immeasurable might. He, with Nakula beside him, will protect your kingdom. Possessed of great intelligence and fame, Sahadeva will attend to all the relatives that you have invited to your capital.'

Thus advised by the sage, Yudhishtira accomplishes his every injunction and appoints Arjuna to attend to the horse. Yudhishtira says, 'Come, O Arjuna, you shall protect the sacrificial horse. You alone can do this, none else. On your way across the world, Mahabaho, if any kings come out to challenge you, you must do everything in your power to avoid battle with them, Anagha. Invite them all to this sacrifice of mine, Savyasachin, go forth but try to establish friendly relations with them all.'

Yudhishtira Dharmaraja turns to Bhima and Nakula and commands them to be the protectors of Hastinapura. With the leave of King Dhritarashtra, Yudhishtira then sets Sahadeva, that great warrior, to wait upon all the invited guests.'" Vaisampayana said, "When the hour for the initiation arrives, all the great Ritwijas duly accomplish the purificatory and other rites for the horse sacrifice. Performing the rituals of binding the yagnapasus, Yudhishtira the Just shines with great splendour, as do the Ritwijas. Vyasa himself, Brahmavadin, great tejasvin, looses the chosen horse to range across the land of Bharata, according to the injunctions of the scriptures.

CANTO 73

Meanwhile, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, wearing a golden necklace after his initiation, blazes in beauty even like a fire. The son of Dharma, seated at the yagna vedi bearing a staff in his hand, with a black deer-skin across his chest and a red silk cloth around his waist, is as splendid as another Prajapati. All his Ritwijas wear similar raiment.

Arjuna also shines like a flame. His chariot is yoked to noble white steeds as he prepares to follow the black sacrificial horse across Bharatavarsha at Yudhishtira's command. Sounding the bowstring of his mighty Gandiva, O Naresha, his hands encased in iguana gloves, Arjuna stands ready to ride with the sacrificial horse, with his heart full of elation, O King. All the people of Hastinapura, down to the little children, come out to see the matchless Dhananjaya, foremost of the Kurus, set out. Thick and dense is the crowd of spectators gathered to look at the horse and the prince who will follow it, so packed that the friction of their bodies could almost ignite a fire. The noise they make is deafening, filling earth and sky. 'There goes the son of Kunti, following that horse of blazing beauty,' they say. 'There he is, the Mahabaho, armed with his magnificent bow.' These are the greetings heard by Arjuna of high discernment. The citizens laud him, calling out, 'Let all our blessings be yours! Go you safely, and safely return, O Bhaarata.' Others, O Naresha, cry, 'We do not see Arjuna through this crowd, but we hear the heart-quaking twang of his Gandiva. Be you blessed, O Arjuna! May every danger flee from your path, and let fear nowhere touch you. We shall see him when he returns, for return he surely will.' O King of the Bharatas, Arjuna Mahatman hears this fond refrain from the men and women of Hastinapura.

A disciple of Yajnavalkya, well versed in all sacrificial rites and a complete master of the Vedas, goes forth with Partha to perform auspicious rites along the Kshatriya's course. At the command of Yudhishtira the Just, many other great Brahmanas, all masters of the Vedas, and many Kshatriyas, too, follow the noble hero. The sacrificial horse, loosed, ranges freely over the Earth already conquered by Pandavas through the power of their weapons. Along its careen, Arjuna fights many great and wonderful battles against diverse kings, across the sacred land. I will describe these for you now.

O King, the horse roams where it will over Bhumi. First, from the north that wonderful steed turns east, followed majestically by Maharatha Arjuna Swetavahana, subjugating the kingdoms of many sovereigns. Several kings challenge the Kuru horse, for they had lost all their kinsmen, grandsires, fathers and brothers to the Great War of Kurukshetra. Innumerable Kiratas and Yavanas, all great bowmen, and diverse tribes of Mlechchas, too, who had been vanquished before, and many Aryan kings, with their soldiers and horses of great speed, irresistible in battle, encounter the son of Pandu, who faces and quells the numerous rulers of kingdoms who come out to challenge him.

I will narrate for you, O sinless king, only battles which were especially fierce, the main ones among all those he fought."

CANTO 74

Vaisampayana said, “Arjuna Kiritin fights a battle with the sons and grandsons of the Trigartas, whose hostility the Pandavas has incurred before, and who are all renowned as mighty Maharathas. Having learnt that the marvellous steed intended for the sacrifice has come to their realm, O King, those Kshatriyas don their mail, mount their chariots drawn by superb and finely caparisoned horses and, quivers strapped to their backs, surround the Aswamedha horse and endeavour to capture it.

The Kiritin tries to conciliate them, Parantapa, but they answer him with arrows. Arjuna easily contains their fire and says smilingly to those warriors in the grip of passion and darkness, ‘Desist, princes. Life is a gift that should not be thrown away.’ When he set out from Hastinapura, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja had earnestly implored him to spare those Kshatriyas whose kinsmen had been slain on the field of Kurukshetra, and now Arjuna asks the Trigartas to forbear. When they continue to ignore his pleas, Arjuna swiftly routs Suryavarman, the king of the Trigartas, with a tremendous volley of arrows, laughing in scorn at his opponent.

The other Trigarta warriors, however, fill the ten cardinal points with the roar of their chariot-wheels, flying at Dhananjaya. Displaying great lightness of hand, Suryavarman pierces Arjuna with hundreds of arrows. The other great bowmen who follow him, eager to kill Arjuna, loose dense showers of arrows on him but the Pandava cuts these down.

Suryavarman’s younger brother, Ketuvarman, rides vigorously at the legendary Arjuna. Seeing Ketuvarman approach, Arjuna, streaming arrows from his wonderful bow, swiftly despatches him with a burst of pointed shafts. At this, Maharatha Dhritavarman charges Arjuna, covering him in a well-nigh perfect cloud of deadly barbs. Arjuna Gudakesha is pleased to see the dexterity and genius of that prince, for he cannot discern when the youth draws his arrows from his quiver or sets them to his bowstring, when he bends his bow or discharges the keen shafts. Arjuna only sees endless banks of arrows fly at him through the air.

Briefly, Arjuna briefly admires the skill and valour of his young adversary and, smiling, Partha of immeasurable force engages the Kshatriya who is like an angry snake, but he does not kill him. However, while Partha fights him with restraint, Dhritavarman shoots a blazing arrow of fire at him, piercing his hand deeply so that Arjuna is dazed and the Gandiva falls out of his grasp, looking for all the world like Indra's heavenly bow.

When that great celestial bow falls, O King, young Dhritavarman laughs out loud. Incensed by this, Arjuna snatches up Gandiva and, wiping the blood from his hands, looses a ferocious storm of arrows at the Trigarta prince, this time in deadly earnest. A hubbub is heard, filling the sky and reaching to the very heavens, from diverse entities applauding Dhananjaya's inspired archery.

Seeing Arjuna now inflamed and looking like Yama himself as he appears at the end of the Yuga, the rest of the Trigarta warriors hastily surround Dhritavarman, rushing from every side to his rescue. Finding himself hemmed in, Arjuna is further incensed and in a flash despatches eighteen of the most intrepid Trigarta heroes with arrows like the weapons of Indra himself. Now the Trigarta warriors begin to run from the raging Pandava. Seeing them flee, Arjuna laughs aloud and sends firestorms of arrows after them, missiles like venom-spitting snakes. The demoralized Trigarta Maharathas scatter in all directions, terrified.

Finally, they call out to the dreaded Purushavyaghra who slew their sires of the Samsaptaka host, pleading, 'Arjuna, we are your slaves. We yield to you. Command us as you please, O Partha, for we wait here as your docile servants. Kurunandana, we will do whatever you say!'

Arjuna says to them, 'Kshatriyas, accept my dominion in the name of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja and save your lives.'"

CANTO 75

Vaisampayana said, “The splendid Aswamedha horse then wanders into the realm of Pragjyotisha. Bhagadatta’s son, the valiant King Vajradatta, learns of the arrival of the Kuru horse and sallies forth to encounter Arjuna. Vajradatta seizes the horse and turns back towards his city and palace.

Marking this, the Kuru Mahabaho bends the Gandiva and rushes at his enemy. Stupefied by Arjuna’s speeding shafts, Vajradatta lets go of the sacrificial horse and flees from Partha. Back in his capital, Vajradatta dons his armour, mounts his prince of elephants and emerges again to give the Pandava battle, fanned by a milk-white yak-tail, the white parasol of sovereignty unfurled over his head. Impelled by callowness and folly, he rashly challenges to single combat the great Arjuna, Kshatriya without equal, Maharatha of the Pandavas renowned for his fearsome exploits in battle.

Full of youthful rage, the prince directs his mountainous elephant, from whose rent temples and mouth gush juices of rut, straight at the Pandava. The great elephant’s secretions of repressed excitation fall around him like showers from a rain-cloud. That leviathan, trained as a war elephant, now beside itself with rage and the heat of musth and of war, is past controlling. Prodded by Vajradatta with a hooked iron goad, it thunders towards Arjuna like a flying mountain.

Seeing it descend on him, Dhananjaya, filled with fury and standing on the ground, O Bhaarata, faces the prince who rides on its back. The truculent Vajradatta looses a swarm of broad-headed shafts with the energy of fire that look like a storm of locusts. But even as they fly at him Arjuna cuts them down, slicing every arrow in two and three slivers with a fusillade from the Gandiva.

Seeing his broad-headed swarm of arrows foiled, Bhagadatta's son now looses an unbroken straight line of arrows, which flash at Arjuna interminably. Arjuna, his ire mounting, unleashes a burst of golden-winged barbs at Vajradatta, who falls off his elephant's back onto the ground, pierced all over. However, he is still conscious and again mounts his prince of elephants. Eager for victory, Vajradatta, never losing his nerve, coolly covers Arjuna in further flurries of arrows.

Incensed, Arjuna covers that hero and his beast with flaming volleys of shafts ablaze, narachas like venom-spitting cobras. Struck deep and sorely by these, the mighty elephant spouts geysers of blood, looking like a mountain of many springs discharging rills of water stained with red chalk."

CANTO 76

Vaisampayana said, "And so rages that battle for three days, O Lord of the Bharatas, between Arjuna and Vajradatta, like the duel of old between Indra of a hundred sacrifices and Vritra. On the fourth day, Vajradatta of vast prowess laughs loudly and thunders at Arjuna, 'Wait, wait, O Arjuna! You will not escape me with your life. I will kill you and offer tarpana for my dead father, aged Bhagadatta, who was a friend of your father. You killed him because of the weight of his years. Now fight me, Arjuna, though I am but a boy!'

With this, O you of Kuru's vamsa, furious Vajradatta once more goads his great beast at the Pandava, and that prince among elephants rushes towards Jishnu, as if cleaving the sky like a blue cloud mass drenching a hill, spraying Pandu's son with the juice of rut from his trunk. Urged on by that king, the elephant roars like an ominous thunderhead, and charges at Phalguna like a dancer in frenzy.

As Vajradatta's huge beast advances upon him, the Parantapa stands his ground unwavering, the Gandiva firmly gripped in his hand. Seeing what an obstacle Vajradatta is proving to be to his mission and, recollecting the ancient enmity of his house to the Pandavas, Partha is inflamed with rage. He looses a storm of arrows that stops the onrushing elephant even like the shore containing a surging sea.

That handsome prince of pachyderms is brought up in its course looking like a porcupine bristling with quills. Bhagadatta's son, infuriated at seeing his elephant thwarted, shoots many whetted barbs at his adversary, but Mahabaho Dhanajaya easily deflects them all with marvellous lightning volleys of his own. Again the king of the Pragjyotishas goads his elephant and sets it at the Pandava. Arjuna with all his strength unleashes a shaft like a missile of fire that goes right through it, piercing it deeply to its vitals. The great beast falls onto his side like a mountain peak struck loose by a thunderbolt, truly like a great cliff riven to its base by Indra's vajra.

Arjuna says to Vajradatta, who has fallen with his beast, 'Have no fear. Yudhishtira of deep tejas said to me, when he sent me forth on this mission, "Naravyaghra, vanquish any kings of the world who challenge you, but do not takes their lives. Nor should you slay the warriors of those kings who come forth to fight you, nor their comrades nor kinsmen. Rather, you must invite them to the Aswamedha yagna of Yudhishtira." I heard my brother's commands. I will not kill you, Vajradatta. Rise up and let no fear be yours. Return to your city safely, O Lord of the Earth. And when the day of the full moon in the month of Chaitra comes, O great king, you shall come to the horse sacrifice of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, for that is the day appointed for the mahayagna.' Bhagadatta's son, vanquished by the Pandava, says, 'Tathaastu, so be it!'" Vaisampayana said, “There follows then a great battle between the Kiritin and the hundreds of Saindhavas who survived the slaughter of their clan. Hearing that the Svetavahana has entered their realm, those Kshatriyas come out against him, for they cannot contain their hatred of Pandu’s race.

They find the sacrificial horse within their dominions and the warriors, fierce as venom, seize it with no fear of Arjuna, younger brother of mighty Bhimasena. They advance against the Pandava who waits on foot, armed with his bow, and assail him from close quarters. Those heroes of mighty tejas surround Partha, proclaiming their names and lineages and declaring their feats of arms as they shower their arrows on Partha. Defeated before in battle, they are intent upon vanquishing Arjuna and shoot at him arrows powerful enough to strike down elephants. Fighting from chariots themselves, they attack Arjuna who stands on the ground alone.

From every side they attack that hero, slayer of the Nivatakavachas, destroyer of the Samsaptakas, that Kshatriya who killed their king Jayadratha at the twilight hour. Hemming him in with a thousand chariots and ten thousand horses, as within a cage, those dreadful warriors roar in exultation. They remember how Arjuna beheaded Jayadratha and lash dark arrows down on him like violent rain from thunderheads. Arjuna looks like the sun obscured by a black cloud, like a bird caught in an iron cage.

Seeing the son of Kunti so beset, the sun himself is shorn of his splendour, and cries of dismay echo through the three worlds. A fierce wind begins to blow, O King, and Rahu swallows both sun and moon together.

Meteors crash into the solar disc and flare away in different directions, course through the sky and fall on the face of the moon as well. Kailasa, prince of mountains, begins to tremble and the Saptarishis in the firmament and the other Devarishis, pierced with fear and anxiety, give vent to hot sighs. Reddish clouds, with braids of lightning playing in their midst, spanned by the bow of Indra, fill the sky and pour down on the earth a macabre rain of flesh and blood.

Such is the aspect all Prakriti assumes when that Kshatriya is inundated, overwhelmed and stupefied by the Saindhava offensive. The mighty Gandiva falls from Arjuna's nerveless hands and his leathern shield also, but the onslaught continues. The Devas, seeing Arjuna surrounded and overwhelmed, are filled with alarm and begin to chant diverse mantras of blessing over him. The Devarishis, the Saptarishis and all the Maharishis of the three realms fervently intone silent mantras to award victory to the eclipsed Dhananjaya. At last, through the prayers and benedictions of those denizens of Swarga, the tejas of Partha ignites again and the hero who is a master of every devastra stands up, immovable as a mountain.

The delighter of the Kurus takes up his celestial bow. He pulls its bowstring, sending forth a reverberation like the roar of a mighty machine. Then, like Purandara lashing down his rains, mighty Arjuna looses gales of arrows at his enemies. Now it is the Saindhava warriors and their chiefs who become invisible, shrouded by the Pandava's arrow-storms like trees by locusts. The very sound of the Gandiva terrifies them, and in helpless panic they flee the battle, howling with fear. The peerless Kuru Kshatriya now storms through his foes with the speed of a fiery wheel, spraying arrows relentlessly from his Gandiva in every direction like Indra, the wielder of the thunderbolt, a sight marvellous and magical. Arjuna looks like the resplendent autumn sun dispersing clouds with his penetrating rays of light."

Vaisampayana said, "The irresistible wielder of the Gandiva straddles the field like Himavat himself. Rallying again, the Saindhavas rush at him once more from every side, loosing ferocious downpours of arrows at him. Arjuna Mahabaho laughs at his enemies who have returned to do futile battle with him although on the brink of death.

Coolly he says to them, 'Fight me with all your strength, O heroes, put forth all your prowess. But perform all your karma-kriyas before you do so, for mortal danger awaits you all. Look how effortlessly I cut down your clouds of arrows and contain all of you together. Ah, I see you are still bent on battle. Wait a little, I will soon quell your pride.'

No sooner has he said these words, O Bhaarata, than he remembers the injunction of his eldest brother Yudhishtira: 'You should not kill those Kshatriyas who come against you for battle, O child. Defeat them, but never take their lives,'

The foremost of men Arjuna reflects on what the Mahatman had said to him: 'My brother said I should not kill a warrior who challenges me. I must not transgress his wish in the least or render his word false by my action.' Arjuna then addresses the fierce Saindhavas. 'Listen to me, for I speak for your own good. Though you stand before me on the field of battle, I have no wish to kill any of you. I will spare the life of any man who says to me that I have vanquished him and that he is mine. You have heard me now, I ask you to do what is in your own interest. To do otherwise will put you in the way of mortal fear and peril.'

Saying this, Arjuna again unleashes his furious arrow-storms at the Saindhavas; and they, equally incensed and possessed by the spirit of battle, cover him with thousands of unerring shafts. Dhananjaya, wielding the Gandiva, with whetted barbs of his own, cuts off those deadly volleys of arrows like poisonous snakes feathered with the plumage of the kanka bird, before they can reach him.

The Saindhava Kshatriyas, recollecing how Arjuna killed their king Jayadratha, hurl darts and javelins at him, but the Kiritin of great might shreds all their weapons in the air. At length the Pandava's ire rises to a point where he can no longer restrain his wrath and Arjuna severs the heads of many of the Sindhus who converge on him aggressively from every side.

Now many flee from his blazing rage, others continue to dash towards him, while still others stand unmoving, but all are heard roaring in wrath and grief, like the ocean in tumult. They continue to fight Arjuna, each according to his strength, while he strews the ground with their heads. The Saindhava war-horses and elephants grow exhausted, and Partha strikes their riders unconscious with his sharpest shafts.

Then Dussala, their queen, the daughter of Dhritarashtra, knowing that the Sindhu forces are growing dispirited, takes her grandson in her arms to Arjuna. The brave little prince, the son of Suratha, comes to his uncle for the sake of the Saindhava warriors. Coming into the presence of Dhananjaya, Dussala begins to weep and, seeing her tears, Arjuna puts down his bow and courteously asks his sister what he can do for her.

The queen says to him, 'Lord of the Bhaaratas, this child is the child of your sister's son Suratha. He salutes you, O Partha. Look at him, foremost of men.' Arjuna asks her, 'Where is Suratha?' Dussala replies, 'He died of grief, Arjuna. I will tell you how. Ever since Suratha heard how you slew my lord Jayadratha he was gripped by a burning sorrow. Then, when he heard that you had arrived in this realm with the horse for the Aswamedha yagna, in great affliction of heart he fell down and gave up his life-breath. Truly, hearing of your arrival here he collapsed and died. Seeing him lie lifeless upon the ground, Dhananjaya, I picked up this little son of his and have come to you for your protection.'

Saying this, the daughter of Dhritarashtra breaks into piteous sobs. Arjuna stands disconsolately before her, his face hanging down in sorrow. The woeful sister then says to her brother, also wrapped in dejection, 'Arjuna, look at your sister, and look at child of your sister's son. O

Kurupravira, you know dharma in all its depth and subtlety. Forget Duryodhana and the evil Jayadratha—show mercy to this child. Even as Parantapa Parikshit has been born of Abhimanyu, so has this mighty-armed child, my grandson, sprung from Suratha. Bringing him with me, I have come to you, Lord of men, to beg for the lives of all these Saindhava warriors.

Listen to me, great Arjuna. This child of your wicked enemy has come to you for refuge. You must not deny him your mercy, Mahabaho. Parantapa, this infant bows his head in supplication, appealing to you for peace. Knower of dharma, be gracious to this child who has lost all his kinsmen. Do not yield to anger, Partha. Forget this prince's disgraceful and cruel grandfather, who offended you so direly. Ah, noble Arjuna, do not deny this infant your kindness and grace.'

Arjuna, thinking sorrowfully of Queen Gandhari and King Dhritarashtra, condemns the ruthless Kshatriya code, saying to Dussala, 'Fie on Duryodhana, that low and vain scoundrel who always coveted kingdom! Alas, it was because of him that I sent all my kinsmen to Yama.' Dhananjaya comforts his cousin and accepts the peace offered, embraces Dussala and asks her to return to her palace. Dussala commands all her warriors to desist from battle and, worshipping Arjuna, she of the beautiful face turns back into her city.

Having thus vanquished the Saindhavas, Arjuna once more follows the Aswamedha horse even as the divine wielder of the Pinaka once long ago pursued the sacred deer through the firmament. At its will, the horse ranges through one realm after the other, and wherever it goes the feats of Arjuna and his fame swell in tide.

In due time, O Lord of men, the horse arrives in the dominions of the King of Manipura, followed by Pandu's matchless son."

CANTO 79

Vaisampayana said, “The ruler of Manipura, Babhruvahana, hears that his father Arjuna has arrived within his dominions and goes out to meet him in all humility, with a number of Brahmanas and some treasure in his van. However, sagacious Dhananjaya disapproves of this.

Phalguna reproves him angrily. ‘Your conduct does not become a Kshatriya. You have fallen away from your royal duties. I have come here as the protector of Yudhishtira’s sacrificial horse. Why will you not fight me, O son, seeing that I have entered your dominions? Fie on you of feeble understanding that have fallen away from Kshatriya dharma! Fie on you that would receive me peacefully, like a woman, even though I have come here to seek battle with you. If I had come to you unarmed, this behaviour might have been appropriate. Fie on you, worst of men, for your wretched understanding ’

The Naga princess Ulupi hears these words spoken by her husband Arjuna and, unable to tolerate them, cleaves the earth and appears in that place. She sees her son standing there dejectedly, his head hung down as Arjuna, wanting battle with Babhruvahana, rebukes the prince. Beautiful Ulupi of comely limbs reminds her son of his duty: ‘Know that your mother Ulupi is the daughter of a snake. Do you now accomplish my behest, O son, for you will acquire great punya through it. Give fight to your father, that foremost one of Kuru’s race, irresistible in battle, and have no doubt that he will be pleased with you.’

In this manner is King Babhruvahana roused against his sire, until the prince of tremendous tejas decides to take arms against his noble father, O chief of the Bharatas. Putting on his armour of bright gold and his effulgent headgear, he ascends a magnificent chariot equipped with hundreds of fine quivers filled with arrows, a ratha yoked to steeds endowed with the speed of the mind. It has beautiful wheels and a splendid pushkara, and is embellished with golden adornments of every kind.

Raising his standard with its device of a golden lion, the handsome Babhruvahana advances against his father. He swoops down on the horse of the Aswamedha and has it seized by his masters of equine knowledge. Seeing the steed captured, Arjuna is filled with pride and joy.

Standing on the earth, that Kshatriya without equal unleashes storms of arrows, each like a venom-spitting cobra, at his mighty son, who rides at him in his chariot. Ah, the battle between sire and son is truly like the ancient battle of the Devas and Asuras. Each one is deeply gratified at having the other for an antagonist. Laughing aloud in delight, Babhruvahana pierces his father, the Kiritin, right through his shoulder with an arrow like a streak of lightning; the feathered shaft ploughs into Arjuna's body as a snake burrows into an anthill. It bores right through Arjuna, into the ground behind him.

Pain lances through Arjuna at the ferocity of his son's barb and the Kaunteya has to pause, supporting himself on his magnificent bow. He stands, having recourse to his divine tejas, seeming to outward appearance like one deprived of life. Then, coming to himself again, that greatest of men praises his son. The splendid son of Indra cries, 'Excellent, excellent, Mahabaho, O son of Chitrangada! I am gratified to see your prowess, my son. I will now fight you. Stand steadfast before me.'

With this, Arjuna Parantapa looses a burst of arrows at Babhruvahana. The young king cuts down those tremendous shafts shot from the Gandiva, each as brilliant as Indra's Vajra, some into two and others into three pieces. Next Partha cuts down Babhru's golden standard that stands as tall as a shining palmyra and laughingly kills his son's horses of great size and speed. Babhruvahana, inflamed, leaps down from his ratha and fights his sire on foot. Arjuna, gratified with the valour of his son, assails him hotly.

Convinced that his father weakens before him, the mighty Babhruvahana covers Arjuna with serpentine narachas virulent as fire-spitting cobras. From youthful enthusiasm the King of Manipura strikes Arjuna squarely through his chest with a golden-winged shaft that pierces Partha agonizingly, into his vitals. Dhanajaya, archer without equal, falls to the earth unconscious. Babhruvahana too falls down in a swoon at the same moment, from the wounds Arjuna has inflicted on him and from seeing his father collapse.

Chitrangada rushes out weeping on to the field of battle. Her heart burning with shock and grief, Babhruvahana's trembling mother sees her husband lying lifeless on the ground.'

Vaisampayana said, “Lamenting aloud and burning with grief, that celestial beauty with eyes like lotus-petals crumples to the ground. Regaining her senses, Chitrangada sees the daughter of the snake king Ulupi before her and cries, ‘Ah, Ulupi, look where our lord, the Vijaya, lies slain, because you incited my immature son to fight him. Do you know nothing of a wife’s dharma towards her spouse? Do you not love your husband? It is because of you that he has been killed.

Oh, if Dhananjaya has offended you in any way, I beg you to forgive him and use your powers to bring him back to life. For you do know love and dharma, both! You are renowned for your virtue through the three worlds, most blessed Ulupi. Yet how is it that, having made my son kill your husband, you show no sign of grief? O Naga princess, my son is dead but I do not grieve for him, who has shown his father such hospitality, only for my husband!’

Chitrangada turns to Arjuna, lifeless on the earth, and addresses him, ‘Arise, my dear lord, for you are Yudhishtira’s dearest brother whom he loves like none else. Here is your horse. Look, I have set it free. O puissant one, you must follow it across the world for the sake of the Dharmaraja. Why then do you lie still on the ground? My prana depends on you, O Kurunandana. How can he who bestows life-breath on others cast his own away today?

Ulupi, look at this sight, your husband prostrate on the ground. How is it that you do not grieve, having incited my son to kill great Dhananjaya? As for Babhruvahana, it is fitting that he should die today and lie upon the earth, lifeless beside his father. Oh, let Vijaya, let him that is called Gudakesa, let this peerless Kshatriya of the reddened eyes, return to life.

O Ulupi of the Nagas, taking more than one wife is no fault in men, least of all in such great ones. Only women incur sin by taking more than one husband. So do not harbour any feelings of wrath or revenge against our lord Arjuna. Your bond was decreed by the Supreme Ordainer himself. It is eternal and unchangeable. Be true to that sacred tie now. If now, after killing your husband through my son, you do not revive him, I too will cast off my life-breath. I cannot bear the grief of losing both my husband and my son, I shall sit here in prayopavesha until life leaves my body.'

With that, the princess Chaitravahini sits on the ground in praya, plunging into deep dhyana and silence. No word or sound comes from the disconsolate queen; she takes Arjuna's feet onto her lap and sits silently, only letting a deep sigh escape her lips, longing for Babhruvahana also to be restored to life.

Regaining consciousness, King Babhruvahana opens his eyes and sees his mother sitting on the ground with Arjuna's head in her lap. He exclaims, 'What can be more painful than this sight—my mother, brought up in luxury, sitting on the rude ground, her lord stretched out beside her in death? Alas, this Parantapa, this foremost of all warriors, has been slain by me! Certainly, no one dies till his fated hour comes. Oh, the heart of this princess must be very hard since it does not break even at the sight of her mighty-armed and broad-chested husband lying dead before here—neither my heart nor my mother's!

Look where this Kurusottama's golden kavacha lies torn from his majestic body, after I, his son, killed him. Alas, you Brahmanas, look at my heroic sire lying prostrate on the earth, on a Kshatriya's bed on the field of battle, slain by his son. What protection did you give him, you who were sent to accompany this foremost Kuru when he followed the Aswamedha horse? Now, Brahmanas, tell me what penance I, this cruel and sinful wretch, should undergo for this dreadful sin of killing my own father! I should suffer every kind of torment, wander the earth covering myself with Arjuna's skin, to proclaim my sinful deed.

Even if my father's head were to be cloven in two and the halves given to me to carry across this vast Bhumi, there would be no expiation of my parricide. Behold your husband lifeless on the ground, Nagina, and look at me who killed him. I have done what pleased you and I will today follow my father out of this world. Oh, blessed one, nowhere can this wretched Babhruvahana find solace. Mother, may you be happy today, seeing both Arjuna and his son dead. I swear to you by truth itself that I will give up my prana today.

Saying so, the stricken young king touches holy water and cries, 'Let all creatures, those that move and those that are immobile, bear witness to my solemn word. Do you also listen to me, O mother Ulupi, for it is the truth that I speak, O best of Naginas. I say to you that if this Purushottama, my father Vijaya, does not rise up, I will sit here on this very field, in prayopavesha and emaciate myself. There is no salvation for me for my sin is Pitri-hatya, father-murder, and I will surely sink into the worst hell.

After killing a heroic Kshatriya, one is cleansed by making a gift of a hundred cows. But after killing my own father, where can I find redemption? This Arjuna, the son of Pandu, was the greatest Kshatriya in the world, and none could remotely match his tejas. He was righteous, he was the author of my being. How can I ever be saved after taking his life?'

Babhruvahana, king of the Manipuras, touches water again, and falls silent. He means to starve himself to death. The Naga queen recalls the occult jewel of her race that has the power to revive the dead, and mystically she summons it. That gemstone comes subtly to her, and she utters words that delight the warriors standing stricken on the field. 'O son, rise up, do not grieve. You have not vanquished Jishnu, for no man, not even the Devas led by Indra, can defeat this Kshatriya. It is an illusion I created with my maya power to deceive your senses and to please your mighty father.

O prince of the Kuru vamsa, this Parantapa came here to have battle with you, wanting to see his son's prowess. Mighty king, that is why I urged you to fight him; you must not think that you sinned in the least by accepting his challenge. Dear child, not Indra himself can face your father in battle, for the one you know as this Pandava is none other than the ancient Rishi Nara himself, eternal and indestructible. Here, take this celestial jewel from me that revives the snakes as often as they die. Place it upon Dhananjaya's breast and you will see him come to life again.'

Surging with love for his father, the sinless Babhruvahana takes that gemstone of divine power and lays it on Arjuna's chest. The intrepid Jishnu's reddened eyes open and he sits up like one risen from a deep sleep. Seeing his father alive and serene, Babhruvahana folds his hands and worships Arjuna. Indra rains down blooms of ineffable fragrance on Arjuna Purushavyaghra and drums struck by no hand resound everywhere, reverberant as thunder. The heavens echoes with cries of exultation from the divine ones gathered there. Mahabaho Dhananjaya rises and embraces his son, smelling the top of his head lovingly. Then he sees Chitrangada at a slight remove, weeping, and Ulupi beside her.

Arjuna asks, 'Why these signs of grief, wonder and joy on this battlefield? Tell me, O Parantapa, why has your mother come to the field, and Ulupi as well? I do know that you fought me at my own behest. But what has fetched these royal ladies here?' The illustrious Lord of Manipura bends his head before his sire, and says, 'Let Ulupi answer your question.'"

CANTO 81

"Arjuna turns to Ulupi and asks her, 'What has fetched you here, O Devi of the Kuru vamsa, and why has the ruler of Manipur's mother come to the field of battle as well? O Nagina, do you harbour affection for this king and, O you of restless glances, do you also wish me well? O you of ample hips, I hope neither this Babhruvahana nor I have caused you any injury, however unknowingly, lovely Devi. Has Chitrangada of perfect limbs, of the race of Chitravahana, done you any wrong?'

The daughter of the snake prince replies, smiling, 'You have not offended me, nor has Babhruvahana done me any wrong, nor his mother, who is always as obedient to me as a handmaiden. Listen, and I will tell you why I contrived all that happened. Do not be angry with me. Indeed, I bow my head to you in reverence. O prince of the Kuru vamsa, I did all this for your own good, mighty one.

Dhananjaya Mahabaho, during the Great War on Kurukshetra you killed Bhishma by unrighteous ways. You did not kill him while he was fighting you but with the help of Shikhandin, while Bhishma faced the Panchala prince. That was a grievous sin, and I have today expiated it. If you had died without atonement for that wrong, you would have found hell for yourself. What you received from your son today was exoneration for that sin against your grandsire.

Lord of the Earth, I was once witness to the Vasus cursing you after the fall of Santanu's son. After you slew Bhishma, the Vasus had come to the Ganga to bathe in her sacred waters. Intelligent one, when they were in the river, they called the Devi Ganga, and when she appeared in their midst, said to her in wrath, “Santanu’s son has been killed by Dhananjaya, O Devi, when he was facing Sikhandin with his weapons laid down. For this sin we pronounce a curse on Dhananjaya today!” And to this Devi Ganga assented, saying, “Tathaastu, be it so!”

I was stricken at these words and dived down into the deepest Patala and told my father, the Naga king, what I had seen and heard. He, too, was plunged in grief and went to the Vasus, seeking to prevail upon them by every means to withdraw their curse. They said to him, “Arjuna has a most blessed young son who is the King of Manipura. When he strikes his father down on the battlefield, O Prince of Snakes, Dhananjaya will be freed from our curse. You may go back now.”

My father came back and told me what had transpired. This is why I freed you from the curse of the Vasus. Lord Indra himself cannot vanquish you in battle. But the son of a man is his own self, and that is why Babhru was able to defeat you today. Mahabaho, I am not guilty of any fault and you have no cause to censure me for what I did.’

Arjuna is delighted and says to her, ‘Devi, I am pleased with what you have done!’ Arjuna then says to his son, in the hearing of Chitrangada, daughter-in-law of the Kuru house, ‘The Aswamedha yagna of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja will be conducted on the day of full moon in the coming month of Chaitra. Come there, O King, with your mother and your counsellors and officers.’

With tears in his eyes, Babhruvahana says to his august father, ‘O knower of all dharma, I will surely come to the great horse sacrifice, and take upon myself the task of distributing food among the Brahmanas. But now, my lord, be gracious to me—come with both your wives into this city, which is your own. Do not hesitate, my father, you will in no way break dharma by enjoying one night in this your own home. Tomorrow you can follow the sacrificial horse again, O greatest of victorious Kshatriyas.’

The son of Kunti, whose banner bears the image of Hanuman, replies to Chitrangada’s royal son, ‘Mahabaho, you of the large eyes, you know the oath I have taken. Until the termination of my vow I cannot enter your city. O best of men, this horse ranges at its will. My blessings upon you! I must leave now, for there is no place in which I might rest for even a brief while.’ Then, duly worshipped by his son and taking leave of both his wives, mighty Arjuna, the son of Indra, once more goes on his way.”

CANTO 82

Vaisampayana said, “Having wandered at its will over the sea-girt earth, the steed stops suddenly and turns its face again to Hastinapura. Following the horse, Arjuna Kiritin also turns back towards the Kuru capital. Wandering at its will, the horse comes to the city of Rajagriha, O Rajan, where it is stopped by Meghasandhi, son of Sahadeva. Conscious of his Kshatriya duties, he emerges from his city in his chariot, fully armed, and challenges Arjuna, who as always is on foot.

Possessed of great energy but still young and callow, Meghasandhi says rashly to Arjuna, ‘O Bhaarata, this horse of yours appears to roam at will, protected only by women. I mean to take this beast for myself and keep him, and you can strive to free him. Although my sires did not tutor you in battle, I must observe Kshatriya dharma in extending my hospitality to you. Do you strike me, Arjuna, for I shall surely strike you!’

Smiling, Arjuna replies, ‘I am sworn to resist any man who arrests the horse of my brother Yudhishtira’s Aswamedha yagna. I have no doubt, O King, that you are aware of this vow. Strike me to the best of your power—I am not angry with you.’

At once, like Indra of the thousand eyes, the ruler of Magadha unleashes a storm of arrows at the Pandava. With unearthly swiftness and accuracy, the wielder of the Gandiva cuts down every shaft of that storm, O Bhaarata, and then looses a battery of missiles of his own at Meghasandhi, every barb like a fire-mouthed serpent. Arjuna cuts down Meghasandhi’s banner and his flagstaff, slices off his chariot pole and yoke and draws blood from his horses, but he does not aim a single shaft at the bodies of the young king or his charioteer, though he could have felled them in a moment with his left hand.

However, thinking that it is his own prowess that has secured him, Meghasandhi continues to attack Partha with countless arrows, piercing him deep so that Pandu's son spouts blood like a palasa tree flowers in spring. Arjuna has no wish to kill the prince of Magadha, and it is this alone that saves the young warrior. But when Meghasandhi does not stop harrying him, Arjuna's Kshatriya blood rises and in a blur he kills his youthful adversary's horses and sloughs off his charioteer's head. With a razor-headed shaft he breaks Meghasandhi's large and beautiful bow and shatters his leathern shield. Another barrage of arrows bring the young Kshatriya's flagstaff crashing down.

That foolish but brave prince of Magadha leaps down from his ruined chariot, and rushes at Arjuna with a gold-embossed mace. Arjuna smashes it with a clutch of vulture-feathered arrows and the gada, its bejewelled knots severed, falls to the ground like a cast-down nagina. Seeing the prince now without chariot, bow or mace, helpless before him, the foremost of warriors says to the crestfallen Meghasandhi, 'Son, despite your tender years you have kept Kshatriya dharma and shown great valour. Go back to your city now. Yudhishtira has commanded me to not kill anyone who opposes me in battle. You have wounded me sorely, yet I am bound to keep my word to my brother, and this is why you are still alive.'

Meghasandhi, now humbled, thinks himself fortunate to be spared. He folds his hands in reverence to Arjuna, and worships him, saying, 'Great Arjuna, you have vanquished me in battle and I dare not continue fighting you. Tell me what I should do for you, and consider your command as good as accomplished.' Comforting him again, Arjuna says, 'You must come to the Aswamedha yagna of our king Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, that will be held at the coming full moon of Chaitra.' The son of Sahadeva says, 'So be it', and walks around Arjuna in pradakshina, worships the sacrificial horse as well, then turns backs into his city.

Now the Aswamedha steed of the beautiful mane ranges away again along the coast to the realms of the Bangas, the Pundras and the Kosalas. In those realms, O King, Dhananjaya with his Gandiva vanquishes innumerable Mleccha armies one after another."

Vaisampayana said, "After receiving the worship of the King of Magadha, Pandu's son Swetavahana follows the horse of the sacrifice southwards. Coursing along at will, the mighty horse arrives at the beautiful city of the Chedis, named after the oyster. Sarabha, the powerful son of Sishupala, meets Arjuna with battle first, and then, subdued by that great hero, worships the Pandava with deep honour.

The sacrificial horse and Arjuna range on to the realms of the Kasis, the Angas, the Kosalas, the Kiratas and the Tanganas. Receiving due reverence in all those kingdoms, Dhananjaya then follows the Aswamedha animal to the country of the Dasarnas, ruled by Mahabaho Chitrangada, scourge of his enemies. A formidable pitched battle breaks out between the two Kshatriyas, but Arjuna conquers Chitrangada soon enough and receives his fealty and homage.

Now that best of all heroes, the Kiritin, comes to the domain of the Nishada king, the son of Ekalavya, who also meets him in battle. Indeed, the contention between the Pandava and the Nishadas is hair-raisingly fierce and relentless. But the tameless Arjuna prevails over Ekalavya's son and receives due homage. Arjuna follows the sacrificial horse towards the southern ocean, where he engages the Dravidas and Andhras, the fierce Mahishakas and the hillmen of Kolwa. Subjugating those tribes without taking any life, Arjuna journeys on to the country of the Surashtras, always following the horse for the mahayagna. He goes to Gokarna and to Prabhasa, and then reaches beautiful Dwaravati, protected by the heroes of the Vrishni clan.

When the handsome sacrificial horse of the Kuru king comes to Dwaraka, the Yadava youths want to use force to restrain that best of all steeds. However, King Ugrasena quickly comes out and checks them. Then that sovereign of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas comes forth from his palace, along with Vasudeva, Arjuna's uncle, and receives the Kuru hero with great delight and warmth. The two elderly lords duly honour the Kuru prince, and with their leave and blessings he resumes following the Aswamedha horse.

The steed courses along the coast of the western ocean until it arrives in the land of the five waters, fecund, populous and prosperous. Thence, O King, it runs on to the kingdom of the Gandharas, where it wanders at will, followed by the great son of Kunti, until its progress is challenged by the king of the Gandharas, the son of Sakuni, who remembers his father's bitter grudge against the Pandavas. A fierce battle ensues between him and Arjuna Kiritin."

Vaisampayana said, “The heroic son of Sakuni, a Maharatha among his people, brings a large force with him and challenges Arjuna of the waving locks. Sakuni’s son has in his army elephants, horsemen and chariots, all flying bright banners and flags. Burning to avenge the slaying of their king Sakuni, those warriors, armed with bows, charge Partha in a host.

The unvanquished Bibhatsu of righteous soul addresses them peaceably, but they have no ears for the message of goodwill that he brings from his brother Yudhishtira. With mild words Arjuna counsels them against fighting, but they give themselves up to the wrath simmering in their hearts and surround the Aswamedha horse. At this, Arjuna, greatest among Kshatriyas, becomes incensed and effortlessly decapitates many of those warriors with razor-headed shafts. Some of the Gandharas are frightened, free the sacrificial horse and withdraw from battle. However, others remain surrounding him and, naming each of those whom he despatches, Arjuna beheads many more of these. Then their king, Sakuni’s son, rides in person to confront the son of Pandu.

Arjuna says to him, ‘Yudhishtira, whom I serve, has commanded me to kill no king who challenges me to battle. Stop fighting, O Kshatriya, do not court defeat.’ But the youthful king, blinded by rage, ignores Partha and attacks him more furiously still. Arjuna plucks the crown from the Gandhara king’s head with a crescent-tipped arrow that bears it away a great distance, even as another shaft of his once had borne away the head of Jayadratha. This astonishing feat leaves all the Gandhara warriors wonderstruck. They realize that the crown could have easily been their prince's head, had Arjuna not spared his life.

The Gandharas fly the field like a herd of frightened deer, led by their king, wheeling dazed around the field of battle like men deprived of their senses, not knowing how to escape the superhuman warrior before them. With broad-headed shafts, Arjuna cuts off the heads of many; others lose their arms to his arrows, but are so petrified that they scarcely notice; verily, none can withstand his prowess. That great force, which came to battle with countless elephants, horses and foot soldiers, is now put to rout and reduced to a rabble, wandering across the bloodied field in aimless and bemused circles. None can withstand the famed Kuru hero.

Then, stricken with dread, the mother of the Gandhara king comes out of her city, bringing with her the aged ministers of the kingdom and a splendid arghya, and presents herself to the indefatigable Arjuna. She forbids her heroic son, Sakuni's prince, to fight any further and pacifies the tireless Jishnu. Arjuna worships her duly and resumes his kindly disposition towards the Gandharas.

Comforting the son of Sakuni, he says, 'Mahabaho, you have not pleased me by setting your heart on this futile battle. Parantapa, sinless one, you are my cousin and my brother. Remembering my mother Gandhari, and for the sake of Dhritarashtra as well, I spared your life; there is no other reason why you still live and breathe. But look, how many of your men have died because of your rashness. Let hostilities cease, and do not ever suffer your mind to be led astray. You must come to the Aswamedha yagna of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, which will be held on the day of full moon of the month of Chaitra.'" Vaisampayana said, “With these words, Arjuna once more follows the sacrificial horse, which now takes the way leading back to Hastinapura. Yudhishtira hears from his informers that his steed has turned back. Hearing that his Vijaya has been triumphant all the way and is unharmed, he is filled with joy.

Yudhishtira Dharmaraja realizes that it is the twelfth day of the lighted fortnight in the month of Magha, and that the constellation is favourable and auspicious. He summons his brothers Bhima, Nakula and Sahadeva, and that king of righteousness, of refulgent tejas, foremost of all knowers of dharma, says at the proper time to his brother Bhima, mightiest of Parantapas, ‘I have just learnt from these men who went with Arjuna that the Aswamedha horse has turned back to Hastinapura. Both the steed and Arjuna are near. The time for the yagna has come. The day of the full moon of Magha is at hand, and the next month draws near, O Vrikodara. Let our most learned Brahmanas who know the Vedas look for an appropriate spot where the sacrifice of the horse can be successfully conducted.’

Bhima goes forth to obey his royal brother’s behest, delighted to hear that Arjuna will soon be home. He takes with him a number of experts in laying out grounds and constructing yagnashalas for great sacrifices, as well as Brahmanas well versed in sacrificial rites. Bhima selects a beautiful, expansive area and orders it to be measured for the demarcation and building of the sacrificial compound. Many structures are built on it, and high and broad roads laid out.

Soon enough, the Kaurava hero causes the place to be stocked with splendid mansions. He has the ground levelled and smoothed with precious stones, and adorned with many structures made of gold, columns and wide triumphal arches. The righteous-souled prince has spacious apartments created to accommodate the royal ladies and the kings from numerous realms who will grace the mahayagna. The son of Kunti also builds mansions for the great Brahmanas who are expected to come from diverse kingdoms.

Then Mahabaho Bhimasena, at Yudhishtira's command, sends out messengers to the great kings of the Earth. Those best of kings come to the horse sacrifice of the Kuru emperor, to gratify the Dharmaraja. They bring with them treasures of precious jewels, many female slaves and the finest horses and weapons. The convivial hubbub that arises from those great lords congregated for the occasion is like the roaring ocean and resounds in Swarga itself. Raja Yudhishtira, Kurunandana, assigns to his royal guests diverse kinds of food and drink and beds of celestial beauty and comfort. The horses and animals of the Kuru king's guests are provided with the most excellent corn, milk and sugarcane.

To that great sacrifice of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja there also come a large number of Munis, all of them Brahmavadis. Indeed, O Bhumipala, all the greatest Brahmanas of the world who are then alive come to that yagna with their disciples. The Kuru king of blazing tejas, setting aside all royal pride, himself receives them all and sees every one of those sages to their dwellings. Having completed all the arrangements for the sacrifice, those artisans and engineers in charge of the yagnashala come and inform Yudhishtira that all is ready for the Aswamedha to commence. The king and his brothers are delighted.

When the great horse sacrifice of Yudhishtira gets under way, many eloquent dialecticians begin learned debates and disputations on diverse subjects of dharma and artha, each one eager to prove his pre-eminence. The invited kings look at the preparations for the Aswamedha yagna of the Kuru king, overseen by his brother Bhimasena, and perceive that these can compare in excellence with a sacrifice of Indra himself. They admire the triumphal arches made of gold, and all the myriad mansions furnished with splendid bedsteads, finely wrought chairs and thrones, everything of luxury and enjoyment that noble Kshatriyas might desire.

They observe the magnificent athletes and wrestlers who have come to show their prowess and skills in Hastinapura, and the crowds gathered to watch them. The kings look at wondrous cauldrons and cooking vessels, exquisite serving salvers and plates, jugs and covers, all made of gold. They behold the lofty sacrificial stakes, the yupa-stambhas adorning the yagnasala, each one wrought of wood embellished with gold by master sculptors and artisans, each one planted and dedicated according to the scriptures. The kings see every kind of animal to be found on land or water, flora and fauna from every land and clime magnificent predators and beautiful kine and buffaloes, as well as all manner of aquatic creatures. The trees are full of birds that the eyes of men seldom behold. Beholding that astounding yagnashala adorned with animals, cattle and corn, the Kshatriya kings are all wonderstruck.

The Brahmanas and the Vaisyas notice and taste with relish delicious and fragrant sweets prepared and laid out in extravagant heaps everywhere. Whenever a hundred thousand Brahmanas have been fed, drums and cymbals are beaten. So many are fed that the sounding of those festive instruments never ceases from day to day.

Thus begins the Aswamedha yagna of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja of great majesty in the city of the elephant. Hillocks of food, O King, are dedicated on the grand occasion, tanks full of fine curd, and pools of ghee. Yudhishtira's Aswamedha yagna is attended by all the people of Jambudwipa, gathered from all its realms and provinces. Thousands of nations and races are present, having come from across the length and breadth of the land. An army of servitors of the Bhaarata vamsa, all festively clothed, wearing bright garlands and sparkling earrings, carrying golden vessels in their hands, serve diverse food and drink to the lakhs of Brahmanas who have some to the sacrifice, lavish fare fit for kings."

Vaisampayana said, “Looking at the kings of the world who have come to his sacrifice, all of them knowers of the Vedas, Yudhishtira says to his brother Bhima, ‘Lord of men, let every honour be accorded to these Kshatriyas who have come to my yagna, for these foremost of men deserve every honour.’

Bhimasena goes forth with the twins and does his brother’s bidding. Then the Purushottama Krishna arrives, accompanied by the Vrishnis with Baladeva at their head. With him come Satyaki, Pradyumna, Gada, Nisatha, Samba and Kritavarman. Maharatha Bhima offers them the most reverential worship. Those princes then enter their assigned palaces adorned with priceless gemstones.

Krishna tells Yudhishtira about Arjuna, who has been emaciated by the many battles he had fought to enable this Aswamedha yagna. Yudhishtira asks Parantapa Krishna again and again about Jishnu, and Krishna, Lord of the universe, says to the Dharmaputra, ‘Rajan, a trusted man of mine who lives in Dwaraka came to me after seeing Arjuna. It was he who told me that Arjuna seemed tired and worn out by all the battles he had fought across the land. He says Mahabaho Arjuna is very near us. The time has come for you to perform the horse sacrifice.’

King Yudhishtira the Just says, ‘Madhava, it is our great good fortune that Arjuna has returned safely to us. Tell me if that mightiest of Pandavas has sent any message for us, O Yadavanandana.’

The Lord of the Vrishnis and Andhakas, most eloquent of all men, replies, ‘The message my man reported from Arjuna is this: “O Krishna, when the time comes, tell my brother Yudhishtira that Arjuna said to him, ‘Lord of the Kurus, many kings will come and you must accord them the greatest honour worthy of us. O giver of honours, make certain that no drop of blood is spilt during this sacrifice, and there is no carnage as occurred at the Rajasuya arghya.’ Let Krishna also approve of this plea of mine, and ensure that no hostility is ignited by any old resentment or enmity.”

My man further reported these words of Dhananjaya: “Rajan, my dear son Babhruvahana, the King of Manipura, will come to the sacrifice. He is deeply devoted to me. I ask you to honour him duly, for my sake.”’

Yudhishtira listens to Krishna’s words with whole-hearted approbation.”

"Yudhishtira says, 'O Krishna, I have heard your agreeable words and indeed you are the perfect one to bring this message to me. My heart is full, mighty one, and my brother's words Amrita to me. Hrishikesa, I have heard that our Vijaya has fought innumerable battles with the kings of the Earth to enable us to perform this great sacrifice. Ah, why is my brother destined to be always far from ease and comfort? He is so wise, and it grieves me sorely that he is constantly away from us and at strife.

Whenever I have time to myself, away from the affairs of the kingdom, I think of my Jishnu, and how miserable is his lot. His body bears every auspicious mark. Krishna, does he bear on his magnificent form some adverse mark that constantly sets him apart from the rest of us and fetches him this misery and discomfort? It seems that Arjuna always has to endure an inordinate share of grief and suffering. I see no inauspicious mark on his person that would indicate such a fate. You are the only one who can explain this to me, if you believe I deserve to hear why my brother has such a fate.'

Krishna, joy of the Bhojas, falls into thought awhile, then says to Yudhishtira, 'I, too, do not see any adverse or censurable feature in this prince, yet the cheek-bones of this lion among men are set a little too high. This is the only reason why that Purushottama is forever an itinerant, ranging across the world. There is no other sign upon his person that can explain why he must constantly endure the fate of being afflicted by grief.' Yudhishtira agrees with Krishna. Draupadi darts a furious look at Hrishikesh but he smiles at this expression of the Princess of Panchala's love for his friend.

Hearing of Arjuna's triumphs while following the Aswamedha horse, Bhimasena, the other Kurus and the sacrificial priests are elated. Even as they are talking about him, a messenger arrives from Arjuna. The distinguished man bows in reverence before the Kuru king and announces the imminent arrival of Phalguna. Tears of joy fill Yudhishtira's eyes and he gives bounteous gifts to the bearer of these glad tidings.

Two days later, a general hubbub and loud shouts from the people announce that Arjuna has reached Hastinapura. The dust raised by the hooves of the sacrificial horse as it walks beside Arjuna is as beautiful to all present as that thrown up by the celestial steed, Uchchaisravas. As Arjuna progresses along the king's highway, he hears a celebratory chorus go up around him: 'By great good fortune, O Partha, you have returned safely through all danger. Praise be to you and King Yudhishtira!' 'Who but Arjuna could return alive after following the sacrificial horse across the Earth and vanquishing all her kings in battle!' 'Not even Sagara and other great kings of antiquity have achieved such an exploit. Nor will any king of the future accomplish as rare and difficult a feat as yours, O best of all the Kurus!'

With such greetings of welcome sounding all around, Arjuna Mahatman enters the sacrificial compound, the yagnashala. Led by Dhritarashtra, Yudhishtira, with all his ministers and Krishna, the delighter of the Yadus, comes out to receive Dhananjaya. Arjuna pays homage at the feet of Dhritarashtra, touches Yudhishtira's feet, worships Bhimasena and the other Kurus who are his elders and then comes to Krishna and embraces him. Worshipped by them all, and worshipping them in return in the ordained manner, the Mahabaho, surrounded by those princes, finally comes into his apartments and lies down to rest. Truly, he is as tired and worn as a shipwrecked sailor who has endured many days out on the open sea and at last come safely ashore.

Meanwhile, King Babhruvahana of great wisdom reaches the Kuru capital, accompanied by his mothers, Chitrangada and Ulupi. The mighty-armed Kshatriya pays homage to all his elders of the Kuru vamsa, as well as to the other kings present there, and is honoured by them all in return. He then goes to his grandmother Kunti in the royal palace."

Vaisampayana said, "Entering the palace of the Pandavas, Babhruvahana salutes Kunti and speaks to her tenderly. Queen Chitrangada and Ulupi, daughter of the Naga king Kauravya, together approach Arjuna and Krishna with appropriate formalities. Kunti gifts the queens many rare gemstones and precious artifacts. Draupadi and Subhadra and the other Kuru ladies all give them priceless gifts to gladden their hearts. Treated with great kindness and cared for personally by Kunti herself, anxious to please her son Arjuna, Chitrangada and Ulupi remain in that palace of every comfort and luxury.

Kunti extends the same honours to her grandson, Babhruvahana of great tejas, and he is taken to meet Dhritarashtra, whom he reverences with due rites. Going then to King Yudhishtira and Bhima and the other Pandavas, the mighty prince of Manipura salutes them humbly, and they in turn embrace him lovingly and accord him every distinction. The Maharathas, deeply gratified by him, shower priceless gifts and much wealth on him. The King of Manipura respectfully approaches Krishna, the heroic bearer of the Chakra and the Gada, even like a second Pradyumna approaching his sire. Krishna gives Babhru a splendid chariot adorned with gold and yoked to steeds of surpassing excellence. Yudhishtira, Bhima, Arjuna and the twins, all separately honour him and bestow lavish largesse upon him.

On the third day, the Rishi Vyasa, son of Satyavati, foremost of eloquent men, comes to Yudhishtira and says, 'From this day, O son of Kunti, commence your yagna. The muhurta is at hand and the Ritvijas summon you to the sacrifice. Let it be performed in such a way that no limb or part of it is defective. Because of the vast quantity of gold that this sacrifice demands, it has come to be called the yagna of profuse gold. Do you also, O great King, make the dakshina of this yagna three times what is enjoined, and so let the merit of your sacrifice increase threefold. The Brahmanas who will conduct your yagna are adept for this purpose. With lavish gifts you will gain the punya of three Aswamedha yagnas and be freed, Rajan, from the sin of having slain your kinsmen. The ablutionary bath taken upon the yagna's completion will wash every vestige of sin from you and bless you with the highest punya, O King of Kuru's race.'

Yudhishtira Dharmaraja takes the diksha for performing the Aswamedha yagna and then the mighty-armed king performs the great horse sacrifice characterized by the distribution of food and gifts in unprecedented profusion, for this is the sacrifice that can fructify every wish and bestow all merit. The priests, all deeply knowing of the Vedas and masters of the Vedic rites, perform every ritual immaculately. Not in the slightest degree does any ritual deviate from the ordinances of the Shastras, and those Dvijottamas follow to the letter the procedure laid down therein. In performing rites for which no laws are prescribed, they use their enlightened instinct. Those foremost Brahmanas first perform the rite called Pravargya, also known as Dharma, then the ritual known as Abhishava. The foremost of Soma drinkers extract the juice of the Soma, O King, then perform the Savana rite in strict adherence to the injunctions of the scriptures.

Among those that come to that sacrifice none is seen who is downcast or plunged in grief of any kind, none who is poor, none who is hungry, and none that appears coarse or uncouth. At the command of his elder brother, Bhimasena of mighty energy has food ceaselessly distributed among those that wish to eat. Following the injunctions of the Shastras, every day the profound priests, well versed in sacrificial rites of every kind, perform all the kriyas to complete the great sacrifice. Amongst the Sadasyas, the Brahmana guests of percipient King Yudhishtira, all are deeply conversant with the six angas of Vedic learning; there is not one among them who is not an observer of vratas, none that is not an Upadhyaya, none that is not adept at dialectical disputation.

When the time comes to erect the yupastamba, the sacrificial stake, O Lord of the Bharatas, six stakes are raised made of bilwa, six of khadira, and six of saravarnin. The priests raise two stakes of devadaru during the Aswamedha yagna of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, and one wrought of sleshmataka wood. At the behest of the king, Bhima has some other fine golden stakes raised as well, made purely for their beauty. Wrapped in fine cloths provided by the Kuru Rajarishi, the stambhas in their splendour are like Indra and the Devas with the seven celestial Rishis standing around them in Swarga. A number of golden bricks have been made to construct a chayana, a pavilion measuring eight and ten cubits in width and length, and four storeys high, as magnificent as the one created for Daksha Prajapati during his fabled yagna.

A golden bird shaped like a prodigious Garuda is also wrought with three angles. Following scriptural injunction, the priests tie the beasts and birds to stakes, assigning each one to its particular deity. Bulls, carefully chosen according to shastraic injunctions and aquatic animals are tethered to their appropriate stambhas, following the rituals for the sacred Agni.

At the sacrifice of the Mahatman son of Kunti, three hundred animals are tied to sacrificial stakes, including that foremost of steeds, the sacrificial horse. Sublime is that Aswamedha yagna of Yudhishtira, graced by the celestial Rishis, with Gandharvas singing in chorus and diverse tribes of Apsaras dancing in celebration, thronged with Kimpurushas and Kinnaras.

All around the yagnashala are the abodes of Brahmanas of high ascetic mastery. Daily one sees the disciples of Vyasa, those foremost of Dvijas, compilers of all branches of learning and adepts in sacrificial rites. Narada is there, and Tumburu of great splendour; Viswavasu and Chitrasena with others, all of them inspired musicians. During breaks in the performance of rituals, those proficient Gandharvas gladden with song and dance the Brahmanas engaged in the sacrifice."

Vaisampayana said, “The priests first sacrifice and cook the flesh of all the other yagnapasus, according to the due rites, after which comes the sacrifice of the great horse which has wandered the length and breadth of Bharatavarsha. They carve it into sections and, in accordance with the scriptures, Draupadi of great beauty and intelligence, who owns the three requisites of mantras, wealth and devotion, is brought to sit next to the divided animal.

With serene minds, the Brahmanas then cook the marrow of the yagnapasu and Yudhishtira Dharmaraja and his brothers deeply inhale the smoke rising from the cooking marrow, fumes which cleanse them of every sin. The remaining limbs of the horse are offered to the fire by the sixteen learned priests. Having thus completed the sacrifice of the monarch, who is endowed with the tejas of Sakra himself, the illustrious Vyasa and his disciples extravagantly eulogize the king.

Then Yudhishtira gives away a thousand crores of golden nishkas to those Brahmanas, and to Vyasa he ceremonially gives the whole Earth. Ritually accepting the world from the sovereign, Satyavati’s son Vyasa says to the Dharmaraja, ‘Best of kings, I return to you the Earth which you have given me. Do you now give me its purchasing value, for Brahmanas have no use for anything other than wealth.’

Yudhishtira Mahatman, Mahabuddhi, along with his brothers, remains in the midst of all the kings who have come to his Aswamedha yagna and he says to the Brahmanas, ‘The dakshina ordained in the scriptures for the great horse sacrifice is the Earth. I have given away to the sacrificial priests the Earth conquered by Arjuna. I will enter the forest and take sannyasa there, best of all Brahmanas. Divide the Earth among yourselves; divide it into four parts as is done in the Chaturhotra yagna.

Dvijottamas, I have no wish to appropriate what now belongs to you. Even this, most learned ones, has been the intention that my brothers and I always cherished.' Yudhishtira's brothers and Draupadi affirm the king's pronouncement, saying, 'Yes, it is even so.' Great is the sensation created by this announcement, O Bhaarata. A disembodied voice, an Asariri, is heard from the sky, saying, 'Excellent! Excellent!' The throng of Brahmanas laud Yudhishtira all together, and the Island-born sage praises him, saying, 'You have given this Bhumi to me. However, I give her back to you forthwith. I ask you to give these Brahmanas gold, and let the Earth remain yours.' Krishna says to the Dharmaraja, 'You must do as the illustrious Vyasa says.'

Yudhishtira is gratified and gladly gives away millions of gold nishkas to Vyasa, three times the amount ordained as dakshina for an Aswamedha yagna. No king will ever accomplish what the Kuru king did during his horse sacrifice, as magnificent as that of Marutta of old. Accepting the wealth, the Island-born sage, of untold wisdom, divides it into four parts and gives it to the sacrificial priests. Thus having paid the gold as the price of the Earth, Yudhishtira, cleansed of his sins and assured of Swarga, rejoices with his brothers.

The sacrificial priests delightedly distribute the great wealth among the Brahmanas present, to satisfy each one's desires. With Yudhishtira's leave, the Brahmanas also divide amongst themselves the diverse ornaments of gold in the yagnashala, including the triumphal arches, the stakes, the jars, and the myriad urns and vessels. After the Brahmanas have taken as much as they want, the gold and treasures that remain are taken by the Kshatriyas, followed by the Vaisyas, the Sudras and the many tribes of Mlechchas.

Gratified by Yudhishtira Dharmaraja beyond their wildest expectations, the joyful Brahmanas make their way home to their various asramas across the holy land. Krishna Dwaipayana Vyasa gives his own substantial share of the dakshina to Kunti, with all reverence. Receiving the gift of affection from her father-in-law, Pritha is glad of heart and uses the wealth to accomplish varied deeds of punya.

Yudhishtira takes the avabhrita snana, the ritual ablution at the conclusion of his sacrifice, and is purified of all his sins. Honoured by all, he shines forth in the midst of his brothers like the king of the Devas amid the denizens of Swarga. The Dharmaraja and his brothers, surrounded by all the assembled kings, are as radiant as planets in a sky full of stars.

They present the kings with rare jewels and gemstones, elephants and horses, female slaves, rich cloths and large measures of gold ornaments and coins. In giving all that untold wealth away, Pritha's son is truly like Kubera, Lord of Treasures. Yudhishtira now calls the heroic Babhruvahana, bestows on him every kind of wealth in profusion, and gives him leave to return to Manipura. To gratify his cousin Dussala, Yudhishtira establishes her infant grandson as the ruler of his paternal kingdom. After having duly honoured all the visiting kings in accord with their respective stature, the Kuru sovereign, always in mastery of his mind, graciously dismisses the assembled kings, who return to their kingdoms. The illustrious son of Pandu, that Parantapa, then duly worships Krishna, mighty Baladeva and the thousands of other Vrishni heroes, Pradyumna the first among them. With his brothers, he grants them leave to return to Dwaraka.

Thus did Dharmaraja Yudhishtira of the House of Kuru perform the awesome Aswamedha yagna in Hastinapura, a sacrifice distinguished by a superabundance of food and gold, jewels, ornaments and riches of every kind, oceans of varied vintages, lakes of ghrita, veritable hills of food and rivers of drinks satisfying the six different kinds of taste. Of men employed in the making and the eating of the marvellous sweetmeats called Khandavaragas, and of animals slain for food, there was no end.

The vast yagnashala thronged with men inebriated with wine, and with girls filled with joy. The sprawling grounds constantly echoed with the sounds of drums and the blare of conches. With all these, the sacrifice was delightful past describing. 'Let the finest gifts be given away,' 'Let the best food be eaten,' were the words repeatedly heard day and night during that sacrifice. People of diverse realms speak of that yagna to this day as an unparalleled festival of rejoicing and fulfilment.

That greatest king of the Bharata vamsa, his purpose fulfilled, exorcised of all his sins, having showered wealth in torrents on his guests—jewels and gems, and drinks of every kind, and diverse luxuries to satisfy every desire—once more enters his capital and his palace."

Janamejaya asked, “Was there any other remarkable event which occurred during my grandsires’ Aswamedha yagna?”

Vaisampayana said, “Listen, O mightiest of kings, to the most marvellous thing that happened at the conclusion of that great horse sacrifice. After all the greatest of Brahmanas, all Yudhishtira’s kinsmen and friends, all the poor, the blind and the helpless have been well gratified, when the gifts given in such unprecedented profusion are being spoken of on all sides, indeed, when flowers rain down out of the sky on the head of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, a large blue-eyed mongoose appears, O sinless one, with one half of his body and pelt of gold. That denizen of a burrow in the ground speaks in a human voice, but one as deep as thunder, loud enough to terrify all the animals and birds there. ‘O you kings,’ he roars, ‘This great sacrifice is not equal to a prastha of powdered barley once given away by a liberal Brahmana of Kurukshetra observing the Unccha vrata.’

All the Brahmanottamas there are wonderstruck at these words, O King. Approaching the mongoose, they ask, ‘From where have you come to this sacrifice, this resort of the good and the pious? What is the extent of your power? What is your learning, and what is your asrama? How should we know who it is that censures our sacrifice? Everything that should be done has been executed faithfully here, even as the Shastras ordain, neglecting no part. Those deserving of worship have been duly worshipped, as prescribed. Libations have been poured on the sacred fire, to the precise chant of the appropriate mantras. That which should be given as dakshina and daana has been given without pride. Brahmanas have been gratified with a surfeit of diverse gifts. Kshatriyas have been gratified with battles fought according to dharma. Grandsires have been propitiated with sraddhas. Vaisyas have been thankful for the protection offered to them, and the foremost of women have been gratified, their desires fulfilled. The Sudras have been well satisfied with kind words and deeds, and others with what remained of the profuse wealth from the trove of Marutta. Kinsmen near and far have been exalted by the purity of conduct displayed by our king Yudhishtira. The Devas have been adored by libations of ghrita and deeds of punya, dependants and followers have been honoured by being granted protection.

Therefore, explain to these great Brahmanas the truth of your declaration. Answer us, by the dharma of the Shastras and by the truth of actual experience, for we are all eager to know. You bear a supernal form, your words seem to demand credit and you are obviously possessed of wisdom. You have come into the midst of learned Brahmanas; it is incumbent upon you to explain yourself.'

The mongoose answered them, smiling, 'Dvijas, I have spoken no lie, neither have I spoken from pride. You have all heard what I said—that this Aswamedha yagna, and all its dakshina, is not equal in punya to the gift of a prastha of powdered barley. Give me your attention and I will unfold to you the strange and marvellous occurrence to which I was witness, and its aftermath that I experienced. My story is about a liberal Brahmana dwelling in Kurukshetra in the observance of the Unccha vrata, whose deed raised him to Swarga, along with his wife, his son and daughter-in-law. It is in consequence of that deed that half my body and pelt were transformed into gold.' The mongoose continues, 'Yes, O Dvijas, I will tell you of the great punya which accrued to that Brahmana who offered a gift of a meagre measure of powdered barley scraped together in observance of his dharma. Listen.

On that most hallowed and auspicious ground known as Kurukshetra, where so many of the righteous dwell, there lived a Brahmana who kept the vow known as the Unccha vrata, a mode of living like that of the pigeon—subsisting on leftover grains from harvested fields. He lived there with his wife, his son and daughter-in-law and performed tapasya. Of righteous soul, and with his senses under complete control, he lived thus, following stern vows: to eat every day only at the sixth yaama. If there was nothing to eat at the sixth division of the day, the Brahmana would keep his fast until the next day, but again break it only at the sixth division.

Once a terrible famine fell upon the land. The Brahmana had no store of food in his humble home. All the herbs and plants of the earth dried up and died, and nothing remained which could serve as sustenance. When the hour came for him to eat, the Brahmana had nothing for food. Day after day, the good Brahmana and his family, worn out with hunger and toil, subsisted on whatever poor pickings they could glean from the arid land.

In the month of Jaishtha, when the sun was at its zenith, beating down fiercely, the Brahmana went forth daily seeking sparse grains of dry barley scattered on the cracked ground. He could find not even enough of the dried grains to unite body and soul but, racked as he was by both heat and hunger, he remained firm in his vrata. Day after day, the Brahmana and his family toiled and starved, suffering from the searing heat of day and savage pangs of craving for food. Great indeed was their torment.

One day, when the sixth yaama came, the Brahmana on his daily forage succeeded in finding a prastha, some handfuls, of barley. The ravaged family powered the barley to make saktu, a simple gruel. They performed their daily rituals, finished their silent chanting of mantras and poured libations on the sacred fire, then divided that small quantity of powdered barley amongst themselves so that the share of each was the measure of a kudava, about two dozen fistfuls.

They had just sat down to eat when a guest appeared at their door. Being all of pure mind, self-restraint, deep faith and control over their passions, they greeted him warmly and made the customary enquiries after his well-being. Those ascetics had quelled anger and knew no malice; with hearts free from pride, envy and wrath, they rejoiced in the happiness of others. Each of them knew and lived every nuance of dharma.

Telling their guest of their own penances and of the vamsa to which they belonged, and ascertaining from him in return his own particulars, they welcomed the hungry visitor into their hut. They said to him, “This is the arghya for you. This water is padya to wash your feet. These kusa grasses are for you to sit on, sinless one. Here is some clean saktu we have prepared and made in dharma, O mighty one. Do you accept it from us and satisfy your hunger.” The Brahmana visitor accepted the kudava of powdered barley offered him and ate it all. But his hunger was not appeased by what he ate, O King. The host saw that his guest was still hungry, and began to think of what other food he could offer him.

Then his virtuous wife said, "Let my share be given to him. Let this best of Dvijas eat his fill, and only then go wherever he wants." Knowing that his old wife was herself tortured by hunger and trembling from weakness, seeing her emaciated and toil-worn, dejected and helpless, that best of Brahmanas said to her, "Do not say so. Even animals—why, even worms and insects, feed and protect their mates, O beautiful one. The wife treats her husband with kindness and feeds and protects him. Everything that has to do with dharma, artha and kama, with progeny and the perpetuation of lineage, all depend on the wife. The very punya of a man, even of his departed ancestors, depends on her. The wife knows her lord by his deeds; the man who fails to protect his wife earns great infamy in this world and finds Naraka in the next. Such a man falls from even a position of great fame and can never succeed in attaining realms of felicity in the hereafter."

His wife replied, "O Dvija, my husband, our dharma and artha are united. Do you take a fourth of this barley and, indeed, be gratified with me. For women satya, kama, punya and Swarga and every other object of their desires depend entirely on their husbands. In the creation of children the mother contributes her blood, and the father gives his seed. The wife's highest god is her husband, and through his grace she receives both pleasure and offspring as her reward. You are my Pati for the protection that you give me, my Bhartri for the means of sustenance you provide, and my boon-giver for having given me a son. So, in return for everything you have done for me, take my share of this saktu for the guest. You are old, emaciated and weak, afflicted by hunger and worn out with keeping fasts."

Deeply moved, the good Brahmana took his wife's share of the powdered barley and said to his guest, "Dvija, best of men, accept this measure of saktu as well." The visitor accepted the saktu and immediately ate it, but his hunger was still not satisfied. The Brahmana of the Unccha vrata became thoughtful and fell silent. Then his son said to him, "O best of men, take my share and give it to the guest as well. I consider what I am doing a deed of great punya so, father, do it for me. It is my highest dharma to look after you. Caring for a father is an obligation the good always desire. The eternal Sruti current in the three worlds ordain looking after a father in his old age as a son's duty, O most learned Rishi. You eat barely enough to keep your spirit in your body, yet engage yourself in the most rigorous tapasya. Prana is the great deity that keeps alive all embodied creatures."

At this, the father said, "Even if you get to be a thousand years old, I will still see you as a child. Having begotten a son, the father achieves success through him. O mighty one, I know that the hunger of the young is strong indeed. I can somehow hold my life-breath in my body. But you, my son, you must find strength by eating your share of the food. Old and decrepit as I am, O son, I am scarcely afflicted by hunger. Besides, I have practised tapasya for many years, and I have no fear of death."

The son said, "I am your son. The Sruti declares that one's son is called Putra because he rescues his father. Again, it is a man's own self that is born as his son. Therefore, do what you need to do through your own self—through me, your son." The father said, "Your form is like mine, and you are like me in conduct and in self-restraint as well. I have tested you on many occasions and I am convinced of your worth. Therefore, I will accept your share of the saktu for our guest, my son."

That best of Brahmanas then gladly took his son's share of the saktu and, smiling, gave it to his guest. The visitor ate that share of powdered barley as well, and he was still not satisfied. His righteous host now began to grow ashamed, when his daughter-in-law, bearing her share of the barley, came to him and said, "Through your son I will receive a son. Take this barley of mine, also, and give it to our guest. Through your grace I will inherit many realms of bliss for eternity. Through a grandson one obtains heavens where there is no sorrow or pain of any kind. Like the triad of dharma, artha and kama, or the threefold sacred fires, there are also three eternal Swargas which a man attains through his son, his grandson and his grandson's son. The son is called Putra because he frees his father from debt. Through sons and grandsons one always enjoys the felicity and bliss of those celestial kingdoms reserved for the pious and the good."

The father-in-law said, "O you of unblemished vratas and character, I see you worn by the wind and the sun, your very complexion faded, emaciated and faint from hunger. How can I be such a sinner against dharma to take your share of the saktu? Do not ask me to do this, for it grieves me already to see you starving at this sixth yaama of the day. You are blessed with purity and immaculate character and conduct; you have kept many vratas for us all and performed tapasya. Alas, that you have to now pass your days in such misery! Blessed girl, for the sake of those auspicious results for which every family hopes, it is not fitting that you make this offer. You are a mere child, and a woman besides. It is my dharma to always protect you. Alas that I have instead to watch you daily tormented by hunger and fasting, O you delighter of all your kinfolk!"

His daughter-in-law said, "You are the lord of my lord; you are the god of my god. So, father, mighty one, take my share of the saktu. My body, my life-breaths, and my vratas all have just one purpose: to serve my elders and my god. Through your grace, most learned and wise Brahmana, I will find many realms of joy hereafter. Truly, I deserve to be treasured by you, for know, O Dvija, that I am entirely devoted to you. If you care for my happiness, take my share of the saktu from me and give it to our guest."

The father-in-law said, "O chaste one, you will shine forth in glory for your vratas and steadfastness in observing your duties and serving your elders. I will take your share of the saktu, for your virtues deserve no less, certainly not to be misled by me. You, blessed girl, are foremost among all who observe dharma." Saying this, the Brahmana took her share of the barley and gave it to his guest. At this the guest, who was none other than Dharma Deva in a human form, was deeply gratified with the great-souled Brahmana endowed with such perfect piety and said to him, "O Dvijottama, I am greatly pleased by this pure gift of yours, acquired through dharma, which you have freely parted with in accord with dharma. All heaven resounds with praises of what you have done today. Look how these celestial flowers rain down on you from the sky. The Devarishis, the Devas, the Gandharvas, all those who walk before the gods, and the Devadutas as well, are all in amaze at what you have done, and speak of nothing else.

Even the illumined Rishis who dwell in Brahmaloka have come in their vimanas to see you. O foremost of Mahatmans, you have saved the souls of the Pitrs who live in the realm of the manes; why, you have even redeemed others who have not attained to the status of Pitrs and have set them free for countless yugas. For your brahmacharya, your daana, your yagnas, your tapasya, for the deeds of punya you have done so constantly and with such a pure heart, I say to you, go straight to Swarga today.

O Brahmana of stern vratas, you have performed the most austere tapasya with great bhakti, and the Devas are entirely pleased with you. Today by giving me this saktu ungrudgingly, in a season of extreme hardship, you have not only attained but conquered the realm of the gods.

Hunger destroys a man's understanding and deprives him of fortitude, while he who conquers hunger, surely conquers heaven. As long as a man remains inclined to help others, his dharma remains indestructible. Today you held dharma above your love for your children and your wife, ignoring the pangs of hunger, the very cries of nature. The acquisition of wealth is a deed of but slight punya; gifting it to a deserving person carries far greater merit. Of still greater punya is the time at which the act of charity is done, and the greatest value lies in devotion. The door to Swarga is subtle and hard to see, and men fail to find it through their heedlessness. The bar of heaven's door is made of cupidity and kept fastened by desire and attachment. Verily, it is unapproachable. Only those who subdue wrath and conquer their passions, who are endowed with great tapasya, and who make gifts according to the measure of their ability, succeed in finding it.

It has been said that he who gives away a hundred while having a thousand, he that gives away ten while having a hundred, and he who offers a palmful of water, having no wealth, all are equal in respect of the punya they earn. When divested of all his wealth, King Rantideva gave a small quantity of water with a pure heart. Through this gift, O wise Brahmana, he attained Swargaloka. Dharma Deva is never as gratified with large and costly gifts as with modest things, even of no value, if they have been acquired lawfully and given with devotion and faith. King Nriga made gifts of thousands of kine to Brahmanas but, by giving away just one cow that did not belong to him, he fell into Naraka. Usinara's son, Sibi of excellent vows, gave away his own flesh, and he is blissful in Swarga, for he has attained the realms of the righteous.

Mere wealth is not punya. Good men acquire punya by exerting themselves to the best of their powers by virtuous means. One does not acquire the highest punya through diverse and extravagant sacrifices but through giving even a little wealth that has been earned in dharma. By wrath, the fruits of giving daana are destroyed; through greed one fails to attain Swarga; whereas the man who knows the great punya of giving charity, of leading a righteous life, and of tapasya—he finds heaven for himself. O Brahmana, the virtue of this prastha of saktu that you have given me today far outweighs that acquired through several Rajasuya sacrifices with profuse gifts, or through many Aswamedha yagnas. With this prastha of powdered barley you have conquered eternal Brahmaloka for yourself. Go now in joy to that realm of Brahma unstained by any darkness.

O best of Brahmanas, a celestial chariot is here to take all four of you to Brahmaloka. Enter it as you please, O Brahmana. Behold me, Dharma Deva, the Lord of Truth! You have saved your body through your immaculate dharma, and the fame of this your achievement will resound in the world forever. Go now, Mahatman, with your wife, your son, and your daughter-in-law, to Swarga of everlasting bliss."

When Dharma had spoken, that righteous Brahmana with his wife, son and daughter-in-law ascended the chariot and flew away to Brahmaloka. I emerged from my hole, With the scent of the saktu, and the few remaining grains of powdered barley, the moisture of the water, the touch of the supernal flowers that had rained down, and the tapasya of the Brahmana, my head turned golden; behold, half of this ample body turned golden through his firmness in truth and his penances,

From that day, long ago, seeking to gild the rest of my body, I have gone expectantly to asramas of the holiest Munis and every yagna performed by the mightiest kings of the world. Hearing of this Aswamedha yagna of the Kuru king of great wisdom, I came here with high expectations —but as you all see, the rest of my body has not turned golden.

That is why, O Brahmanottamas, I said that this mighty sacrifice can in no way compare with that humble gift of a prastha of powdered barley. Just a few grains of that saktu turned my head golden. I have concluded that not all the lavish gifts and charity of this great Aswamedha yagna are equal to those particles.' With these words, the mongoose vanished.

This was the marvellous happening at the end of that great Aswamedha yagna of Yudhishtira, O conqueror of hostile cities. So do not, O King, think too highly of conducting sacrificial rites. Millions of Rishis have ascended to Swargaloka by dint of their tapasya alone. Abstaining from causing injury to living creatures, contentment, righteous conduct, sincerity, penance, self-restraint, truthfulness and charity: each of these is equal in punya to any yagna."

Janamejaya says, "Mahamuni, kings are attached to performing sacrifices; the great Rishis are attached to penance; learned Brahmanas esteem self-restraint, tranquillity of mind and peaceful conduct. But I think nothing in this world can compare with the fruits of sacrifices. From what I have seen myself and heard told, I am convinced that the performance of great yagnas is unequalled in bestowing rewards.

Many mighty kings, have earned lofty fame in this world and found Swarga in the hereafter by worshipping the gods with sacrifices. Indra of a thousand eyes, endowed with incomparable tejas, gained sovereignty over the Devas through the many sacrifices he performed, during which he gave abundant gifts in charity. When Yudhishtira, with Bhima and Arjuna beside him, was like the king of the Devas himself in prosperity and prowess, why did that mongoose demean the Kuru Dharmaraja's mighty yagna?"

Vaisampayana says, "Listen to me, O King, and I will tell you about the admirable laws governing the performance of sacrifices, as well as of the fruits that yagnas bestow, O Bhaarata.

Once Indra undertook a great sacrifice. Having laid out the limbs of the yagna, the Ritwijas were absorbed in accomplishing the diverse rites ordained in the scriptures. The pourer of libations, possessed of every necessary attribute for the task, was engaged in his task of feeding the sacred fire with ghrita, the great Rishis sitting around him. The serene Brahmanas of great learning and lustre invoked and summoned the Devas, one by one, chanting the apposite mantras for each in dulcet voices. The foremost of Adhvaryus tirelessly recited the mantras of the Yajur Veda in mellifluous accents.

The time came for slaughtering the sacrificial animals. When the chosen yagnapasus were seized, the great Rishis, seeing that the beasts had all become fearful, were moved to pity. Those Rishis, endowed with tapodhana, approached Indra and said to him, 'This method of sacrifice is inauspicious. You wish to amass punya through this yagna, but your intention of sending these animals to their death shows how little you know about the true nature of sacrifice.

O Purandara, beasts are not created to be slaughtered at sacrifices, and these preparations of yours are destructive of punya. This yagna is not consonant with dharma, for the killing of living creatures can never be considered righteous. If you will, let your priests perform your sacrifice according to the Agama, without taking any life. Deva of a hundred eyes, perform your yagna with seeds of grain that have been kept for three years. That sacrifice, O Indra, will be fraught with great righteousness and yield fruit of the highest punya and efficacy.'

However, O Bhaarata, the Deva of a hundred sacrifices, swayed by pride and gripped by tamas, did not accept what the Rishis said. A great dispute then arose between the ascetics at that sacrifice of Sakra about how sacrifices should be performed—with or without animal sacrifices. They argued both sides until the sages were exhausted.

Finally the Rishis, those seers of truth, arrived at an understanding with Sakra that they would refer the matter to an arbiter. They asked King Vasu, 'Most blessed one, what is the Vedic pronouncement about sacrifices? Is it preferable to perform yagnas with animals being slaughtered, or with seeds and juices?' King Vasu replied immediately, without considering the strengths and weaknesses of the arguments on both sides, 'Sacrifices may be performed with whichever of the two is ready and available.' For answering the question without proper deliberation, he was cursed to go down into the realm of Patala. That mighty Chedi king had to endure great misery for having responded faultily. Therefore, when any serious question arises, no man, however wise, should singly arrive at a decision, unless he be the almighty Svayambhuva, Lord of all creatures.

Gifts made by a sinner with an impure mind, even if bounteous, fail and count for nothing. Indeed, the daana given by a person of adharma, a sinful soul and a destroyer, is wasted; he gains neither merit nor fame from it, in this world or the next. One of limited intelligence who, from a desire to acquire punya, performs sacrifices with wealth acquired by unrighteous means, never succeeds in earning the least merit.

The hypocrite who puts on a garb of righteousness and makes lavish gifts to Brahmanas creates an impression of being a man of dharma, but earns no real punya. The unrestrained Brahmana who acquires such wealth through sin, who is overwhelmed by rajas and tamas, ends up in Naraka. Such a one, possessed by greed and darkness, becomes a slave to accumulating riches. He persecutes creatures, impelled by his own impure and sinful mind. Having acquired his fortune by wicked means, he makes gifts or performs sacrifices therewith, but in the next world finds his shallow charity or sacrifices fruitless, because his wealth has been earned through adharma and violence.

However, men blessed with true plenitude of tapasya, who give according to the best of their means, even grains of corn picked from the field, or fruit or pot-herbs or water or leaves, gain great punya and reach Swarga. Even humble gifts such as these, besides compassion for all creatures, brahmacharya, truthfulness of speech, kindness, fortitude and forgiveness, constitute the eternal foundations of Dharma.

We hear of Viswamitra and other Rajarishis of ancient times. Indeed, kings such as Viswamitra, Asita, Janaka, Kakshasena, Arshtisena and Sindhudwipa—these and many other kings, all endowed with the undying wealth of tapasya, gave plentiful gifts, all acquired righteously, and all of them attained to lofty felicity. Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras who yield themselves to penance, and who purify themselves by charity and other deeds of dharma, certainly attain Heaven, O Bhaarata."

Janamejaya said, "If Swarga is the fruit of wealth acquired by lawful means, O illustrious one, expound to me as fully as you should all you know about this. Most regenerate one, you have told me about the high fruit which the Brahmana of the Unccha vrata reached through his gift of powdered barley. I have no doubt that what you have said is true. Yet, I want to understand how that Brahmana's attainment is held up as the highest consummation of all sacrifices. Dvijottama, explain this to me fully."

Vaisampayana said, "Parantapa, an old tale is told in this regard, of what transpired at the great sacrifice of Agastya. In ancient times, O King, the rishi Agastya of great tejas, devoted to the good of all creatures, embarked upon a diksha of twelve years. He engaged many hotris, splendid in form like blazing fires, to perform the sacrifice. Among them were men who subsisted upon roots or fruits; or that used two pieces of stone only for husking their corn; or that supported themselves only with the rays of the moon; men who never took any food unless it was set before them by others; those who never ate anything without having first served the Devas, the Pitris and Sadasyas; and those who never washed the food they ate. There were also Yatis and Bhikshus among them, O King—all men who had obtained a vision of Dharma Deva, the God of Righteousness, in his embodied form. They had subdued wrath and acquired complete mastery over their senses. Living in observance of self-restraint, they were free from pride and any inclination to injure another being.

Those Maharishis attended the sacrifice and accomplished its various rites. The illustrious Agastya acquired through pure and righteous means the food that was required for the yagna, to the best of his means and ability. At that same time, numerous other ascetics also performed large yagnas of their own. But when great Agastya engaged himself in the performance of his twelve-year yagna, thousand-eyed Indra ceased to send down rain upon the earth.

During the intervals in the rituals, O King, the other Rishis spoke among themselves, saying, 'Agastya makes offerings of food with his heart cleansed of the least pride and vanity. However, the Lord of the clouds has stopped sending down rain. How, then, will any food be grown? Agastya's mighty yagna is to continue for twelve years, O Brahmanas, and for that entire period Bhumi will have no rain. Reflect on this and do something to help Agastya of the stern tapasya, this Rishi of great wisdom.'

When he heard the sages, Agastya bent his head and gratified them by saying, 'If Vasava does not send down any rain for twelve years, I will perform the yagna of the mind. Even this is the eternal ordinance. If Indra does not send any rain for twelve years, I will perform the Sparsa yagna, the sacrifice of touch. Even this is the eternal sacrifice. If Sakra does not give us rain for these twelve years, I will put forth all my energy and make arrangements for other sacrifices demanding the observance of the most severe vows.

I have arranged my present yagna of seeds with the labour of many years. With these same seeds will I accomplish great good. Nothing can obstruct my yagna. It matters little whether Indra gives us rain or not. If Indra shows scant regard for me, I will use my powers to transform myself into another Indra and keep all living entities alive. I vow that every creature, whatever food it takes for nourishment, will continue to be nourished as before. I have the power to create a different order of things, again and again. And I say, let gold and whatever other wealth that exists, let all the wealth of the three worlds come here today of its own accord. Let all the tribes of Apsaras, all the Gandharvas, along with the Kinnaras, and Viswavasu, and the other Swargavasis all come today to this sacrifice of mine. Let all the wealth that exists among the Northern Kurus come to these sacrifices. Let Swarga, and all those who have Heaven for their home, let Dharma himself, come here!'

No sooner had mighty Agastya spoken than everything he called for happened, for his tapasya was incomparable and the power of his mind like a fiery furnace of energy. The other Rishis present saw the power of tapasya revealed, and their hearts were filled with rejoicing. Full of wonder, they uttered words of grave import: 'We are profoundly gratified with what you have said, and we do not wish your store of tapasya to suffer any diminution. We approve, indeed, desire, all yagnas performed with dharma.

Earning our food by righteous means, and observant of our svadharma, we undertake diksha, the pouring of libations onto the sacred fire and every other ritual. We observe brahmacharya and worship the Devas. Completing the term of brahmacharya, we emerge from our asramas cleaving to dharma. We approve of the mind and understanding free from the inclination to inflict any injury on any living creature. O puissant Agastya, commend non-violence to be practised during every sacrifice, and we shall be deeply gratified, O best of all Brahmanas. When you have completed your yagna and dismissed us, we shall depart from this place.'

Even as they spoke, Purandara, Lord of the Devas, he of the thousand eyes and tremendous tejas, discerning the power of Agastya's penance, sent down on the parched world copious showers of rain. Indeed, O Janamejaya, till the completion of the sacrifice of that Rishi of immeasurable prowess, the God of rain sent down timely rain enough to satisfy the needs and wishes of all men.

With Brihaspati before him, the King of the Devas attended the sacrifice, O Rajarishi, to gratify Agastya Muni. Filled with joy upon the completion of his yagna, Agastya worshipped the great Rishis who had participated before dismissing them."

Janamejaya asked, "Who was that mongoose with the golden head who spoke those words in a human voice? Tell me, I am eager to know." Vaisampayana said, "You did not ask me before, and I did not tell you. But now listen to who the mongoose with the golden head was, and how he could speak in a human voice.

In olden days, the Rishi Jamadagni decided to perform a sraddha. His homa cow came to him and the Rishi milked her himself. He then placed the milk in a new vessel, strong and pure. Dharma Deva assumed the form of Krodha, Anger, and entered that vessel of milk, for he wanted to test what the best of sages would do if provoked by some injury to himself.

Dharma spoiled that sacrificial milk, but Jamadagni knew that Anger was the spoiler and was not in the least upset or enraged. Then Krodha appeared to the Rishi assuming the form of a Brahmana woman and, finding that he had been conquered by that foremost Muni of Bhrigu's race, said to him, 'O greatest of Bhargavas, I have been vanquished by you. There is a saying among men that the Bhrigus are by nature wrathful. But I now find that saying false, for I have been subdued by you. You are possessed of a mighty soul, and blessed with forgiveness. I stand here today, owning your sway. I fear your tapasya, righteous one. Do you, O mighty Rishi, show me favour.'

Jamadagni said, 'I have seen you, O Krodha, in your embodied form. Go wherever you like, without anxiety. You have not done me any injury today, and I bear you no grudge. This milk that you spoiled I had kept for the blessed Pitris, the manes. Present yourself before them and ascertain what they intend for you.' Stricken by fear at hearing this, Anger disappeared from the sight of the Rishi, but the curse of the Pitris turned him into a mongoose. He then began to gratify the Pitris in order to free himself. The manes said to him, 'Your curse will end by disparaging Dharma to himself!'

Hearing this, he wandered over the earth, going to every holy yagna that was performed, as well as to other sacred tirthas, and censuring all the great sacrifices. It was he that came to the Aswamedha yagna of King Yudhishtira, to demean it. By speaking of the prastha of powdered barley given by the Kurukshetra Brahmana, Krodha was freed of his curse—for Yudhishtira, being Dharma's son, was no less than Dharma's own self.

This is what transpired at the yagna of that Rajarishi. The mongoose, freed from his curse, vanished from our midst."

AUM. Bowing down to Narayana and Nara, foremost of Purushas, and to the Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya!

Janamejaya said, “Having acquired their kingdom, how did my grandsires, the Pandava Mahatmans, conduct themselves towards King Dhritarashtra? And how did that king behave whose sons and counsellors were all slain, whose power and wealth had disappeared, and who was without a refuge? How did Gandhari of noble fame conduct herself? For how many years did my grandsires rule the kingdom? Great Vaisampayana, tell me all.”

Vaisampayana replied, “Having won back their kingdom and killed all their enemies, the Pandavas rule the earth, setting Dhritarashtra at their head. Vidura, Sanjaya and the wise Yuyutsu, Dhritarashtra’s son by his Vaisya wife, wait upon Dhritarashtra. The Pandavas take the opinion of the king in all matters. Indeed, for ten and five years, they do everything only under the advice of the old king.

As Yudhishtira Dharmaraja enjoins, the heroes often go to the monarch and sit beside him, after prostrating themselves at his feet. Dhritarashtra always smells the tops of their heads in affection and they do whatever he asks, in his deep wisdom. Kunti serves and obeys Gandhari in all things.

Draupadi, Subhadra and the other Pandava women treat the old king and queen as if they were their own father- and mother-in-law.

Yudhishtira gives to Dhritarashtra, as does Kunti to Gandhari, every royal comfort—luxurious beds, clothes and ornaments, and the finest food and drink, treating them with all deference as well-loved elders. Vidura, Sanjaya and Yuyutsu wait day and night upon the old king whose sons had all been slain. The great Brahmana Kripa, that mighty bowman, dear brother-in-law of Drona, also attends upon the king. Besides, the most holy Vyasa often meets the aged monarch and narrates to him tales of ancient Rishis, Devarishis, Pitris and Rakshasas.

Under Dhritarashtra's instructions, Vidura oversees the discharge of all acts of religious merit and the administration of law. By virtue of his excellent administration, the Pandavas obtain numerous exceptional services from their feudatories and followers with a modest expenditure of wealth. King Dhritarashtra frees many prisoners and pardons those that have been condemned to death, many of them loyalists of his son Duryodhana, and Yudhishtira the Just makes not the slightest protest at this.

When the son of Ambika goes out on pleasure excursions, Yudhishtira of great tejas sees to his every comfort and luxury. Aralikas, juice-makers and makers of ragakhandavas wait on King Dhritarashtra just as before, when he was king. Pandu's son seeks out and buys rare garlands and costly garments worthy of royalty, and presents them to his uncle. Maireya wines, fish of various kinds, sherbets and honey, and many diverse and delightful foods are offered to the old king, exactly as when he was himself ruler. All the potentates of the world who come to Hastinapura wait upon the Kuru monarch as before.

Kunti and Draupadi, Satyabhama of the Satwatas vamsa, possessed of great fame, Ulupi, the daughter of the Naga king, Queen Chitrangada, the sister of Dhrishtaketu, and the daughter of Jarasandha—these and many other royal ladies, O foremost of men, wait upon Subala's daughter Gandhari, veritably like maids. Yudhishtira issues a directive to his brothers that Dhritarashtra, who had lost all his sons, should be preserved from any further sorrow. They, on their part, pay careful heed to their brother's grave command and in every way are exceptionally obedient to the old king, their uncle.

There is one exception to this rule, and that is Bhimasena. Bhima can never forgive Dhritarashtra for the fateful game of dice and all that followed, for which he blames his uncle entirely. He can never remove that burning rancour from his heart."

CANTO 2

Vaisampayana said, “However, worshipped by the other Pandava brothers, Dhritarashtra, son of Ambika, passes his time happily, waited upon and honoured by many Rishis who come to the city of elephants. It is he who makes the first offerings given daily to the great Brahmanas who live in the palace. Yudhishtira has given complete charge and care of this pious duty to his uncle, upon whom he continues to shower affection, for there is no malice in Pandu’s eldest son, neither in his nature nor in his heart. He says to his brothers and councillors, ‘Our uncle Dhritarashtra must be accorded all reverence and honour by me and by all of you. Whoever is obedient to Dhritarashtra’s commands is my well-wisher; anyone who treats him otherwise is my enemy and will be punished by me for certain.’

On days when rituals are performed and offerings made to the Pitris, and also at the sraddha ceremonies for his dead sons and allies, Dhritarashtra gives profuse wealth to Brahmanas, as he likes and as he thinks each one deserves. Yudhishtira, Bhima, Arjuna and the twins strive to please the old king and carry out his orders faithfully. They are always careful to ensure that the grief they have brought him by killing his sons and grandsons does not overwhelm their blind uncle, lest he die of it.

In everything, great and small, they ensure that Dhritarashtra continues to enjoy every privilege and royal luxury, as he did while Duryodhana and his brothers were alive. Thus do the sons of Pandu conduct themselves towards Dhritarashtra, living under his command. Seeing them so humble and obedient to his every wish, always treating him as sishyas would their guru, Dhritarashtra's heart softens, and he also shows them the affection of a preceptor. By performing the diverse rites of the sraddha and giving many rich gifts to Brahmanas, Gandhari frees herself of the debt she owes her dead sons. In this, too, the sons of Pandu, their mother and their wife ensure that the old queen lacks for nothing. This is how Yudhishtira Dharmaraja and his brothers worship King Dhritarashtra.

Dhritarashtra of great tejas can find no trace of ill-will in his nephews and, seeing how they faithfully tread the path of dharma and wisdom, he is pleased and gratified with them. In time, Subala's daughter Gandhari casts off her sorrow for her slain sons and shows the Pandavas love as if they were her own children. So it is that the Mahatejasvin, the Kuru king Yudhishtira, never by the slightest word or deed, displeases his royal uncle, the son of Vichitravirya; on the contrary, he does everything in his power to please him and the now helpless Gandhari, by fulfilling their every wish and command with the utmost reverence. The old king is gratified with Yudhishtira and grieved at the remembrance of the misdeeds of his own evil son Duryodhana.

Rising before dawn, Dhritarashtra bathes and chants his daily mantras, and then blesses the sons of Pandu, wishing them victory in battle and success in their every undertaking. Making the usual gifts to the Brahmanas in the palace, getting their blessings for the kingdom and all in it, and pouring libations on the sacred fire, the old king prays for a long life for the Pandavas. Indeed, he has never derived such deep happiness from his own sons as he now does from the sons of Pandu.

Meanwhile, Yudhishtira becomes as beloved of the Brahmanas as he already is of the Kshatriyas in his realm, while the diverse classes of Vaisyas and Sudras adulate him. He forgets serenely all the suffering and hardship inflicted on him, his brothers and his wife by Dhritarashtra and his sons, and offers his uncle constant love and reverence. Anyone giving Dhritarashtra the least offence earns Yudhishtira's strong disfavour. Indeed, through fear of Yudhishtira, nobody can so much as mention the evil that either Duryodhana or Dhritarashtra wrought in the past.

Both Gandhari and Vidura are well pleased with Ajatasatru's capacity to forgive. However, they have less cause to be pleased with Bhima, O Parantapa, for while Dharmaputra Yudhishtira is genuinely affectionate and obedient towards his uncle, his brother Bhima's brow clouds at the sight of Dhritarashtra. Seeing Dharmaputra Yudhishtira's reverence for the old king, Bhima continues to show him respect, but he does so with an unwilling heart.”

CANTO 3

Vaisampayana said, “The people of the Kuru kingdom can see no trace of discord between Duryodhana’s father, the old king, and Pandu’s son, the new one. However Dhritarashtra cannot help feeling antagonism towards Bhima, who had killed Duryodhana and all his brothers, while Vrikodara Bhimasena, too, from a strain of wickedness in his heart, finds it hard to tolerate his uncle. He covertly plagues Dhritarashtra by encouraging perverse servitors to disobey his commands.

One day, in the company of his friends, Bhima’s recollection of the evil counsels and deeds of the old king brings him to yield to a surge of wrath. He says loudly to his companions, in the hearing of Dhritarashtra and Gandhari, ‘These arms of mine, like a pair of iron clubs—it is these arms that despatched to the next world all the sons of the blind king who could fight with any weapon. Look at these invincible arms, like a pair of elephants’ trunks, smeared today with sandalwood paste—as they deserve, for these are the arms that sent Duryodhana and his brothers to Yama, with all their sons and kinsmen!’

After that outburst Bhima no longer restrains himself, and continues to give vent to his hatred and anger. For fifteen long years, Bhima’s constant insults fly like fire-darts into the ears of Dhritarashtra and Gandhari, lodging themselves deep in the heart of Dhritarashtra, who gives way to sorrow and despair. Wise Gandhari, who knows that time brings all things in its ineluctable course, remains serene. Yudhishtira knows nothing of this, nor do Arjuna Swetavahana and Kunti, nor the famed Draupadi. Madri’s twins, knowers of dharma, continue to wait upon the old king as attentively and affectionately as ever, never saying a word that might hurt or displease him.

Then, one day, Dhritarashtra can no longer contain his grief and confides in some of his old friends. With tears in his blind eyes, the aged king says, ‘You well know how the annihilation of the Kauravas came to pass. It was all caused by my folly, though the Kauravas approved of all my counsels. Fool that I was, I installed my evil son Duryodhana on the throne. He was an enemy and a terror to his own cousins. Krishna said to me, “Let this sinful wretch of evil mind be killed, along with all his close confederates,” but I did not listen, I did not understand the grave import of his words. All wise men said the same thing to me. Vyasa repeatedly gave me the same counsel; Sanjaya and even Gandhari told me to be rid of Duryodhana and the evil-doers who were closest to him. Vidura, and Bhishma, Drona and Kripa said the same, over and over. All of them showed me the way of dharma. But I was a slave to my love for my son, and I paid them no heed.

Today, bitter repentance is my lot. I regret not having given the Kuru throne of blazing splendour, handed down through the ages through the most noble sires and grandsires, to the sons of Pandu, men of immaculate dharma and possessed of every ability and accomplishment. Krishna clearly foresaw the destruction of all the kings; but he regarded the war of Kurukshetra as being not evil but, indeed, beneficial. I lost so many anikas of my troops, and my own heart is pierced with a thousand arrows of anguish. Now I seek to expiate my sins. At the fourth yaama of the day, or sometimes at the eighth division, with the regularity of a vrata, I eat a little food and drink some water just to stay alive. Only Gandhari knows this. All my attendants believe that I eat as usual.

Through concern for Yudhishtira, I keep this a secret, for if the eldest son of Pandu discovered what I am doing he would feel great pain. Clad in deer-skin, I lie down on the bare ground, on a bed of kusa grass, and pass the time in silent chanting of holy mantras. Gandhari, also, keeps a similar vrata with me. This is how we truly live, we who lost a hundred sons in battle, none of whom ever fled the field. I do not grieve for those children of mine, for they all died in the observance of Kshatriya dharma.’

Then at last the old king addresses Yudhishtira directly. ‘Blessed be you, O son of the Yadava princess. Listen now to what I say. Cherished and loved by you, my son, I have lived these fifteen years very happily. I have given large gifts and performed sraddhas repeatedly. I have, to the best of my power, achieved some punya, because you have enabled me to do so. This Gandhari, though she lost all her sons, has lived with great fortitude, looking to my needs all the while. Those who inflicted great wrongs on Draupadi and robbed you of your kingdom and wealth—those cruel wretches—have all left this world, slain in battle in accord with the dharma of the Kshatriya. I need do nothing for them, O Kurunandana. Killed with their faces turned towards battle, they have attained to the realms kept for warriors who die fighting.

It is time now that I accomplish what is beneficial and meritorious for me and for Gandhari. It becomes you, Maharajan, to grant me leave to do this. You are the foremost of all righteous men, always devoted to dharma. The king is the preceptor of all, and that is why I ask this of you. O Kshatriya, I seek your leave to go away into the forest, wearing rags and valkala, to seek my soul's peace. Rajan, I will live alone in the vana, with only Gandhari by my side, and perform tapasya, always blessing you. It is fitting for the kings of our house in old age to hand sovereignty to their sons and retired into vanaprastha. Subsisting in the forest on just air, abstaining from all food, I mean, with this wife of mine, to perform severe penance. Since you are king, you shall certainly have a share in my tapasya, my son, for kings are sharers in all deed, both auspicious and inauspicious, done in their kingdom.'

Yudhishtira says, 'When you, Rajan, are so grief-stricken, sovereignty does not please me at all. Ah, curses upon me for being so dark-minded and heedless as to allow the pleasures of kingship to bear me this far from my true concerns. Fie on me that my brothers and I have been so ignorant of your real condition: afflicted by sorrow, emaciated with fasting, and sleeping on the bare ground. Alas, that I have been so credulous as to have been led by your superior intelligence to believe that you were well cared for and happy, while in fact you have lived in the clasp of dark sadness.

What need have I of kingdom or of pleasures, what need of sacrifices or of happiness, when you, O King, have endured such pain? I regard my kingdom as a disease, and myself as one afflicted. But then of what use now are these hollow words of mine, stricken as I am? You are our father, you are our mother; you are our foremost of elders and superiors. If you leave us, how will we carry on living? Best of kings, let Yuyutsu, son of your loins, be made king, or, indeed, anyone else you may choose. I will go away into the forest, and you must rule the kingdom. It is not right for you to even think of burning with further fires one who is already consumed by the ignominy of what we have just learned from you.

I am not the king. You are the king, and I am dependent on your will. How dare I grant leave to you, who are my guru? O sinless one, I harbour no resentment in my heart on account of the wrongs done to us by Suyodhana. It was ordained that it should be so. We and they, all of us were stupefied and deceived by fate. We are your children, as Duryodhana and his brothers were. I feel that Gandhari is as much my mother as Kunti. If you, O King of kings, go away into the vana, I will follow you. I swear this by my soul. This earth, with her belt of seas, so full of wealth, will not be any source of joy to me if I am deprived of your presence. All this belongs to you. I serve you; I live to gratify you, bending my head. We are all dependent on you, Rajadhiraja. O, let the fever of your heart be dispelled. I believe, O Bhumipala, that all that has come upon you is solely due to destiny. I had thought that by waiting upon you and carrying out all your commands obediently, I would have the good fortune of rescuing you from the burning grief in your heart.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'O joy of the Kurus, Dharmaraja, my son, my mind is set on tapasya. Mighty one, it is proper for our vamsa that I should retire into the forest. I have lived long under your protection, my child, and you have served me reverently for many years. I am now old, and it is fitting that you give me leave to go into the vana.'

Dhritarashtra then addresses the Mahatman Sanjaya and Maharatha Kripa with folded hands, trembling all the while. 'I wish to solicit the king through you both. My mind has grown dark and dismal, and my mouth is dry through weakness of age and the exertion of speaking.' With these words, the Kurupravira sways against Gandhari for support, looking like a corpse. Seeing his blind uncle now so faint, the royal son of Kunti is pierced as by an arrow through his heart.

Yudhishtira exclaims, 'Alas that the king whose strength was that of a hundred thousand elephants sits before us today, leaning on a frail woman—that one who crushed an iron image of Bhima into dust with his bare arms must lean on her now to remain upright! May I be cursed a thousand times for being such a sinner! Fie on my intellect, fie on my knowledge of the Shastras, fie on me on whose account this Lord of the Earth is reduced today to a state unworthy of him! I too shall fast, even as my guru, my uncle, does. Yes, even as Dhritarashtra and his great and pure queen Gandhari fast, so will Yudhishtira.'

Then the Pandava king, knower of every dharma, with his own hands gently moistens the old blind king's face and breast with cold water. At the touch of Yudhishtira's fragrant hands bearing auspicious gemstones and medicinal herbs, Dhritarashtra regains his senses and opens his eyes. He says, 'Do you touch me again, O son of Pandu, with your hands, and do you embrace me. O you of eyes like lotus-petals, you have restored me to my senses with your propitious touch. Naresha, come close to me, I want to smell the crown of your head. Ah, how your embrace comforts me. This is the eighth yaama of the day, when I eat my food. Yudhishtira, it is because I have not yet eaten that I am so weak. Telling you what I had to say exhausted me entirely. I fainted through fatigue and sorrow, O child of the Kuru vamsa. But with the touch of your hands, Kurunandana, I am restored.'

Yudhishtira is moved by affection at these words and tenderly strokes his uncle's limbs. Reanimated by the Dharmaputra's touch, Dhritarashtra embraces him lovingly and smells the top of his head. Vidura and others weep aloud, unable to utter a word. Heavy as her heart is, Gandhari, the bhakta, bears her grief with fortitude, O King, and remains silent. The other royal women, Kunti among them, are distraught. They weep copious tears, clustered around the old king.

Dhritarashtra says again to Yudhishtira, 'O King, give me your leave to go into the vana and perform tapasya. I beg you, do not make me repeat myself, for my mind is exhausted and my body weak. My son, tire me no more.' At this, a loud lament arises from all the Kshatriyas present. And looking again at his royal uncle, once so splendid and strong, reduced now to such a piteous state, emaciated and pale, worn out by fasting, a living skeleton covered with skin, Dharmaputra Yudhishtira breaks down weeping. He says, 'Greatest of men, I do not desire life and sovereignty over the Earth. O Parantapa, I will do whatever pleases you. But if I am at all dear to you, eat something, I beg you. After that I will know what I must do.' Dhritarashtra of great tejas says to Yudhishtira, 'My son, with your leave, I wish to eat now.' Even as he speaks, Satyavati's son Vyasa appears and addresses the assembled gathering."

"Vyasa says, 'Mahabaho Yudhishtira, you must not hesitate to grant Dhritarashtra his wishes. This king is old. He has been made sonless and he will not be able to bear his grief long. The most blessed Gandhari, of great wisdom and gentle speech, bears the loss of her sons with silent fortitude. Today, I also add my voice to Dhritarashtra's request, and you must obey my words—give your aged uncle leave to go into the forest and seek his soul's peace. Let him not die an inglorious death at home. Let this king follow the path of all the Rajarishis of old. For, truly, the time for vanaprastha comes at last for all royal sages.'

King Yudhishtira the Just of mighty energy says to the Maharishi, 'We hold you in the highest reverence, and you alone are our first guru. You are the refuge of our kingdom as also of our vamsa. You are our king and our preceptor. I am your son and you, Holy One, are my father. The son must obey the commands of his sire, in accord with every dharma.'

Krishna Dwaipayana the Island-born, foremost of poets, greatest of those who know the Vedas, Vyasa of awesome tejas, says to Yudhishtira, 'It is even as you say, Mahabaho. This king has reached an advanced age, O Bhaarata, and is now in the final stage of his life. With your leave and my blessing, let this Lord of the Earth do what he purposes. Do not stand as an impediment in his way, for this is the highest dharma of Rajarishis, O Yudhishtira. They should either die in battle or in the vana, as the Shastras dictate, in consonance with their asrama in life.

Your royal father Pandu, King of kings, revered his older brother Dhritarashtra even as a sishya does his guru. At that time, Dhritarashtra adored the gods with many great sacrifices, with profuse gifts of veritable hills of wealth and jewels, and he ruled the Earth and protected his subjects wisely and well. When he begot a hundred sons and owned a swelling kingdom, he enjoyed unrivalled influence for thirteen years while you were in exile, and during that time he gave away great wealth. Sinless one, Lord of men, you have also, along with your brothers and servants, adored this old king and Gandhari of fame with the ready obedience a disciple pays to his preceptor. Now you must gladly give your leave to your father to go into the forest; the time has indeed come for him to attend to the practice of tapasya. O Yudhishtira, he does not, harbour even the slightest anger towards any of you.'

With these words, Vyasa soothes the old king. Yudhishtira answers the Rishi, saying, 'Tathaastu—so be it.' The Maharishi Vyasa then leaves the palace and Hastinapura and departs into the forest. Yudhishtira, bending low before the old king, says humbly, tenderly to Dhritarashtra, 'Holy Vyasa approves of your purpose, as do Vidura, Yuyutsu and Sanjaya. All of them are well-wishers of our vamsa and worthy of worship. I will accomplish what you want with all speed. However, O Rajan, I beg of you with bowed head, do you first eat and only after that leave for the vana and make your asrama in the forest.'"

CANTO 5

Vaisampayana said, "Having received the king's permission, Dhritarashtra returns to his own palace, followed by Gandhari. He is weak and walks slowly and with some difficulty, like a great tusker, lord of an elephant herd, worn out and spent with age. Vidura follows Dhritarashtra, as does Sanjaya, his sarathi, as well as the mighty bowman Kripa, the son of Saradwata.

Entering his palace, O King, Dhritarashtra performs his morning ablutions and rituals and, after gratifying the foremost Brahmanas of the court, finally eats a little. Then the virtuous Gandhari and Kunti of deep wisdom are worshipped with sacred offerings by their daughters-in-law, O Bhaarata, and they too eat. When Dhritarashtra has finished his repast, with Vidura and the others around them, the Pandavas, having eaten their food, come to the old king and sit around him. The son of Ambika lays his hand on the back of Yudhishtira, who sits next to him, and says, 'You must always be careful to discharge your dharma towards your kingdom of eight angas, O joy of the Kurus, keeping righteousness before you.

Kaunteya, you are possessed of intelligence and learning in abundance. Listen to me now, O King, and I will tell you the means whereby the kingdom can be protected through dharma. Yudhishtira, you must unfailingly honour those old in knowledge and wisdom. Listen attentively to what they say, and act at their behest without hesitation. Rising at dawn, O King, worship them with every due rite; and when the time comes for action, consult them about whatever you intend to do. When you show them reverence and honour, they will give you sage counsel that will lead to your welfare.

Keep your senses restrained, even as you do your horses. They will then prove beneficial to you, like wealth that is not squandered. You must only employ such ministers as have passed the test of honesty, men who have proven their loyalty, disinterestedness, continence and courage. It is best to have as men of state those who are born to it, whose hereditary vocation it is. You must ensure that they, too, are self-restrained, astute in the discharge of business, and endowed with pure and righteous conduct. You must gather information through spies in diverse disguises, men whose faithfulness has been tasted, who are natives of your kingdom, and who remain unknown to your enemies as your agents.

Your citadel should be properly protected with strong walls and arched gates. On every side the walls, with watch-towers on them standing close to one another, should be such as to allow six men to walk on them abreast. The gates should be large and strong enough to withstand enemy attacks. Erected in proper places, they should be carefully and constantly guarded.

Let all your purposes be accomplished through men whose families and conduct are well known and reputable. Be vigilant in safeguarding yourself against treachery while indulging in sport, in the garlands you wear and the beds that you lie upon, or through poison in your food. The ladies of your household should be protected, watched over by aged and trusted servitors of good conduct, well born and possessed of learning, O Yudhishtira. Make ministers of Brahmanas who are truly learned men, imbued with humility, well born, conversant with dharma and artha, and adorned with simplicity and forthrightness. With these men you should hold regular consultations—but make sure that those you trust and keep closest to you are few in number.

On some occasions you may consult with the whole of your council, or with a part of it. This should be done in a well-protected private chamber or arbor. You could hold this consultation in a forest, where there is no grass in which intruders or spies might hide. Never should you hold counsel at night. Monkeys, birds and other animals that can imitate humans should be excluded from the council chamber, as also fools, and lame and palsied men. I believe that the evils that spring from divulging the counsels of kings are beyond remedy. While among your counsellors, you must repeatedly refer to the evils that arise from a betrayal of secrecy, O Parantapa, and to the merits that flow from counsels properly kept. You must constantly ascertain the merits and faults of the inhabitants of your city and the provinces.

Let your laws, O King, always be administered by trusted judges, who must be contented men and of good conduct. Keep a watchful eye on them through secret agents. Let your officers of justice mete out punishments to offenders according to the law only after careful scrutiny of their offences. Those culprits that are disposed to take bribes, that inflict harsh punishments, or are stained by greed, or liars or revilers, that violate the chastity of other men's wives, commit murder, act rashly, disturb the assemblies and sport of others, or who bring about a confusion of castes, should be punished in consonance with time and place, either by fines or with death.

In the morning you should see those employed in making your disbursements. After this you should look to your ablutions, and then to your food. Next you should inspect your armed forces, gratifying them on every occasion. Your evening should be set apart for envoys and spies. The early nights should be devoted to completing what you have done in the past day and assessing what remains to be done in the coming one. The later night you may keep for your own pleasure and entertainment, and the afternoons for games and other amusements. However, at all times your mind must dwell on the means for accomplishing your purposes. At the appointed hour, having adorned your person, you should prepare to dispense gifts and charity in profusion. The times for different actions, O son, revolve ceaselessly like wheels.

Exert yourself always to fill your treasury by lawful and righteous means. Adharma in this pursuit must be shunned. Through your trusted spies you must ascertain who your enemies are, who are bent upon exploiting your weaknesses, and then have them destroyed from a distance. Appoint your servants and agents, O King, after carefully examining their conduct. All your plans and wishes must be implemented through your trusted servitors, whether they are formally appointed or not. The Senapati of your army must be of strong character and firm conduct, courageous, able to bear hardship, loyal and devoted to your good. Remember to be always as scrupulous in knowing your own weaknesses as you do those of your enemies. You must also know the weaknesses of your own men, as also of those loyal to your enemies.

The artificers and artisans who live in your provinces should do your bidding as obediently as cows and mules, O son of Pandu. You must support skilled and able men in your kingdom engaged in their respective professions who are devoted to you. A wise king always encourages and recognizes the accomplishments of his gifted subjects, so that they can continue to pursue their vocations happily, O ruler of men. For then they will be staunchly loyal to you, and their skills will not fall away from bitterness.'"

CANTO 6

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Always, Bhaarata, distinguish between the mandalas that belong to you, to your foes, to neutrals, and to those that are disposed equally towards you and your foes. Of these, you must clearly know the areas belonging to the four kinds of foes, of those known as Atatayins, of your allies, and the allies of your enemies.

The ministers of state, the people of the provinces, the garrisons of forts, and the armed forces, O Kurusottama, may or may not be perfectly loyal. Therefore, act in such a manner that your enemies do not gain influence over these in any way. These twelve constitute the principal concerns of a king, and to these he must always give his attention, as well as to those known as the sixty, of which the ministers are foremost.

These are what the learned men of politics call the mandalas. Clearly understand, O Yudhishtira, that the six important occurrences—of peace, war, marching forward, halting, sowing dissension, and conciliation—depend upon these mandalas. You must also heed growth and diminution, as well as the condition of being stationary; also know the attributes of the sixfold occurrences, Mahabaho, as resting upon the two and seventy that I have mentioned.

When one's own force has become strong and that of the enemy weak, it is then, O son of Kunti, that the king should wage war against the enemy, and victory shall be his. When the enemy is strong and one's own power is diminished, then the weak king, if he has any intelligence, should seek to make peace with his enemy.

The king should always stock a large store of weapons and provisions for his army. When he is in a position of strength and able to march out, he should on no account make any delay, for times and fortunes change quickly. When going forth to war or even in peace, a wise king will appoint the best men to offices for which they are suited, without being moved by any other consideration than their ability.

When he is obliged to yield a portion of his territories to his enemy, he should give him only barren lands that produce no crops, or those that are mediocre. When obliged to give wealth, he should give gold heavily alloyed with base metals. When obliged to give a portion of his troops, he should only give such men as are not noted for their prowess. On the other hand, when a king takes from an enemy he must employ this rule in reverse—obtain the best land, the purest gold and the strongest men.

While making peace treaties, king of the Bharatas, you must demand as a hostage the son of the defeated king; any other course is unreliable. If some calamity overtakes a king, he must try to free himself from it through his own knowledge as well as the counsel of the wise.

The king must support and maintain the destitute and the unhappy, the afflicted, such as the blind, the deaf and dumb, and the diseased among his people. First of all protecting his own kingdom, ensuring its welfare and prosperity, a king, when truly assured of his own great strength, can direct all his efforts to vanquishing his enemies, either one after another or even simultaneously. He should first afflict them with subtle stratagems, obstruct them in their endeavours to prosper, and drain their treasury. The king who wants his own growth should never injure the subordinate and allied princes and chieftains under his sway. O Kaunteya, never seek war with a king who wishes to conquer the whole world. Instead, with the help of your ministers and agents, create dissension among his nobles, allies and subordinates.

A powerful king should never seek to exterminate weak kings, for these promote the weal of the world by cherishing the good and punishing the evil. Best of kings, be yielding like the crane. If a strong king advances against a weak one, it is the latter that makes him desist, through offers of conciliation and other peaceful methods. If he cannot pacify the invader by the means of diplomacy and gifts, then he must gather his forces and those of other rulers well disposed towards him and, uniting against the attacker, fall upon the enemy in battle.

The wise king resorts to war only when every effort at peace fails; fate will then come to his aid against the aggressor. However, if he fails in battle, too, he must inevitably fall, giving up his resources, one after the other, but never yielding. The Kshatriya who thus lays down his life will surely attain liberation from all sorrow and find great honour in heaven.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Best of kings, reflect deeply on war and peace. Each is of two kinds. The means are various, Yudhishtira, as are the circumstances under which war or peace may be made. With calm detachment always, O Kuru, assess your own strengths and weaknesses, and never rashly march against an enemy who is intelligent, and has an army of vigorous and contented soldiers. You should think carefully of how you can vanquish him.

Go to war only against an enemy who is weaker than you and does not have healthy and confident soldiers. When the time is favourable you are certain to find victory, but once you have defeated your enemy, you should withdraw. Then you should assail your enemy with various troubles, weakening him by sowing dissension among his allies. Afflict him relentlessly to inspire terror in his heart, and attack him with all the means at your disposal, overt and covert, eroding his power until he loses all assurance and goes in fear of his own shadow.

The king who knows the Shastras, who marches against an enemy, must weigh the three kinds of strength, not just of his foe but his own. Only one endowed with swiftness, discipline and the strength of wise counsel, O Bhaarata, should march against an enemy. When his position is otherwise, he should avoid battle at any cost. The king who means to go to war must first provide himself with the power of wealth, the power of allies, of foresters, of paid soldiers, and of the working and trading classes. Among these, the power of allies and the power of wealth are superior to the rest. The power of the people and that of the standing army are equal.

Frequently, the power of spies is regarded as equal to either of the above, depending on the circumstances.

The troubles that visit kings come in many forms. Hear from me, my son, what those are; be careful to take note of each separately, O Pandava, and strive to face them squarely through the time-tested methods of conciliation, gifts and the rest. When he has a strong army, a king may attack an enemy, Parantapa. He must be as attentive to considerations of time and place, while preparing to march, as he is to the forces he has mustered and his own merits in other respects. The king who is heedful of his own advancement should not go to war unless his fighting men are strong and healthy, and their morale high. When powerful, a king may go to war in even an unfavourable season. He must make a river of his legions, with quivers for its stones, horses and chariots for its current, and proud standards for the trees that cover its banks, while its turbulent flow is miry with foot soldiers and elephants. It is such an army that a king must possess to effect the destruction of his enemy.

In accordance with the science of warfare as known and propounded by Sukra Deva, the king going into combat must form his legions into the vyuhas called Sakata, Padma and Vajra. He must be fully aware of his enemy's strengths and cognizant of his own strengths and weaknesses; he should decide on where to fight—within his own territories or those of his foe. Keeping his men in good spirits by caring for their every need and wish, the wise king hurls his most powerful warriors into battle against his enemy.

As I have said, he must deliberate well on the condition of his own kingdom, and first try to achieve his purpose through sama, conciliation, and the other well-known means. One's body must be protected by all means: a man should devote himself to that which benefits him both in this world and the next. The king who adheres to this dharma will surely find heaven when he leaves his body, after having ruled his subjects wisely and justly in this world.

Kurusottama, the king's first and last dharma is to minister to his subjects; it is only through this that a sovereign of the earth conquers both this world and the next. You have already been instructed in the Rajadharma by Bhishma, by Krishna and by Vidura, O best of kings. From the love that I bear you, I am now adding what I know to what they have already taught you.

Most generous of kings, you who give profuse gifts during the great sacrifices you perform, bear in mind all you have heard and discharge your duty accordingly. Through this you will bring great felicity to your people and find Swarga for yourself. An equal measure of punya accrues to the king who worships the Devas with a hundred Aswamedha yagnas and to the one who rules his subjects righteously.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Lord of the Earth, I will do as you bid, and you, best of kings, must continue to teach me further. Bhishma has ascended into heaven; Krishna has returned to Dwaraka; and I know that, if you leave, Vidura and Sanjaya will also go with you into the forest. Who but you will teach and guide me now? Be assured, O King, I will follow whatever you have told me today as my well-wisher.'

Despite the words of the wise Yudhishtira, the Rajarishi wants only his permission to depart and, saying to him, "Cease, my child, I am tired," he enters Gandhari's apartment. Knowing the time is ripe and the circumstances opportune, Gandhari of deep dharma says to her husband, who, seated, looks like another Prajapati, 'You have received Mahamuni Vyasa's leave to go into the forest. But when will you obtain Yudhishtira's as well? When shall we go forth from here, my lord?' Dhritarashtra replies, 'Gandhari, I have indeed obtained the leave of my Mahatman sire. Yudhishtira will also soon agree, and I will go into the vana. However, first I want to give away some wealth, even as Preta, for the peace of my sons who were so addicted to calamitous gambling. I want to call all our people to my palace and give away bounteous wealth.'

Dhritarashtra sends for Yudhishtira and, at the old king's command, the Pandava arranges for all the gold and other wealth that he asks for to be put at his disposal. Upon receiving his royal invitation, many Brahmanas living in Kurujangala, many Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras, come to Dhritarashtra's mansion with joy in their hearts.

Emerging from his inner apartments, the aged monarch, seeing all of them and his subjects assembled before him, addresses them: ‘All of you and the Kurus have lived together in harmony for many years as one another’s well-wishers and benefactors. The time has come for you now to heed and accomplish what I now say to you, even as sishyas do the bidding of their guru. I have set my heart upon retiring into the forest, with Gandhari as my companion. The Rishi Vyasa has approved of this, as has the son of Kunti. Now let me have your permission too, without any hesitation.

The goodwill that has always existed between us is rarely to be found in other realms between kings and their people. I am worn out with the burden of years borne upon my head. I am without any progeny. Sinless ones, I am emaciated with penitent fasts, as is my queen Gandhari. Since the kingdom passed to Yudhishtira, I have enjoyed great happiness, O foremost of men—far greater that what I could have expected or known had Duryodhana ruled instead. What other refuge can I have now, old as I am and destitute of children, other than the forest? You most blessed ones, it is your solemn duty to joyfully grant me the leave I seek to go forth and find the peace of my soul.’

Upon hearing these words, all the good people of Hastinapura and the surrounding lands of Kurujangala utter loud lamentations, their voices choked with weeping. Dhritarashtra of great tejas seeks to comfort his grief-stricken people.”

CANTO 9

"Dhritarashtra says, 'You know that Santanu ruled this Earth, as did Vichitravirya, protected by Bhishma. My brother Pandu, who also ruled you well, was dear to me, as he was to you. Sinless ones, I have also served you. I have done the best I could, and discharged my Rajadharma heedfully; and so, if I have ever failed you, I ask you to forgive me.

Duryodhana also enjoyed this kingdom without a thorn in his side. Foolish and of perverse mind he was, but I do not think he did his people any wrong or harm. Yet, through his pride and wickedness, as well as through my own weakness, a great carnage has claimed the lives of Kshatriyas. Whether my actions were right or wrong, I beg you with folded hands to forget what I did.

Think of me as being old, as having lost all my progeny and being tormented by grief; think of me as having been your king, descended from the great kings of old—think of all this, and find it in your hearts to forgive me. This Gandhari of mine also is old and plunged in sorrow after the loss of her sons; and she too solicits your forgiveness. Knowing that both of us are old and stricken by grief at having lost our sons, grant us your protection and give us both the sanction we seek, blessed ones.

You must love and look after this great Kuru king, Yudhishtira, the son of Kunti, in prosperity as well as in adversity. With four brothers of abundant prowess beside him, he will never fall into distress, or leave the ancient path of truth. All of them are conversant with both dharma and artha; they are like the Lokapalas, the very guardians of the world. Like illustrious Brahma himself, Lord of the universe of creatures, will this Yudhishtira of mighty tejas rule you. I am saying what needs to be said in no uncertain terms. Thus do I give this Yudhishtira into your care, as I do you into his care. And thus I beseech you to forget, to forgive whatever injury was done to you by my sons, who are no more among the living, or by anyone else who was mine and served me.

I know that you never harboured any anger towards me in the past. I solemnly join my hands before all of you, who are known for your loyalty. Look, I bow to you all. Yet again, Anaghas, with Gandhari by my side I ask your pardon for every wrong done to you by my sons of unrestrained and restless minds, stained by avarice, and always yielding to their desires.'

Hearing these words of the aged monarch, tears fill the eyes of the citizens of Hastinapura and the people of the provinces. They say nothing but only look numbly at one another."

Vaisampayana says, "When Dhritarashtra has spoken, his people stand before him stupefied. Hearing no reply from them, no sound, for their voices are choked with grief, the aged king speaks to them again, 'You best of men, I am old, sonless, and with my wife lament constantly; my sire, the Island-born Vyasa, has give me his blessing to go into the vana, as has Yudhishtira, who knows every dharma, O my good and righteous people. Sinless ones, Gandhari and I ask again for your leave to retire into vanaprastha; with bent heads, we beg you. You must not deny us.'

Hearing him so utterly pitiable, the assembled people of Kurujangala begin to wail, covering their faces with their hands and upper garments. Overwhelmed by searing grief, they weep like fathers and mothers shedding tears, every thought dispelled from their hearts other than that Dhritarashtra means to leave them. At last, controlling their grief and shock, they are able to speak to one another, and by unanimous consent elect a Brahmana to answer the old monarch on their behalf.

The erudite Brahmana Samba, of impeccable character and conduct, learned beyond common measure, a master of all the Riks, attempts to reply to the king. He is a composed and self-assured man, exceptionally intelligent and serene by nature. With the approval of the assembled people of Kurujangala, Samba says to the king, 'Maharajan, I have been given charge of voicing the people's reply to you, and with your leave, I will now do so, mighty Kshatriya. All that you say, O King of kings, is true; indeed, you have not uttered the slightest untruth. You are our well-wisher, as, indeed, we are yours. Verily, in this line of rulers, there never was a king who in governing his subjects earned their disfavour. You have ruled us like fathers or brothers. Nor did King Duryodhana ever do us any wrong.

O Rajan, you must do as the Mahatman Maharishi, son of Satyavati, has said. He is the first and the greatest of all our gurus. When you leave us, O Rajan, we shall have to pass our days in sorrow, filled with remembrance of your many virtues. We were as ably protected and ruled by your son Duryodhana as we had been by Santanu, or Chitrangada, or by your father, O King, who was shielded by the might of Bhishma, or by Pandu, Lord of the Earth, whom you guided and watched over in all he did.

Your son never did us the slightest wrong, O Monarch. We lived contentedly, relying on him as trustfully as on our own father. You well know how we lived under Duryodhana's rule. In the same manner, we have enjoyed great happiness, Rajan, under the rule of Kunti's son of unmatched intelligence and wisdom, the very soul of dharma. Yudhishtira, who performs sacrifices with gifts in profusion, follows the ways of the Rajarishis of old of your vamsa, among whom were Kuru and Sambara and others, and even Bharata, wisest of all. There is nothing that invites the slightest censure in this Yudhishtira's rule. Protected and governed by you, we have all lived in great felicity; we can find no complaint against you or your son. As for what you said about Duryodhana and the carnage of kinsmen, I beg you to hear me, O delighter of the Kurus.'

The Brahmana continues, 'Duryodhana did not cause the Great War and the annihilation which that overtook the Kurus. Neither were you the cause of that war, nor Karna, nor Subala's son Sakuni. Fate alone brought that war down upon the world, and it was ineluctable, for men cannot resist destiny. Incontrovertible Fate brought eight and ten aksauhinis of troops together on Kurukshetra, O Rajan, and in eight and ten days that host was destroyed by the greatest Kuru warriors—Bhishma and Drona and Kripa and others, and Mahatman Karna, the heroic Satyaki, Dhrishtadyumna, and by the four sons of Pandu, Bhima, Arjuna and the twins.

That slaughter could never have come to pass without it being willed by destiny. Certainly death must be faced and enemies slain in battle, and by Kshatriyas in particular. Those greatest of men, masters of astras, exterminated the very Earth itself, with its horses, chariots and elephants. No, your son was not the cause of that carnage of noble kings. You were not the cause, nor any of your servants, nor Karna, nor Subala's son. Fate alone wrought the slaughter of the greatest princes of the Kuru vamsa, as well as of thousands of other kings. Who can say otherwise?

You yourself are regarded as the Guru and master of the world. We, therefore, in your presence, grant absolution to your righteous son and say, let that king, with all his brothers, friends and allies, find the heavenly realm reserved for Kshatriya heroes who die in war. With the leave of the greatest Brahmanas, let him sport blissfully in Swarga. You also shall attain to great punya, and unswerving steadiness in dharma.

O Dhritarashtra of excellent vratas, follow faithfully the duties laid down in the Vedas. As for the Pandavas, they have no need for either your protection or ours. They can capably rule all the realms of Swarga, O wise Dhritarashtra, what then to say of this Bhumi? And we, the subjects of this kingdom, O Kurusthama, shall be obedient to the sons of Pandu, in prosperity as in adversity, for they wear dharma as their ornament.

The eldest son of Pandu makes valuable gifts to the best of Dvijas who conduct his sacrifices and rituals, even as all the great kings of antiquity did. The high-minded son of Kunti is mild, gentle and self-restrained, and as generous as a second Vaisravana. He has wise and able ministers who attend on him. He is compassionate to even his enemies. Indeed, we say that he is the jewel of the Bharata vamsa, so pure is he in thought and deed.

Blessed with high wisdom, he is perfectly straightforward in his dealings and rules us like a father protecting his children. From their association with the Dharmaputra, O Rajarishi, Bhima and Arjuna and all the others will never do us the least wrong. They are mild to those that are mild, and fierce like snakes of virulent poison to those who are fierce. Possessed of tireless energy, these Mahatmans are always devoted to the good of the people.

Neither Kunti nor Panchali, nor Ulupi, nor the princess of the Sattwata vamsa will do the least injury to these your subjects. The people of the city and the provinces can never forget the affection you have shown us, which in Yudhishtira exists in still larger measure. The Maharatha sons of Kunti, while themselves living unswervingly by dharma, readily protect and cherish even those among their people who are less than righteous. Therefore, O Rajan, Purushottama, dispel any anxiety from your heart on account of Yudhishtira, and set yourself to accomplish all the punya to which you yourself aspire.'

Hearing the words of Samba the Brahmana, words fraught with dharma and punya, every last man assembled there whole-heartedly accepts them as his own, crying, ‘Excellent! Excellent!’ Dhritarashtra also applauds Samba’s words, and then dismisses the final assembly of his subjects. Honoured by them and gazed at with loving and auspicious glances, the old king joins his hands and salutes them in return. He then goes back to his own palace with Gandhari.

Listen now to what he does after that night has passed.”

CANTO 11

Vaisampayana said, "After the night has passed, Dhritarashtra, son of Ambika, sends Vidura to Yudhishtira's palace. Vidura of unmatched tejas, wisest of men, says to the Dharmaraja of unfading glory, 'King Dhritarashtra has performed the initiatory rites towards his purpose of taking sannyasa in the forest. He means to set out for the vana on the day of the full moon of the month of Kartika.

He now solicits some wealth from you, for he wants to perform the sraddhas for Gangaputra Bhishma, as well as for Drona, Somadatta and Bahlika of the great intellect, and also of all his sons and well-wishers who died on Kurukshetra And, also, if you allow it, for the evil Jayadratha of the Sindhus, his son-in-law.'

Both Yudhishtira and Arjuna welcome and applaud Vidura's message, but Bhima of restless energy and unappeasable wrath, recollecting the evil that Duryodhana once did to them, does not. Arjuna, the Kiritin, at once senses Bhima's mood and, bowing his head to his brother, says, 'Bhima, our royal and aged sire Dhritarashtra has resolved to take sannyasa in the forest. Before he leaves he wants to offer wealth for the peace of his slain kinsmen and well-wishers now in the other world. O Kuru, indeed he wants to give away wealth that belongs to you by conquest.

Mahabaho, it is for Bhishma and the others that the old king wants to do this. You must allow him what his heart desires at this time. Today, fortune has come full circle and it is our uncle who begs us for gold, the same Dhritarashtra whom we once begged for our kingdom. Consider how time has brought this juncture—that the king who was once lord and protector of all the world now wants to go away into the jungle, after seeing all his sons and allies killed in war. Best of men, do not refuse this, his last request, for such ignoble denial will bring us all infamy and disrepute. Do you learn your dharma in this matter from Yudhishtira, who is both our elder brother and our lord. Great prince of the Bharata vamsa, it becomes you to acquiesce, not churlishly decline.'

Yudhishtira applauds Arjuna's words, but Bhima, yielding to wrath, says, 'Phalguna, it is we who shall give charity in the name of Bhishma, of Somadatta, and Bhurisravas; for Rajarishi Bahlika, Mahatman Drona, and all others. Our mother Kunti shall make the obsequial offerings for Karna. Best of men, do not allow Dhritarashtra to perform those sraddhas. This is my belief. We have no need to please our enemies—that is not our Kshatriya dharma. As for Duryodhana and the others, let them sink from misery to even greater misery. Ah, it was those wretches of their race that caused the whole world to be exterminated. How have you forgotten the anxiety of those twelve long years, and then the ajnatavasa that brought Panchali such torment? Where was this Dhritarashtra's affection for us then? Did you not put on the hide of a black deer, stripped of all your royal ornaments and, with Panchali beside you, follow this Yudhishtira into exile?

Where were Bhishma and Drona then, and where was Somadatta? You lived for thirteen years in the forest, supporting yourself on whatever we could forage. This eldest father of ours did not then look upon you with any parental love. Have you forgotten, O Partha, that it was this evil-minded wretch of our race who repeatedly asked Vidura during the game of dice, "And now what has been won?"'

Bhima is interrupted by Yudhishtira, who rebukes and silences his brother."

CANTO 12

"Arjuna says, 'O Bhima, you are my senior, my elder brother and preceptor. I dare not speak any further. Rajarishi Dhritarashtra deserves to be honoured by us in every way. The virtuous, those distinguished as superior men, never break dharma and remember, not the wrongs done to them, but the favours they have received.'

Hearing the words of the high-souled Arjuna, Mahatman Yudhishtira says to Vidura, 'O Kshattri, tell the Kuru king that I shall give him as much wealth as he wishes to give away for the obsequies of his sons, and of Bhishma and all the others who were his well-wishers and benefactors. Let not Bhima be glum at this!'

Yudhishtira praises Arjuna for what he has said. But Bhimasena begins to cast angry looks at Dhananjaya. Yudhishtira addresses Vidura again, 'Let King Dhritarashtra not be angry with Bhimasena, for my brother, who is wise, was greatly afflicted by cold and rain and heat and by a thousand other griefs while we lived in the forest. All this you know. However, say to the king from me, O best of the Bhaarata vamsa, that he can take from my house whatever he wishes, and in whatever measure he pleases. Also tell the king that his heart should not dwell on the arrogance that Bhima has exhibited, out of his anguish.

Say to Dhritarashtra that whatever belongs to me and belongs to Arjuna, is his own. Let the king give gifts as he chooses to the Brahmanas. Let him spend as largely as he likes. Let him free himself entirely from the debt he owes to his sons and well-wishers. Tell him besides from me, O

Vidura, “O King, not only does all my wealth belong to you, but this very body of Yudhishtira. Have no doubt about this.””

CANTO 13

"Wise Vidura returns to Dhritarashtra with his important message: 'I communicated your words to Yudhishtira of great tejas, who reflected upon them and then approved your message with high praise. Arjuna also sets all his palaces and mansions, with all the wealth therein, indeed his very life-breath, at your disposal. Your son King Yudhishtira also offers you his kingdom and prana and wealth and everything else that belongs to him, O Rajarishi.

However, Mahabaho Bhima cannot still forget all his sorrows, and gave his consent with difficulty, heaving many deep sighs. Yudhishtira and Arjuna together prevailed upon him to be more cordially disposed towards you. Yudhishtira Dharmaraja implores you to not hold Bhima's improper conduct against him, and deplores the rancour to which he yielded, remembering the hostilities of the past. That is in the nature of war-like Kshatriyas, O King, and Vrikodara is devoted to battle and the way of warriors.

Yudhishtira and Arjuna both repeatedly beg your forgiveness of Bhima. They say, "Be gracious to us. You are our lord. Whatever wealth we have, Bhumipala, is yours to give away as you please. You are the master of this kingdom, O Bhaarata, and of all lives in it. Let the foremost Kuru give away the finest gifts available in our treasury to the Brahmanas for the ritual offerings for his sons, and the others.

Indeed, let Dhritarashtra take from our mansions jewels and ornaments and gold, slaves, both men and women, and kine, goats and sheep, as he pleases, and give them away to the Dvijas. Let him also give profuse gifts to those that are poor or sightless or in great distress, choosing the objects of his charity as he likes. Let large pavilions be constructed, O Vidura, and filled with food and drink of diverse tastes in profusion. Let tanks of water be built for cattle to drink from, and other works of punya be accomplished." This is what was said to me by Yudhishtira and Pritha's son Dhananjaya. Now you must tell me what should be done next.'

Dhritarashtra expresses his satisfaction and pleasure at Vidura's message, O Janamejaya, and sets his heart on distributing great largesse on the day of the full moon in the month of Kartika."

Vaisampayana said, “Dhritarashtra is deeply gratified with the response of Yudhishtira and Arjuna. The blind and aged king, after due consideration, invites thousands of deserving Brahmanas and superior Rishis for the sake of Bhishma, as well as of his sons and friends. He orders a vast quantity of food and drink to be prepared, and chariots and other vehicles, clothes, gold and jewels and wondrous gemstones, slaves, both male and female, goats and sheep, fine shawls and blankets and all manner of costly articles to be collected, and villages and fields, and other kinds of wealth to be listed, as well as caparisoned elephants and horses, and many superlatively beautiful maidens.

That foremost of kings gives all these away for the advancement of his dead kinsmen, naming each of them in due order as the gifts are made: Drona and Bhishma, Somadatta and Bahlika, King Duryodhana and each of his other sons, and all his well-wishers, Jayadratha being the first. With the approval of Yudhishtira, the sraddha-yagna is distinguished by vast gifts of jewels, gold and every other kind of treasure. At the ceremony, tellers and scribes, at Yudhishtira’s behest, press the old king: ‘Tell us what gifts should be made; everything is ready and available and awaits your command.’ They distribute the presents as the king directs. At the command of the royal son of Kunti, one who was to receive a hundred, receives a thousand, and to one who was to receive a thousand, ten thousand is given. Like monsoon clouds enlivening crops with their rains, that royal cloud gratifies the Brahmanas of the kingdom with rivers of wealth.

When the gifts have all been distributed, the king deluges his assembled guests of all the four varnas with a flood of food and drink to suit every taste. Verily, the Dhritarashtra-ocean, swelling high, sweeps across the world, with jewels and gems for its waters, villages and fields for its verdant islands, piles of diverse treasures for its rich caves, elephants and steeds for its crocodiles and whirlpools, the sound of mridangas for its deep roars, and clothes and gold and precious ornaments for its waves.

In this way, O King, the mighty Dhritarashtra provides for the weal in the next world of his sons, grandsons and Pitris, as well as of himself and Gandhari. At last, when he grows tired with disbursing gifts in such profusion, that great yagna of giving comes to an end. Yes, even thus does the blind old king of the Kuru vamsa perform his Daana yagna.

Actors and mimes continually dance and sing on the occasion, and contribute to the merriment of all the guests. The most delicious and varied food and drink are given away in large quantities. Ten days that great sraddha lasts, O Bhaarata, and the royal son of Ambika is freed from the debts he owes his sons and grandsons."

CANTO 15

Vaisampayana said, “Dhritarashtra decides upon the hour of his departure and summons the sons of Pandu. Along with Gandhari, he has had the minor rites of leave-taking performed by Brahmanas proficient in the Vedas. On the day of the full moon in the month of Kartika, he has the sacred fire taken up which he worships daily. Discarding his customary robes, he dons deer-skin and valkala and, accompanied by his daughters-in-law, he sets out from his palace.

A lament arises from the Pandava and Kaurava women of the royal household when the son of Vichitravirya sets out for the forest. The king worships the palace in which he had lived with fried rice grains and beautiful flowers of many kinds. He honours all his servants with generous gifts and then, without turning back, sets out on his journey.

Trembling all over, his voice choked with tears, Yudhishtira cries out to his uncle, ‘O Rajan, where are you going?’ and falls down in a faint. Burning with anguish, Arjuna sighs repeatedly and, his own heart plunged in dark distress, counsels Yudhishtira to not yield so to grief. Bhima, Arjuna, Madri’s twins, Vidura, Sanjaya, Dhritarashtra’s son by his Vaisya wife, Kripa and Dhaumya, and other Brahmanas, all follow the old king, wordlessly and sorrowfully. Kunti walks ahead, leading Gandhari, whose eyes remain bound and whose hand is placed on Kunti’s shoulder. Dhritarashtra walks confidently behind Gandhari, his hand on her shoulder.

The ladies of the royal household, Drupada’s daughter Krishnaa, Subhadra of the Sattwata vamsa, Uttaraa, the daughter-in-law of the Pandavas, who has recently become a mother, Chitrangada, and others all accompany the old king, wailing like a flock of she-ospreys. The wives of the citizens—Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras—also spill out into the streets from every side.

At Dhritarashtra's departure, the people of Hastinapura are as distraught, O King, as they had been watching the Pandavas leave their city after being vanquished at dice. Even sequestered women who have never seen the sun or the moon pour out into the streets, such is their grief when King Dhritarashtra leaves for the great forest."

Vaisampayana said, "A great uproar arises from men and women who crowd the terraces of mansions or throng the streets. With folded hands, trembling with weakness, Dhritarashtra walks slowly along the main highway of Hastinapura, where his people swarm most densely. He leaves the city of the elephant by its main gateway and then repeatedly implores the crowds to return to their homes. Vidura has set his heart on going to the forest with his brother. The Suta Sanjaya, also, the son of Gavalgani, Dhritarashtra's closest counsellor, is of the same mind. But Dhritarashtra forbids Kripa and the Maharatha Yuyutsu from following him. He makes them over into Yudhishtira's hands.

When the people of the city follow the old king no more, Yudhishtira is prepared to go no further at the command of Dhritasrashtra, he and the ladies of his household. Only then does he see that his own mother Kunti has also decided to go to the forest. He says to her, 'I will follow the old king. You must not go, O Queen, but return to the city with these your daughters-in-law. My uncle is leaving for the vana determined to perform tapasya.'

Though her son speaks to her with eyes overflowing with tears, Kunti continues walking away from the city, leading Gandhari who has her hand upon the younger queen's shoulder. Kunti merely says to him, 'O King, never cause Sahadeva the slightest hurt or neglect him. He is the one most attached to me, Yudhishtira, and to you as well. You must also always bear Karna in your heart, your elder brother, greatest of all warriors, who never turned his back on battle. He was killed on the field only because of my folly. Ah, my son, this heart of mine is made of stone, since it remains unbroken despite the loss of that magnificent child born of Surya. But what is there for me to do now? I am solely to blame for concealing the birth of my first-born by Surya Deva until it was too late. Parantapa, you and your brothers must undertake every sraddha for the sake of that son of Surya.

Yudhishtira, always do what is agreeable to Draupadi. You must look after Bhimasena and Arjuna and Nakula and Sahadeva, for all the burdens of the Kuru vamsa have now fallen on you, O King. As for me, I will live in the forest with Gandhari, smear my body with dirt and ashes, engage in performing penances and devote myself to the service of my father- and mother-in-law.'

Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, whose passions are restrained, is shaken by what his mother says, as are his brothers. For a while, he cannot say a word in response. Then, composing himself as best he can, though still in the clasp of sorrow and anxiety, the Dharmaraja says to his mother, 'Strange, indeed, is this purpose of yours! It does not become you to do what you intend, and I can never permit you to do this. Ah, mother, you must show us some compassion!

Once, when we were about to go into exile from Hastinapura, gracious mother, it was you who recounted the story of Vidula's instructions to her son, and exhorted us to tread the way of the Kshatriya. It is not right for you to abandon us now. Having slain the kings of the Earth, I have won this sovereignty only after being guided by your fierce words, sent to me through Krishna. Where now is that profound understanding of yours that Krishna so extolled? Do you wish now to fall away from the very Kshatriya dharma that you exhorted us to uphold? Ah, how will you live in the deep and dangerous jungle, after abandoning your sons, this kingdom we won for you, and this daughter-in-law of yours, of great fame? No, you must relent!'

Kunti hears her son, but she does not stop. Now Bhima says to her, 'O Kunti, we have won the kingdom with war, and this is the time for you to enjoy the sovereignty acquired by your sons and discharge your Kshatriya dharma. Why has this unnatural desire possessed your mind at this time, after you made us annihilate the very earth? Why do you now want to renounce everything and go away into the vana? We were born in the forest. Why did you bring us here from the jungle when we were boys? Look at the sons of Madri, overwhelmed with sorrow and grief. Relent, O my most revered and renowned mother, do not leave us now. Remain with us and enjoy the prosperity, justly won in war, which is now Yudhishtira's.'

But Kunti is unshakeable in her resolve, and continues to ignore her sons' entreaties. Draupadi, downcast, accompanied by Subhadra, follows her weeping mother-in-law. Though wise Kunti looks frequently at her children, she does not pause but continues to walk away from the city of elephants. With all their wives and servitors, the Pandavas continue to follow her. Then she restrains her tears and addresses her sons."

CANTO 17

"Kunti says, 'It is even as you say, O Mahabaho, son of Pandu. Lords of the Earth, it is true that I roused you to fight the war. Yes, seeing your kingdom snatched from you by a game of dice, seeing you all fall from happiness, seeing you tyrannized by kinsmen, I instilled courage and valour into your minds. I said what I did so that you, the sons of Pandu, foremost of men, might not lose your reputation and fame. You are all equal to Indra. Your prowess is like that of the very gods. I acted as I did then so that you would not have to live reading others' faces.

I instilled courage into your hearts so that you, the greatest men of dharma, the equal of Vasava, might not again be banished into the forest to live in misery. I instilled courage into your hearts so that this Bhima, strong as ten thousand elephants, whose prowess and manliness are known throughout the world, might not sink into insignificance and ruin. I instilled courage into your hearts so that this Arjuna, born after Bhimasena and in every way Indra's equal, would not fall into misery. I instilled courage into your hearts so that Nakula and Sahadeva, who are always devoted to their elders, would not have to endure hunger and its weakening torments. I did what I had to so that this Panchali of the large eyes and flawless limbs would not have to endure the indignities inflicted on her in the public hall with no hope of being avenged. In plain sight of you all, O Bhima, the reckless Dussasana dragged her to that court while she trembled like a slender plantain tree in a storm—and that, too, during her monthly period, after she had been won at a game of dice as if she were a slave.

I knew everything that had happened, indeed, that the line of Pandu had been vanquished. The Kurus themselves, my father-in-law and others, were distraught when Draupadi cried out piteously like a she-osprey for protection. I fainted when I heard of how the evil Dussasana of low mind had dragged her by her hair. Know beyond any doubt, my sons, I instilled courage into your hearts to awaken and inflame your anger, when I told you what Vidula once endured. I instilled courage into your hearts so that the lineage of Pandu may not forever be lost. The sons and grandsons of one who brings a race to ignominy never attain to the realms of the righteous. Truly, the ancestors of the Kuru vamsa were in danger of losing those regions of felicity that had become theirs.

As for myself, my sons, before any of this I had savoured all the pleasures of sovereignty my husband Pandu enjoyed. I had given bounteous gifts in charity, I had drunk the Soma rasa in yagnas. It was not for my own sake that I sent Vidula's stirring words to you through Krishna; it was for yours. I have no desire for the fruits of the sovereignty that you, my children, have won. Mahabahos, my only wish now is through tapasya to attain to the realms of felicity won by my husband. I mean to waste away this body of mine in the obedient service of my father-in-law and mother-in-law, both of whom have resolved to live in the vana.

Do not follow me any more, Yudhishtira, best of all the kings of the Kuru vamsa, nor you, Bhima, nor you others. Devote your hearts perfectly to dharma, and may your minds always be noble and great.'" Vaisampayana said, "The sinless Pandavas are abashed by the words of Kunti. They stop, as does Panchali, and follow her no longer, though some of the women of the Pandava household continue to utter loud lamentations. The Pandavas then circumambulate Dhritarashtra and duly salute him. Having failed to persuade Pritha to return, they importune her no more.

CANTO 18

Then Dhritarashtra, Ambika's son of great tejas, supporting himself against Gandhari and Vidura, says, 'Let Yudhishtira's mother not come with us any further. What he has said is true. Abandoning this high fortune of her sons, abandoning the fruits of felicity that can be hers, why should she go into the fastness of the forest with us, like one of little intelligence?

She can live in the enjoyment of sovereignty, and still keep her vrata, perform tapasya and continue to give daana. Let her pay heed to my words. Gandhari, I have been deeply gratified with the services rendered to me by this daughter-in-law of mine. Conversant as you are with every dharma, you must command her to return.'

Gandhari, the daughter of Subala, repeats to Kunti what her husband and lord says, and adds her own weighty support to his injunction. But she cannot change Kunti's mind, for that chaste and noble one has irrevocably decided to go to the vana with them. The Kuru women wail helplessly when they see that Kunti is not to be swayed and that the foremost Kurus no longer pursue her. When all the sons of Kunti with their wives and the Kuru women have turned back into the city in their chariots, dismal and stricken, Yudhishtira alone continues to go with the old ones towards the forest, until at last he also turns back.

The city of Hastinapura, with its entire populace of men and women, old and young, is plunged into grief and perplexity. No festival of rejoicing is observed. Afflicted with obdurate sorrow, the Pandavas are sapped of strength and energy. Deserted, as it were, by Kunti, they are like tender calves abandoned by their mother.

Dhritarashtra journeys slowly on until he and his party come to the Bhagirathi and spend that night on her bank, at some remove by now from the city. Brahmanas, all knowers of the Vedas, kindle their sacred fires in an asrama of sannyasis. Surrounded by those foremost of Brahmanas, their sacred fires blazing forth in beauty, Dhritarashtra's own sacred Agni is kindled. Sitting by it, he pours libations onto the fire, as the proper rites and mantras are chanted, and worships the thousand-rayed sun as Surya Deva is on the point of setting.

Then Vidura and Sanjaya make a bed for the aged king, spreading kusa grass on the ground. Near the bed of that mighty Kuru hero they prepare another for Gandhari; and, close to Gandhari's bed of grass, Kunti also gladly lays herself down. Within earshot of the three sleeps Vidura, along with others. The Yajaka Brahmanas and others who have followed the king lay themselves down on their beds of grass. The Brahmanottamas present intone many sacred hymns. The sacrificial fires blaze forth all around, as delightful to them as a Brahmi night.

When dawn breaks, all rise and perform their morning rituals and ablutions. Pouring libations on the sacred fire again, they continue their journey. Their first day's experience of the forest has been weighed down by distress, thinking of the grieving people of the Kuru city and provinces of the kingdom."

Vaisampayana said, “Following the advice of Vidura, the king sets up his abode on the banks of the Bhagirathi, a holy place peopled by followers of dharma. Many are Brahmanas who dwell in those forests, and they, as well as numerous Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras, come to meet the old monarch. Sitting in their midst, he gladdens them all with his words. After duly worshipping the Brahmanas with their disciples, he dismisses them all. As evening comes, Dhritarashtra and Gandhari of great fame both descend to the stream of the Bhagirathi for their purificatory ablutions. Bathing in the sacred river, the old king and queen, along with Vidura and the others, perform their daily sandhya vandana. When Dhritarashtra and Gandhari have finished their ritual baths and prayers, Kunti gently helps them both out of the water. The Yajakas have made a sacrificial altar on the dry bank for the king; devoted to dharma, Dhritarashtra pours libations onto the fire.

From the banks of the Bhagirathi, the aged sovereign, with his followers, all observing stern vratas, with their senses firmly restrained, make their way towards Kurukshetra. Dhritarashtra arrives at the asrama of the Rajarishi Satayupa of profound wisdom and holds discourse with the sage who was once a great king of the Kekayas, O Parantapa. He came to the forest to take sannyasa, having made his kingdom over to his son. Satayupa receives Dhritarashtra with due rites and honour. The two of them then go together to the asrama of Vyasa Muni, the peerless Krishna Dwaipayana, and there Dhritarashtra receives his diksha, his initiation into vanaprastha, the first stage of the spiritual life lived in the forest.

Returning, he begins to live in the hermitage of Satayupa Mahatman, who, at the bidding of Vyasa, instructs Dhritarashtra in all the ways and rites of vanaprastha. In this manner, the high-souled Dhritarashtra sets himself to the practice of tapasya, and all his followers do the same. Queen Gandhari, also, O Janamejaya, along with Kunti, dons valkala and deer-skin garments and sets herself to observing the same vows as her husband. Restraining their senses in thought, word and deed, as well as sight, they begin to practise severe austerities. Soon divested of all stupefaction of mind, Dhritarashtra, bearing matted jata on his head and clad in bark and skins, begins to keep vratas and perform tapasya like a great Rishi, quickly reducing his body to skin and bone as his flesh dries up.

Sanjaya and Vidura of fathomless wisdom, who have plumbed the true interpretation of dharma, wait upon the old king and his wife. Wearing bark and rags, with spirits restrained, Vidura and Sanjaya also attenuate themselves."

Vaisampayana said, “Those great Maharishis, Narada, Parvata and Devala, of austere tapasya, come to see Dhritarashtra. The Island-born Vyasa with all his disciples and other sages of great wisdom crowned with ascetic ascendancy also come, along with the Rajarishi Satayupa of advanced years and great punya. Kunti receives them with due rites, O King, so that all the ascetics are deeply gratified with the worship offered. The great Munis gladden the high-souled Dhritarashtra with discourses on religion and righteousness.

At the conclusion of their conversation, the Devarishi Narada says, ‘There was once a king of the Kekayas, possessed of great prosperity and courage. His name was Sahasrachitya and he was the grandfather of this Satayupa. Resigning his kingdom to his eldest son, who was also endued with a large measure of dharma, the virtuous King Sahasrachitya retired into the forest. After years of blazing tapasya, that Lord of the Earth of great splendour attained to the realm of Purandara, where he lived in the company of the king of the Devas. While visiting Indraloka, O King, on many occasions I saw dwelling there that monarch whose sins had all been consumed by penance.

In the same manner, King Sailalaya, the grandfather of Bhagadatta, attained to Indraloka through the sheer power of his tapasya. There was another king, of the name of Prishadhra, who resembled the wielder of the thunderbolt himself. That king also, through his penances, went from this Bhumi into Swarga. In this very forest, O Dhritarashtra, the Lord of the Earth Purukutsa, the son of Mandhatri, achieved great spiritual felicity, so much so that Narmada, best of rivers, became his consort. After performing rigorous tapasya here, the sovereign of the Earth found Heaven for himself.

There was yet another king, most righteous, of the name of Sasaloman who also attained Swarga after severe austerities in this forest. You too, Dhritarashtra, having come to this vana, through the grace of the Dwaipayana, shall attain to a lofty condition and goal, one most difficult to achieve. At the end of your penances, you will also be endowed with great felicity and, with Gandhari, attain to the realm which those other Mahatman Rajarishis achieved. Pandu now dwells in Indra's world, and your brother constantly thinks of you. He will certainly help you win salvation. Through serving you and Gandhari, this Kunti, possessed of great fame, will be united again with her lord and husband in the other world of untold glory. She is the mother of Yudhishtira, who is the eternal Dharma Deva himself. We see this, O King, with our spiritual insight. Vidura will enter into the high-souled Yudhishtira. Sanjaya also, through dhyana, will rise from this world into Swarga.'

Dhritarashtra, Lord of the Kurus, hearing what Narada says, applauds that immortal Rishi and worships him with unprecedented fervour and honour. The conclave of Brahmanas is filled with great joy and, wanting to please Dhritarashtra, commends Narada Muni's words and worships him with profound reverence.

Then the Rajarishi Satayupa says, 'O resplendent Narada, Holiest One, you have enhanced the bhakti of the Kuru king, of all the people here, and also of myself! But I want to ask you something to do with King Dhritarashtra. O Devamuni worshipped by all the worlds, you well know the truth of all things in heaven and on earth. Endowed with celestial vision, you clearly perceive the diverse paths and goals of men. You have told us of the felicity found by all the kings you named, which is to rejoice in the company of Indra, Lord of the Devas. You have not, however, declared what the realms are that this king Dhritarashtra will attain. Tell me now truly, what manner of domain that will be, and when he will attain to it.'

Thus solicited, Narada of mystic vision, of austere tapasya, speaks in that congregation of noble men, words that gladden them all. He says, 'I went at my will to the mansion of Indra, lord of the Devi Sachi, and there, O Rajarishi, I saw Pandu. A conversation arose regarding this Dhritarashtra and the great tapasya that he performs, and from Sakra's lips I heard that three years yet remain of the mortal lifespan allotted to this king. After that he, along with Gandhari, will go to the world of Kubera, where that King of kings, Lord of the nine treasures, will accord him great honour. Dhritarashtra, his person adorned with celestial ornaments, will go to Kubera's realm in a vimana that flies at his will. He is the son of a great Rishi; he is highly blessed; he has burnt away all his sins through his penances. Blessed with a righteous soul, he will rove at will through the realms of the Devas, the Gandharvas and the Rakshasas. The question you have asked is a mystery of the gods, and I have declared this high and secret truth to you out of the affection I bear you. You are all possessed of the wealth of the Srutis and have consumed all your sins by your tapasya.'

Hearing these words, music to the ears of the Devarishi, all those present are heartened and jubilant. Having brought cheer to Dhritarashtra of great wisdom with their deep and happy tidings, the great Rishis leave his asrama by the pathways traversed by the liberated."

CANTO 21

Vaisampayana said, "The Pandavas, after Dhritarashtra's departure, are afflicted by constant and heavy sorrow on account of their mother Kunti. The citizens and Brahmanas of Hastinapura always speak of the old king. 'How, indeed, will Dhritarashtra, now so old, live in the solitary forest? How will the blessed Gandhari, and Pritha, the daughter of Kuntibhoja, live there? The Rajarishi has always lived in the enjoyment of every comfort. He will surely be miserable in the jungle. We can only wonder what his condition is, that great one of royal birth and life who is, furthermore, bereft of sight.

Difficult is the feat of Kunti, who has separated herself from her sons. Alas that, casting off her royal prerogatives, she chose a life in the wilderness! And in what state is Vidura, always devoted to the service of his elder brother? And how fares the intelligent son of Gavalgani, Sanjaya, ever faithful to the master whose food he has eaten?'

Even the citizens, including the young, gather and frequently discuss all this amongst themselves. The Pandavas find themselves so wracked by anxiety for their mother that they can hardly bear to continue living in Hastinapura. Thinking also of their old uncle, who had lost all his sons, of the pure and noble Gandhari, and of the wise Vidura, the sons of Pandu cannot enjoy peace of mind. Nothing comforts them—neither sovereignty, nor the company of women, nor the study of the scriptures. Despair pierces their souls as they think of the old king and endlessly recall the terrible slaughter of kinsmen on Kurukshetra. Memories of the slaying of the youthful Abhimanyu, of the mighty-armed Karna who never retreated from the bloodiest fray, of the sons of Draupadi, and of all their friends and allies, plunge those Kshatriyas into a perpetual night of the spirit.

They think of how the Earth had been divested of both her glorious heroes and her wealth. Draupadi has lost all her children, and the lovely Subhadra also has become childless. They, too, are sunk in untold sorrow. However, when your grandsires look upon the son of Uttaraa, your father Parikshit, they somehow hold their prana in their bodies."

CANTO 22

Vaisampayana said, “The heroic Pandavas, Purushottamas, delighters of their mother, are so afflicted that they who had once devoted themselves resolutely to their royal duties now withdraw from these entirely. They find no pleasure in anything. If anyone accosts or speaks to them, they do not so much as honour him with a greeting or a reply. Those irresistible Kshatriyas, in wisdom once as profound as the ocean, are now bereft even of their senses by sorrow and consuming anxiety; they can think only of their mother, and how she, now emaciated with privations, serves Dhritarashtra and Gandhari in the vana.

They ask themselves and one another, ‘How does the king, our uncle, whose sons have all been slain and who is without refuge, live alone, with only his wife, in the wild jungle, where beasts of prey roam? How does the blessed Gandhari, whose dear ones have also all been killed, follow her blind lord in the lonely forest?’ Whenever they are together they can speak of nothing else. Finally, they decide that they must go into the wilderness and discover for themselves the answer to the anxiety that harries them constantly.

Sahadeva, bowing to his elder brother Yudhishtira, says, ‘I see that your heart is set upon seeing our uncle. Out of respect for you, I could not too hastily voice my own keen desire to go to the vana. But now the time has come, my lord, if I am fortunate, to see my mother living in sannyasa, with matted locks on her head, practising severe austerities, and, ah, reduced to skin and bone with sleeping on blades of kusa and kasa—she who was raised in great palaces and nurtured amidst every comfort and luxury. Oh, when shall I see my mother who is now toil-worn and surely plunged in piercing misery? Without doubt, the ends of mortals are uncertain and extreme, O Lord of the Bharatas, for Kunti, a princess by birth, now lives in desolation in the forest.'

Hearing the words of Sahadeva, Draupadi addresses Yudhishtira with due honour, 'Ah, my lord! If only I could once again see Queen Pritha—if indeed she is still alive—I would think of my life as not having been lived in vain. Believe this Rajadhiraja, and may your heart take pleasure in the dharma of bestowing on us the high boon of going to the vana and seeing her again. Know, my husband, that all the women of your house have their feet poised to take the first step on this most auspicious journey to see Kunti, Gandhari and my father-in-law.'

At Panchali's words, Yudhishtira summons all the commanders of his forces and says to them, 'Let my army, teeming with chariots and elephants, prepare to march, for I will go into the forest to see my uncle Dhritarashtra.' To those that supervise the concerns of the ladies, the king gives the order: 'Let every manner of conveyance be well equipped, and my thousands of closed palanquins. Let carriages and granaries, wardrobes and treasuries, be prepared and ordered out, and give our best mechanics the command to march. Let men who have charge of our treasuries set forth towards the ascetic retreats on Kurukshetra.

Whoever amongst our citizens and people wishes to see the king is hereby allowed to do so without any restriction. Let him proceed, properly protected. Let cooks and supervisors of kitchens, our entire culinary establishment, and diverse kinds of foods and foodstuffs, be ordered and loaded on carriages and carts. Let it be proclaimed that we will go forth tomorrow. Let there be no delay. Let pavilions and resting houses of diverse kinds be erected on the way.'

Such are the commands of the eldest son of Pandu and his brothers. When morning comes, the king sets out with a large train of women and old men. Emerging from his city, Yudhishtira waits five days for such citizens as might accompany him, and then goes forth towards the forest."

Vaisampayana said. “That foremost one of the Bharata vamsa gives marching orders to his troops, protected by great Kshatriyas led by Arjuna, heroes who resemble the guardians of the universe, the Lokapalas themselves.

Horsemen leap to saddle and caparison their finest and swiftest steeds. Some in the retinue travel on horseback, others in chariots and carriages, golden and splendid as blazing fires. Some advance on the backs of elephants, others on camels. Some walk, those that belong to the class of warriors who fight with tiger-like iron claws. The citizens of Hastinapura and the inhabitants of the provinces, eager to see Dhritarashtra, follow their noble king on various kinds of carts and conveyances.

Riding at the head of the Kuru forces at the Dharmaraja’s command is the Acharya Kripa, of Gautama’s race, that great leader of legions, journeying to see Dhritarashtra in his asrama. Yudhishtira, emperor of the world, the white parasol of sovereignty unfurled over his head, sets out surrounded by a throng of Brahmanas, ring upon ring of chariots around him, and a large band of Sutas and Magadhas and bards hymning his praises. Vrikodara, son of Vayu, rides upon the back of an elephant big as a hill, bearing his great bow and equipped with weapons and war engines of every kind, of both attack and defence. The twin sons of Madri ride two fleet steeds, cased in mail, well protected, and flying proud and colourful banners. Arjuna of mighty tejas, his senses ever controlled, rides on a matchless ratha, bright as the sun and yoked to the strongest and swiftest white horses.

The ladies of the royal household, led by Draupadi, journey in closed litters protected by the guards of the royal antahpura. They shower copious wealth on those following their progress. Resplendent indeed is that vast Kuru host, with its chariots and elephants and horses, echoing with the blare of trumpets, the boom of sea conches and the music of vinas. Slowly, regally, the lords of the Kuru vamsa make their way across the land, resting at will by delightful banks of rivers and lakes. Yuyutsu of mighty tejas, and Yudhishtira's priest Dhaumya remain in Hastinapura, protecting the city and attending to the affairs of the kingdom.

Thus, journeying in slow marches with his contingent, Yudhishtira reaches Kurukshetra, and then, crossing the dark and holy Yamuna, sees finally, at a distance, the asrama of his uncle, the blind Rajarishi Dhritarashtra of deep wisdom. He and all his party feel a surge of joy course through them, as they swiftly enter the heavy jungle, filling it with cries of jubilation."

Vaisampayana said, "The Pandavas alight from their chariots at a remove and walk the rest of the way to Dhritarashtra's asrama, bowing humbly. They are followed on foot by their Kshatriyas and soldiers, the people of the kingdom, and the wives and women of the Kuru lords. The Pandavas arrive at the asrama where plantain trees grow thickly and herds of deer abound. Many ascetics of stern vows, filled with curiosity, come forward to see the sons of Pandu. With tears in his eyes, Yudhishtira ask them, 'Where is my eldest sire, the perpetuator of Kuru's vamsa?'

The sannyasis reply that he has gone to the Yamuna for his ablutions, and to fetch flowers and water for his daily worship. Walking briskly down the path pointed out to them, the Pandavas see their blind uncle and the others from a distance. They quicken their stride in anticipation, and Sahadeva breaks into a run towards Kunti. Clasping his mother's feet, he begins to sob aloud. Tears pour down her cheeks on seeing her most beloved child. She raises Sahadeva up to embrace him, then tells Gandhari of his arrival. Kunti catches sight of Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Arjuna and Nakula and rushes towards them, fairly dragging the sightless Dhritarashtra and Gandhari along with her.

On seeing their mother, the Pandavas fall down on the ground. The mighty Dhritarashtra recognizes them by voice and by touch, as he embraces and comforts them one after another. Shedding tears, those high-souled princes offer the aged king and their own mother all honour and reverence. Then, embraced and consoled by Kunti, the sons of Pandu recover themselves and take up the pots full of river water that their uncle, aunt and mother have been carrying. The wives of those lions among men, the women of the royal household and all the people of the city and the provinces who have come with them, now behold the old king.

Yudhishtira presents them, one after another, individually, to the Dhritarashtra, repeating their names and lineages, and then himself worships his eldest sire with deep reverence. Surrounded by his nephews, their wives and his people, the old king, his unseeing eyes bathed in tears of joy, feels that he is back again in Hastinapura, the city of the elephant. Worshipped by all their daughters-in-law led by Panchali, Dhritarashtra, Gandhari and Kunti are overwhelmed with joy.

Walking now in their loving midst, Dhritarashtra arrives back in his forest asrama, lauded by Siddhas and Charanas and now teeming with crowds of men, like countless stars thronging the sky, all agog to see once again their old king."

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira and his brothers of lotus-petal eyes sit themselves down in the asrama of their uncle Dhritarashtra. Around him sit many hallowed ascetics from diverse realms who have come to the hermitage to catch sight of the broad-chested Pandavas. They say, 'We want to know who amongst these is Yudhishtira, who are Bhima and Arjuna, who the twins, and who is Draupadi of great fame.' The Suta Sanjaya points out the Pandavas to them, naming each one, and Draupadi, as well as the other ladies of the Kuru household.

Sanjaya says, 'This one with the complexion like gold, whose body is like that of a full-grown lion, who has a prominent aquiline nose, and wide and expansive eyes of a coppery hue, is the Kuru king. This one whose tread resembles that of an infuriated elephant, whose complexion is as fair as heated gold, whose body is immense, and whose arms are long and sturdy, is Vrikodara. Behold him well!

The mighty bowman who sits besides him, of darkish complexion and youthful frame, who yet resembles the leader of an elephant herd and walks like a sporting elephant, whose shoulders are as high as those of a lion and whose eyes are as large as the petals of a lotus, is the hero called Arjuna. Those two Purushottamas who sit besides Kunti are the twin sons of Madri, Nakula and Sahadeva, who resemble Vishnu and Mahendra. In this entire world of men, they have no equal in beauty, strength and excellence of conduct.

The dark Devi, who is in her middle years of life, with eyes like lotus-petals and a complexion resembling that of the blue lotus, who looks like a goddess of Swarga, is Krishnaa, the embodiment of the Devi Lakshmi herself. She who sits beside Panchali, with a skin like pure gold, who looks like the rays of the moon formed into a woman's shape, is Subhadra, O Dvijottamas, the sister of that unrivalled hero who wields the Chakra.

This other, as fair as moonbeams, is Ulupi, the daughter of the king of the Nagas and also the wife of Arjuna. The other golden-hued one, whose complexion is like that of madhuka flowers, is the princess Chitrangada. That other one, whose skin is the colour of a bank of dark lotuses, is the wife of Vrikodara and the sister of Jarasandha, lord of hosts, who always challenged Krishna. And here is the daughter of Jarasandha, that great king of Magadha. She who is as fair as champaka blossoms is the wife of Sahadeva, the younger son of Madravati.

This other beautiful one, dark as a blue lotus, she who sits there on the earth, and whose eyes are as long and lustrous as lotus petals, is the wife of Nakula, the elder son of Madravati. This princess whose complexion is like that of molten gold, who sits with her child on her lap, is Uttaraa, the daughter of King Virata. She is the wife of that incomparable hero Abhimanyu, whom Drona and the others slew from their chariots when he fought on foot after his own was shattered. And these women clad in white, whose hair shows not the parted line, are the widows of the slain sons of Dhritarashtra. They are the daughters-in-law of this old king, the wives of his hundred sons, now deprived of both their husbands and children slain by heroic foes.

I have now pointed all of them out to you in proper order. In consequence of their devotion to Brahmanas, their hearts and minds are divested of every deceit and sin, and they are possessed of pure souls.'

Thus does Dhritarashtra of great age, of the Kuru vamsa, meet the sons of his brother Pandu, who was as a god among men. Once the hermits of the vana have left, he enquires after their welfare. The warriors who have come with the Pandavas leave the asrama and sit themselves down a small distance away, after alighting from their rathas and horses.

When all the women, the old men and the children who have come to the forest are seated, the old king addresses them all, making the customary enquiries after their health and well-being."

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Yudhishtira, are you in peace and happiness, with all your brothers and the people of the city and the provinces? Are they that depend on you also happy? Are your ministers and servitors, and all your elders and gurus also happy? Are those that live in your dominions free from fear? Do you follow the ancient and traditional dharma of kings? Is your treasury filled without disregarding the restraints of justice and equity? Do you conduct yourself as you should towards enemies, towards those neutral to you, and towards allies?

Do you care especially for the Brahmanas, always making them the first gifts, as ordained for sacrifices and religious rites? What need I say of the people, and your servants and kinsmen, O King of the Bharatas—are they gratified with your rule? Do you adore the Pitris and the Devas with devotion, O King of kings? Do you worship guests with food and drink, O Bhaarata? Are the Brahmanas in your dominions devoted to their svadharma, the duties of their order, and do they tread the path of dharma?

Do the Kshatriyas and Vaisyas and Sudras within your kingdom, and all your relatives, observe their respective duties? I hope the women, the children and the old among your subjects do not grieve under any distress, and do not have to beg for the necessities of life. Are the royal women of your household duly honoured in your house, O best of men? I hope that, having found you for its king, O Yudhishtira, this race of Rajarishis has not fallen away from fame and glory.'

To the old king, Yudhishtira, profound knower of morality and justice, and well skilled in both deeds and words, replies with some queries of his own, 'Do your peace, your self-restraint, and your tranquillity of heart grow, O King? Is this my mother able to serve you without fatigue and trouble? Will her dwelling in the vana be fruitful, O King? I hope this queen, Gandhari, my eldest mother, who is emaciated with being exposed to cold and wind and with the toil of walking, and who now devotes to herself to severe austerities, no longer gives way to grief for her children of mighty tejas, all of whom were devoted to Kshatriya dharma and were slain honourably on the field of battle. Does she still blame us, sinners as we are, for the slaughter of her sons? Where is Vidura, O king? We do not see him here. I hope this Sanjaya, who also performs tapasya, is at peace and lives in happiness.'

Dhritarashtra says to Yudhishtira, 'My son, Vidura is well. He performs the most austere tapasya deep in the forest, alone, subsisting on air, for he eats no food at all. He is emaciated and his arteries and veins stand out. Sometimes our Brahmanas here catch a glimpse of him in the vana.'

Even as Dhritarashtra speaks, Vidura appears in the distance. He is perfectly naked, all skin and bone, with matted jata on his head and gravel in his mouth. His body is covered with dust and with the pollen of wild flowers. Kshattri is spotted by ascetics who report this to Yudhishtira. Vidura suddenly stops, O King, casting his gaze towards the asrama, in which he sees many visitors. He turns away swiftly and vanishes into the deeper forest. Yudhishtira jumps up and follows him alone. Vidura runs further away, and the Pandava in pursuit often loses sight of him.

He shouts, 'O Vidura, Vidura, I am Yudhishtira, whom you always loved, your favourite!' Crying out repeatedly, he continues to pursue his uncle. Suddenly, in a solitary place in the very heart of the vana, Vidura, wisest of men, stops and leans against a tree. He is macilent beyond belief, barely recognizable as a man, for his individual features have all disappeared through his extreme penance and privations. But Yudhishtira has no doubt who it is that stands before him.

Yudhishtira folds his hand in deep reverence and addresses the wraith-like figure: 'I am Yudhishtira!' Vidura contemplates the king, never moving, plunged in Yoga. Then gazing steadfastly at him, using his mighty yogic powers, Vidura enters the body of Yudhishtira, limb by limb. He unites his life-breaths with those of the king, and his senses with those of the Pandava. Thus the great Vidura enters the body of the Dharmaraja. Vidura continues to lean against the tree, with eyes fixed, and Yudhishtira sees that life has left his attenuated body. At the same time, he himself has become stronger than before and has acquired additional virtues and powers now his own. Pandu's son, the Kuru king, now remembers perfectly his own being before his birth among men.

Yudhishtira has heard of the final Yoga from his grandsire Vyasa, and now he feels impelled to perform the last rites of cremation for the body of Vidura. But then an Asariri speaks to him from above, saying, 'O King, this body that belonged to him called Vidura should not be cremated. In him is your body also. He is the eternal Dharma Deva. O Bhaarata, he will find the realms of felicity known as the Santanika. He kept the dharma of Yatis, and you must not grieve for him at all, Parantapa.'

Yudhishtira the Just returns to the asrama, and relates all that has transpired to Dhritarashtra, the royal son of Vichitravirya, filling all with wonder that old king of great splendour, the Rishis present, Bhimasena and all the others. Dhritarashtra is pleased to hear what happened in the vana. He says to Yudhishtira Dharmaputra, 'It has been said, O King, that one's guest should have that which one takes oneself. Do you now accept from me these gifts of water and roots and fruits.'

Dharma's son replies, 'So be it.' The mighty-armed Pandava king eats and drinks whatever Dhritarashtra gives him. After that, they all make their beds of grass under a tree and sleep peacefully."

CANTO 27

Vaisampayana said, “Thus those heroes pass that night after eating the frugal fare which is the nightly food of Dhritarashtra. Having left their fine beds behind them, the Pandavas lay themselves down on the bare ground beside their mother. Under the auspicious constellations wheeling in the sky in that asrama of righteous Munis, they converse happily on dharma and artha, morality and wealth, sweetening their words with diverse citations from the Srutis.

When dawn breaks, Yudhishtira rises, performs his morning ablutions and prayers, and proceeds to explore the asrama in the company of his brothers. With the women of his household, his servants, and his priest Dhaumya, the king wanders through the length and breadth of that hermitage at the behest of Dhritarashtra. He sees many vedis, sacrificial altars with sacred fires blazing on them, with ascetics seated before them, performing their oblations and poured libations into the fire in honour of the gods. The fragrant smoke of ghrita, clarified butter, curls up from the altars overspread with fruits and roots of the forest and heaped with wildflowers.

Many of the great Rishis who worship at these altars seem to Yudhishtira the very Vedas embodied. There are others, lesser sages and aspirants who belong to the lay brotherhood. Herds of deer graze all round without the least fear, or lie about awake or asleep, as they please. Fruit and roots gathered from the wilderness are stored in piles. Countless birds also sing in the branches of the trees. The asrama resonates with the calls of peacocks, interwoven with the sweet melodies of datyuhas and kokilas and other songbirds and the chant of Vedic mantras being intoned by learned Brahmanas in resonant voices.

King Yudhishtira makes gifts of sacrificial vessels of gold or copper that he has brought with him for those Munis, deer-skins and shawls, ladles made of rich wood, O Bhaarata, kamandalus and elegant wooden platters, and cooking vessels as well. He gives away diverse vessels of iron, and smaller tumblers and cups of various sizes; the ascetics take these away, each one as many as he likes.

Having ranged through the woods across which that great asrama of many hermits is spread, having taken in its peaceful sights and sounds and made his offerings to its resident sages, Yudhishtira Dharmatma returns to the side of his uncle Dhritarashtra. He sees that old Lord of Earth at his ease, with Gandhari beside him after his morning rites. He sees his mother Kunti sitting nearby, like a humble disciple with bent head.

Yudhishtira greets the blind and aged king, declaring his own name to identify himself, and Dhritarashtra asks him to sit down, which the Pandava does on a mat of kusa grass. Then the other sons of Pandu, with Bhima among them, salute the king and touch his feet, and they also sit themselves down with his leave. Surrounded by his nephews, great Dhritarashtra looks glorious and full of unearthly grace; he blazes with a Vedic splendour like Brihaspati in the midst of the Devas.

Now many great Rishis, Satayupa and others, denizens of Kurukshetra, arrive. The illustrious and learned Vyasa, of tremendous tejas, whom even the Devarishis of Swarga revere, appears there at the head of his many disciples. Dhritarashtra, Kunti's son Yudhishtira of great tejas, Bhimasena and the others, all rise and, advancing a few steps, salute those venerable guests. Approaching them, Vyasa, surrounded by Satayupa and others, addresses King Dhritarashtra, 'Be you seated.' The illustrious Vyasa settles himself onto a fine seat of kusa grass set upon a black deer-skin and covered with a silken cloth, which has been kept ready for him. Once the Dwaipayana sits down, the other Dvijottamas, all lustrous ones, also seat themselves with Vyasa's leave."

Vaisampayana said, “When the Pandavas have all been seated, Satyavati’s son Vyasa says, ‘O Dhritarashtra Mahabaho, have you been able to achieve tapasya? Is your mind pleased with living in the vana, O King? Has the grief that was yours, born of the slaughter of your sons in battle, disappeared from your heart? Are all your perceptions now clear, sinless one? Do you practise the ordinances of vanaprastha and sannyasa, after making your heart firm?

Does my daughter-in-law Gandhari allow herself to be overwhelmed by grief? She is possessed of great wisdom. Blessed with clear and lofty intelligence, that queen understands both dharma and artha well; she knows the truths that relate to both prosperity and adversity. Does she still grieve? Does Kunti, who, because of her devotion to the service of her elders, left her children, attend to your wants and serve you with all humility, O King? Have the Dharmaputra, Mahatman Yudhishtira, Bhima and Arjuna and the twins been sufficiently comforted? Do you feel delight at seeing them? Has your mind become free from every stain? Has your disposition, O King, become pure in consequence of your penance and the increase of your knowledge and wisdom?

O Bhaarata, abstention from injury to any creature, truth and freedom from anger, the primary triad of wisdom, is of final concern. Has your life in the forest ceased to be painful for you? Are you able to gather, through your own exertions, the produce of the wilderness for your food? Do your fasts give you any pain now?

Have you learnt, O King, how the great Vidura, who was Dharma's very self, left this world? It was through the ancient curse of Mandavya, that Dharma Deva was born into the world as Vidura. He owned unequalled intelligence and wisdom. Through his mighty tapasya, he was both high-minded and lofty-souled. Why, not even Brihaspati among the Devas, and Sukra among the Asuras, was possessed of such intelligence as that best of men. Dharma Deva was once cursed by the awesome Rishi Mandavya who expended the power of his penances earned over a long time with arduous dedication. At the command of the Pitamaha Bhishma, and through my own tejas, I sowed Vidura in soil owned by Vichitravirya. A God of gods and eternal was your brother, O King. The perceptive knew him to be Dharma Deva incarnate because of his yogic practice. He glows with the growth of truth, self-restraint and tranquillity of heart, compassion and charity. He is always engaged in tapasya, and is eternal.

From that God of Righteousness, through yoga shakti did the Kuru king Yudhishtira also take birth, O King. Yudhishtira is also Dharma Deva of great wisdom and immeasurable intelligence. Dharma exists both here and hereafter, and is like fire or wind or water or earth or space. He is able to go everywhere, O King of kings, and pervades the whole universe. Only the foremost among the deities, and those cleansed of every sin and crowned with ascetic success, can see him with their eyes. He that is Dharma is Vidura; and he that is Vidura is the eldest son of Pandu. You, O King, can perceive that son of Pandu; why, he is before you as your servitor. Through the power of his yoga, your brother the Mahatman Vidura, most intelligent among intelligent men, entered into Yudhishtira.

O Lord of the Bhaarata vamsa, my son, know that I have come here to dispel all your doubts and satisfy your desires. For your sake I will perform some feat that has never been accomplished before by any of the great Rishis, I will demonstrate some wonderful effect of my tapasya. Tell me what you want to see or ask or hear, sinless one, and I will accomplish that for you.'"

PUTRADARSANA PARVA

Janamejaya said, "Tell me, O learned Brahmana, of that wonderful feat that the Maharishi Vyasa of untold tejas performed for Dhritarashtra in the forest asrama where he had taken to living with his wife and his daughter-in-law Kunti—indeed, what the Dwaipayana did, when all the sons of Pandu were staying in that hermitage, after Vidura left his own body and entered into Yudhishtira. How long did the Kuru king Yudhishtira of unfading glory remain there, and with what food, O mighty one, did the noble Pandavas support themselves, with their wives and men? O sinless one, do you tell me this."

Vaisampayana said, "With the permission of Dhritarashtra, the Pandavas, along with their troops and the women of their household, support themselves on diverse kinds of food and drink and pass about a month in great happiness in that forest. Towards the end of that time, Anagha, Vyasa comes there. While all those princes sit around Vyasa, engaged in conversation on a host of subjects, some other great Rishis arrive. Narada and Parvata and Devala of austere penances, and Viswavasu and Tumburu, and Chitrasena come to that forest retreat, O Bhaarata, and Yudhishtira of great tapasya worships them with the proper rituals, with the consent of Dhritarashtra. They sit down on sacred darbhasanas of kusa grass, and on other fine seats of peacock feathers. When they are all seated, the Kuru king also sits himself down amongst them, surrounded by the sons of Pandu. Gandhari and Kunti and Draupadi, and Subhadra of the Sattwata vamsa, and the other royal women.

The conversation that then arises was of a high order, dwelling on dharma and tales of the Rishis of antiquity, the Devas and the Asuras. Then Vyasa of marvellous tejas and eloquence, foremost among all knowers of the Vedas, deeply gratified, says to the blind king, 'I know the desire you cherish in your heart, King of kings, still stricken with grief for your dead sons. I know the sorrow that always dwells in the hearts of Gandhari, of Kunti and of Draupadi, and the searing grief of Krishna's sister Subhadra for her dead son. Hearing of this gathering of the princes and princesses of your royal house, I have come here, Kurunandana, to dispel your fears. Let the Devas and Gandharvas, and all these great Rishis, behold today the power of the tapasya I have performed all these long years. So tell me, O King, what wish of yours shall I grant today? I am powerful enough to grant you a boon, and you shall witness the fruit of my penances!'

At this, Dhritarashtra reflects for a moment and then says, 'Holy One, your favour is providential. My whole life is crowned with success today, and I feel certain that I shall indeed attain to that lofty, blissful end reserved for me, because I have met with all of you greatest, Holy Ones, tapodhanas, the treasury of tapasya, equal to Brahma himself. There is not the least doubt that your coming here before me today has cleansed me of my sins.

Anaghas, I no longer have the least fear about my end in the next world. I love my children deeply and cherish their memory. However, my heart is still tortured by the recollection of the many vile and violent sins perpetrated by my wicked son Duryodhana of evil mind who persecuted the innocent Pandavas. Alas, the sins of Duryodhana have devastated the very Earth, the world as we knew it, with her horses, elephants and fighting men. Countless high-souled kings, rulers of diverse realms, came to side with my son and, doing so, found their deaths. Alas, leaving their beloved sires and wives and finally their very life-breaths, all those Kshatriyas have become guests of Yama.

What end, O Dvija, have those men attained who were slain in the war for the sake of their friend Duryodhana? What end did my sons and grandsons achieve who fell in battle? My heart is always pained at the thought of my having caused the death of the mighty Bhishma, son of Santanu, and of Drona, that best of Brahmanas, through my foolish and sinful son who was a bane to his friends, he who so wanted to rule the earth that he caused the destruction of the very Kuru vamsa, which once blazed with prosperity and truth. Night and day, O my father, I think of all this and, afflicted with grief, I can find no peace of mind.'

When Gandhari hears her husband's outpouring of anguish, her own sorrow grows fresh, as does the pain of Kunti, of Subhadra and Dhritarashtra's daughters-in-law, and of others, men and women of the Kuru vamsa. Queen Gandhari, her eyes bound, folds her hands in supplication to her father-in-law, the Rishi Vyasa. 'O greatest of Munis, sixteen years have passed over the head of this king, grieving for the death of his sons and divested of peace of mind. Tormented by sorrow over the slaughter of his sons, this King Dhritarashtra's breath heaves out in deep gasps, and he seldom sleeps at night.

Maharishi, you can create new worlds through the power of your tapasya. What then need I say about your ability to show this king his children who are in the next world? This Panchali, the daughter of Drupada, has lost all her kinsmen and children, and she grieves ceaselessly. So does Krishna's sister, Subhadra of gentle speech, burning for the loss of her son. This other Devi, respected by all, the wife of Bhurisravas, laments frequently in the most heartrending manner. Her father-in-law was the most intelligent and heroic Bahlika, of Kuru's race, who also perished during the war. Alas, Somadatta was also was slain, along with his sire, in the Great War.

Ah, this son of yours, Dhritarashtra, with all his intelligence and prosperity, lost a hundred princes, heroes all, none of whom ever fled from a battle. The hundred wives of those Kshatriya sons all mourn constantly, stricken by that great slaughter, O mighty Sage, sharpening the grief of both the king and myself. Alas, those heroes of high mettle, those great Maharathas, my father-in-law, Somdatta, and others—O puissant one, what end has been theirs? Through your grace, O Holy One, will this Bhumipala, myself and this Kunti, your daughter-in-law, have our suffering allayed.'

Hearing Gandhari's words, Kunti, her face gaunt and wasted through observing many fierce vratas, thinks of her secretly born son, lustrous as the sun. Vyasa, who can see and hear all, even from a great distance sees Arjuna's mother afflicted with sorrow. Vyasa says to her, 'Tell me, O blessed one, what is in your heart, what you want to say.' Kunti bows her head low to her father-in-law and, overcome with diffidence, discloses to him her secret history.”

"Kunti says, 'Holy One, you are my father-in-law and thus, my God of gods. You are that to me, no less. So hear my words of truth. When I was a young girl, the Rishi Durvasa, known for his wrathful temper, visited my father's house in quest of alms. Although there was much in his behaviour to provoke me, I did not allow myself for a moment to be annoyed by him and served him with care. The sage was greatly pleased with me and decided to grant me a boon. "You must accept the boon I shall now give you," were his words to me. Fearing his curse, I said to him, "Tathaastu, so be it." The Rishi said to me, "Blessed girl of the beautiful face, you will become the mother of Dharma. The Devas you summon will be obedient to your wishes."

Saying this, he vanished from my sight; but the mantra the Rishi gave me dwelt constantly in my mind. One day, sitting in my chamber in the palace I saw the sun rising. Suddenly, I was possessed by a desire to bring before me the maker of day, I remembered the words of Durvasa, and from my innocent girlish curiosity I summoned the god. Surya of a thousand rays instantly appeared before me. He had divided himself in two. One part remained in the firmament, and the other stood embodied on the Earth before me. With one he continued to heat the world and with the other he came to me.

While I trembled at his sight, he said, "Ask a boon of me." Bowing down to him, I asked him to leave me. He replied in wrath, "I cannot countenance the thought of coming to you fruitlessly. I will consume both you and that Brahmana who gave you the mantra as a boon." The Brahmana Durvasa had done no evil and, wanting to protect both him and myself from Surya's curse, I said, "O Deva, let me have a son like you." The god of a thousand rays penetrated me with his tejas, leaving me stunned. He said only, "You will have a son," and was gone back into the firmament.

I continued to live in the inner apartments and, not wanting my father's honour to be tarnished, I consigned to the river my infant son, Karna, born in secret. Through the grace of that god, my virginity was restored, exactly as the Rishi Durvasa had said to me. Although Karna knew me for his mother when he grew up, I made no effort to acknowledge him, fool that I am. This burns me, O Mahamuni, as you well know. Whether I sinned or not, I have told you the truth. Holy One, I beg you, satisfy my craving to see that son of mine. Greatest of sages, sinless Vyasa, let this king also have his wish to see his dead sons fulfilled today.'

Vyasa, foremost of men, says to Kunti, 'Be you blessed, and let your wish be fulfilled. You did not sin in any way. You were restored to virginity, for the Devas have great powers of yoga and can beget offspring by their very thought, by word, by sight, by touch and by sexual union. These are the five ways in which the gods can father children upon mortal women. You are a mortal and there is no fault in what happened to you. Know this, O Kunti, and let your heart be at peace, its fever dispelled.

For those that are great, everything is proper. For those that are great, everything is pure. For those that are great, everything is punya. For those that are great, everything is their own.'"

CANTO 31

"Vyasa says, 'Blessed be you, as well, O Gandhari, this very night you shall see your sons and brothers and friends and kinsmen, along with your sires, see them like men arisen from sleep. Kunti shall see Karna, and Subhadra of the Yadu vamsa will behold her son Abhimanyu. Draupadi shall see her five sons, her dead sire and her brothers also. All this was in my mind even before you asked me. It is for this that I have come here.

You must not grieve for those greatest of men. They met death while observing Kshatriya dharma on Kurukshetra. O faultless Gandhari, the work of the gods had to be accomplished, and it was to achieve those fated ends that those heroes were born into this world. They were all amsas of the Devas, Gandharvas and Apsaras, and Pisachas and Guhyakas and Rakshasas, many other spirits of great sanctity, many souls blessed by great tapasya, Devarishis, Devas and Danavas and other heavenly sages of spotless soul, who met with death on the field of Kurukshetra.

It is known that it was that most lustrous and intelligent king of the Gandharvas, also named Dhritarashtra, who took birth in the world of men as your lord. Know that Pandu of unfading glory, and distinguished above all others, sprang from the Maruts. Kshattri and Yudhishtira are both amsas of Dharma Deva.

Know that Duryodhana was Kali and Sakuni was Dwapara. O lovely Gandhari, know that Dussasana and others were all Rakshasas. Bhimasena of great might, this Parantapa, is from the Lord of the Maruts, Vayu. Know that this Dhananjaya, the son of Pritha, is the ancient Rishi Nara. Krishna is Narayana, and the twins are the Aswins.

Having split his body into two, Surya Deva, foremost of givers of heat, continued to course through the heavens with one portion of himself, while on Earth he dwelt as Karna. He that was born as the son of Arjuna, Abhimanyu who brought joy to all, Subhadra's son who was heir to the kingdom, possessions and glory of the Pandavas, who was slain by six Maharathas combining against him, was none other than the amsa of Soma Deva, the Moon, who also clove himself in two through yogic power.

Dhrishtadyumna, who sprang with Draupadi from the sacrificial fire, was an auspicious portion of Agni Deva, God of Fire. Sikhandin was a Rakshasa. Know that Drona was an amsa of Brihaspati, and that Drona's son is born of a part of Rudra. Ganga's son Bhishma was one of the Vasus who was cursed to a human life.

Thus, O you of great wisdom, the Devas and other immortals were born onto this Bhumi to accomplish a great purpose and, having achieved what they came for, have returned to Swargaloka. Today I will dispel the sorrow that rends all your hearts, the grief that relates to those who are no longer in this world but have departed to the other. Go now, all of you, towards the Bhagirathi, the blessed Devi Ganga. On her banks I will show you all those who were killed on the field of war.'

A roar, as of many lions, arises from those gathered there, and all rush to the sacred Bhagirathi. Dhritarashtra with all his ministers and the Pandavas, as well as all the great Rishis and Gandharvas that have come to the asrama, set out immediately. Arriving at the banks of the Ganga, that sea of men and women find suitable places for themselves. The wise old king, with the Pandavas at his side, finds an appropriate spot, along with the women and the aged of his household. That day passes like a whole year as they wait for the night when they will see the dead Kshatriyas. Finally, the sun reaches the sacred mountain, Astama, in the west, and all those men and women bathe in the sacred river, and perform their sandhya vandana."

Vaisampayana said, "As night falls after the evening prayer and rituals, all approach Vyasa. Dhritarashtra, having cleansed his body and fixed his mind in dhyana, sits there with the Pandavas and the Rishis. At a small remove sit Gandhari and the women of the royal house of Kuru. All the people of Hastinapura and those from the provinces range themselves according to their years. Then does Maharishi Vyasa of mighty tejas bathe in the sacred waters of the Bhagirathi and summon all the dead warriors, those that had fought for the Pandavas and those that had fought for the Kauravas, including great and blessed kings of diverse realms.

A mighty uproar erupts from the waters of the Ganga, one to equal the din of the Kaurava and the Pandava hosts facing each other on Kurukshetra. Rising up out of the river in their thousands, led by Bhishma and Drona, appear all those kings and other great Kshatriyas, along with their troops. Virata and Drupada rise up with their sons and their forces. Draupadi's sons and Abhimanyu, son of Subhadra, and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha, all appear, as do Karna and Duryodhana, and the Maharatha Sakuni, and the other sons of Dhritarashtra, all of great prowess, led by Dussasana. The son of Jarasandha appears, as do Bhagadatta and Jalasandha of terrific energy, and Bhurisravas, and Sala, and Salya, and Vrishasena with his younger brother, Duryodhana's son, Prince Lakshmana, and the son of Dhrishtadyumna, and all the princes of Sikhandin, and Dhrishtaketu, with his younger brother, Achala, Vrishaka and the Rakshasa Alayudha, Bahlika and Somadatta, King Chekitana and others too numerous to name, all arise from the river, resplendent with supernal light.

Every king and warrior wears the armour that he wore on Kurukshetra. They arise from the water in the chariots they rode in the Great War, all of them flying the majestic standards they had flown in battle. Yet their vestments are not of this earth, and their ear-studs and earrings sparkle like droplets of the sun. Free from all animosity and pride are all those great heroes, and divested of wrath and envy. Gandharvas sing their praises, and unearthly bards wait upon them, chanting their deeds. Each one is draped in celestial garlands and attended upon by bands of Apsaras.

And now, through the power of his penances, Maharishi Vyasa, son of Satyavati, bestows the gift of vision upon Dhritarashtra. Blessed already with mystic gyana and great strength, Gandhari of great fame also sees all her sons, along with all those who had been slain in battle. Transfixed with wonder, everyone there witnesses the amazing and inconceivable phenomenon that makes their hair stand on end. The riverbank is transformed into a high carnival of ecstatic men and women. The spectacle is like a painting by a celestial artist. Gazing, through the grace of the sage, at the spirit host of Kshatriyas, Dhritarashtra is filled with jubilation."

Vaisampayana said, "Washed of every sin, exorcised of anger and envy, those great Kshatriyas meet one another in accordance with the high and auspicious ordinances laid down by the great Rishis. All of them are lambent with happiness and look like Devas in Swargaloka, O Rajan. Son meets with father or mother, wives with husbands, brother with brother, and friend with friend.

The jubilant Pandavas meet the mighty bowman Karna, Abhimanyu, son of Subhadra, and the sons of Draupadi. With hearts brimming with joy, the Pandavas approach Karna, O King, and are reconciled with him. Indeed, all those Kshatriyas, O Lord of the Bhaaratas, meet with one another through the grace of Vyasa Muni and are reconciled. Casting off all animosity, they are established in amity and peace.

All those great warriors, the Kauravas and the other kings, their kinsmen and their sons as well, become united with the Pandavas. All that night they pass in great happiness; indeed for the unalloyed joy they feel, those Kshatriyas deem that place to be heaven itself. No grief, no fear, no suspicion, no discontent, no reproach enters that hallowed night. Meeting their slain sires and brothers, husbands and sons, the women cast off all grief amid tides of rapture.

Finally, those heroes and their women, after spending that perfect night together, embrace and take leave of one another, to return to where they had come from. Vyasa dismisses that concourse of dead Kshatriyas and, before the eyes of the living the vast host of warriors, with their chariots and standards, vanishes into the waters of the sacred Bhagirathi. Some of them return to Devaloka, others to Brahmaloka, some to Varuna's world and others to the realm of Kubera. Some among those kings go back to Suryaloka. Among the Rakshasas and Pisachas, some go to the land of the Uttara-Kurus; others depart gracefully in the company of gods. After all those Mahatmans disappear with their chariots, horses and all their followers, the puissant Vyasa, standing in the waters of the sacred river, Vyasa of great dharma and tejas, that benefactor of the Kurus, addresses the Kshatriya widows.

The Sage says, 'Let those among these foremost of women who wish to attain to the realms acquired by their husbands set aside hesitation and at once enter into this holy Bhagirathi.' Hearing this, those eager women, setting their faith in the Muni, immediately seek the blessings and the leave of Dhritarashtra, and plunge into the Ganga. Quickly freed from their human bodies, they go straight to whichever realm their lords have found for themselves, and there those chaste women are reunited with their majestic husbands and now adorned with celestial ornaments, riding in unearthly rathas, and clad in supernal clothes and garlands. Possessed of every virtue, their anxieties dispelled, they have earned unalloyed bliss. On that day Vyasa undertakes the pious duty of granting boons to all the men assembled there, the fruition of the wish that each one cherishes.

People of diverse realms, hearing of this meeting between the hallowed dead and the living, are transported with rapture. The man who listens to this legend of marvel attains everything that he holds dear; indeed, he obtains all felicity and the consummation of his every desire, both here and in the hereafter. The man of gyana and vigyana, foremost among the righteous, who recites this tale for others, acquires great fame in this world and an auspicious terminus in the next, as well as a joyful union with kinsmen, all that he wishes for, and more. Such a man never has to strive painfully for his living, and meets with all sorts of good fortune. Indeed, incalculable are the rewards for one who, with reverence for the Vedas, studies and mindfully recites this Itihasa for others to hear. Those possessed of good conduct, devoted to self-restraint, cleansed of all sins by the gifts they make, endowed with sincerity, having tranquil souls, freed from falsehood and the desire of injuring others, adorned with faith, belief in the scriptures, and intelligence, who listen to this wonderful Parva, surely attain to the highest goal."'

The Sauti says, 'King Janamejaya of great intelligence was gratified by this story of the appearance and occultation of his sires. Filled with delight, he questioned Vaisampayana again on the reappearance of dead men. He asked, "How is it possible for persons whose bodies have been destroyed to reappear in those very forms?"

That highest of regenerate ones, disciple of holy Vyasa, foremost among the eloquent, Vaisampayana of great tejas, answered Janamejaya thus: "This is certain: that no karma is ever destroyed. Human bodies, O King, are born of action, of karma; so also are forms and natures of men. The great primal elements are eternal, being found united with the Lord of all beings. Since they exist with what is eternal, they find no destruction when the temporal parts are destroyed.

Deeds performed without exertion are the truest and the best, and bear real fruit. But the soul, when united with deeds that require exertion for their accomplishment, experiences pleasure and pain, but is never changed by them—even like a mirror that reflects images but remains itself unchanged. The Soul knows no change, decay or death. As long as one's karma is not exhausted, so long does one regard the body to be oneself. The man whose karma has been exhausted, however, knows himself to be other than the body. Diverse existent objects, attaining to a body, combine ephemerally as one entity. To men of knowledge who understand the difference between the body and self, those very objects become eternal.

During the Aswamedha yagna, this Sruti is heard in regard to the slaying of the sacrificial horse: those which are the possessions and characteristics of embodied creatures—their life-breath—continue to exist eternally, even when themselves they are borne away to the next world.

O King, if you wish to hear it from me, I will tell you what is beneficial to you. While engaged in your sacrifices, you have heard of the paths of the Devas. When preparations were made for any sacrifice of yours, the Devas became beneficially inclined towards you. When, indeed, they were thus disposed and came to your sacrifices, they were the attendant lords in the passage, from this world to the next, of the animals that were sacrificed. For this reason the eternal Jivas, by adoring the deities with yagnas, achieve felicity. When the Panchamahabhutas, the five primal elements, are eternal, when the Atman, the Soul, is also eternal, he that is called Purusha is equally so. When such is the truth, one who regards any living creature as disposed to take diverse forms is thought to have an erroneous understanding.

He who indulges in too much grief at separation is foolish. He who sees evil in separation should renounce union. By remaining aloof, one avoids attachments and casts off sorrow, for sorrow in this world is born of attachment and loss. Only one who understands the distinction between body and self, he and no other, is freed from delusion. He that knows the other, the Soul, attains to the highest wisdom and is freed from error.

As regards all creatures, they appear in this world from an invisible state, and once more disappear into invisibility. 'I do not know him. He also does not know me. As regards myself, renunciation is not yet mine.' He that is not possessed of strength enjoys or endures the fruits of all his actions and, in those too, dies. If the act be of the mind, of thought, its consequences are enjoyed or endured mentally; if it be done with the body, its consequences will be enjoyed or endured in the body."

Vaisampayana said, “King Dhritarashtra had never seen his own sons with his blind eyes. Obtaining sight through the grace of the Rishi, O Kurupravira, he beheld for the first time those sons that were so like himself. That foremost of men and kings, the Kuru monarch, had studied the dharma of kings, as well as the Vedas and the Upanishads, and had acquired a certitude of understanding from those sacred sources. Vidura of untold wisdom attained to high success through the power of his penances. Dhritarashtra attained to great success in consequence of having met the Maharishi Vyasa.”

Janamejaya said, “If Vyasa is disposed to grant me a boon, let him in his mercy show me my own sire in that human form which he had, clad as he used to be clad, and as old as he was when he left this world. I may then believe all that you have told me. Such a sight would indeed be most agreeable to me, and I would consider my very life as having been crowned with success. I shall have no further doubts in my heart. O, may Mahamuni grant me this wish.”

Sauti says, ‘No sooner did King Janamejaya express this wish than Vyasa of great power showed his grace and brought forth Parikshit. King Janamejaya saw his royal father, possessed of unearthly beauty, fetched down from Swarga in the same form that he had, and of the very age he was when he left this world. The Mahatman Samika, and his son Sringin, were also brought there. All the counsellors and ministers of the king saw the lustrous ones. Janamejaya then performed the final ablutionary bath for his sacrifice, and rejoiced. He poured the sacred water over his father, even as he caused it to be poured on himself.

Having undergone the avabhrita bath, the king addressed the regenerate Astika, who had sprung from the race of the Yayavaras and was the son of Jaratkaru, “O Astika, this sacrifice of mine is fraught with many wondrous events! I have seen my father with my eyes, and he has dispelled all my sorrow.” Astika said, “O best of the Kuru vamsa, in any sacrifice at which the ancient Rishi, the Island-born Vyasa, that vast reservoir of tapasya, is present, its performer is sure to conquer both worlds. O son of the Pandavas, you have heard a most wonderful Itihasa. The Nagas have been turned to ashes and have followed your sire into the next world. Through your dharma, O King, Takshaka has escaped a painful fate. The Rishis have all been worshipped here.

You have also seen the end attained by your noble father. Having listened to this sin-cleansing history of the Mahabharata, you have acquired immense punya. The sight of your sire has severed the knots in your heart. They that fly upon the wings of Dharma, they that are of pure conduct and sinless disposition, they at sight of whom sins become attenuated—we should all bow down to them.”’

Sauti continues, ‘Having heard this from the Dvijottama, King Janamejaya worshipped the Rishi, repeatedly honouring him in every way. Conversant with his duties, he then asked the Rishi Vaisampayana of unfading glory about what followed Dhritarashtra’s residence in the forest.’

'Janamejaya asked, "Having seen his sons and grandsons with all their friends and followers, what does that ruler of men, Dhritarashtra, do, and Yudhishtira also?"

Vaisampayana said, "After that dazzling vision, Rajarishi Dhritarashtra's grief drops away and he returns to his asrama. He dismisses the common people, and all the great Rishis, who return to their abodes. The Pandavas, with their wives and a small retinue, accompany Dhritarashtra to his asrama. Satyavati's son, whom all of them worship, also comes to the blind king's asrama.

Vyasa says to his son, 'Dhritarashtra Mahabaho, O son of the Kuru vamsa, listen to what I have to say. You have heard varied discourses from Rishis of great knowledge and sacred deeds, men with a wealth of tapasya and the purest, highest lineage, masters of the Vedas and the Vedangas, men of great eloquence, of great piety and years.

Do not set your mind again on sorrow. He that is possessed of wisdom is never agitated by misfortune. You have also listened to the mysteries of the Gods from Narada of celestial form. Through cleaving to Kshatriya dharma, your sons have all attained to the most auspicious goal that is sanctified by living and dying by weapons. You have seen how they are free and live in transcendent happiness.

Now Yudhishtira, with all his brothers and wives and kinsmen, awaits your leave to return to Hastinapura. You must dismiss him and let him go back to his kingdom and rule it. They have been with you in the forest for more than a month, and the throne of sovereignty must always be well guarded, O King. O you of Kuru's race, every kingdom has many foes.'

Thus advised by Vyasa of incomparable energy, Dhritarashtra summons Yudhishtira and says to him, 'My blessings on you, O Ajatashatru! Do you now listen to me, with all your brothers. Through your grace, O king, grief no longer stands in my way. With you here, I am as happy as if I were in our city of the elephant. With you for my protector, wise king, I enjoy all that I could wish for. You have served me as lovingly as a son does his father, and I have not the least trace of dissatisfaction. Go now, O son, for you must not tarry here any longer. Being with you, I have slackened in my penances, although equally I have been able to sustain my body to perform tapasya only through meeting you.

These two mothers of yours, who subsist now upon the fallen leaves of trees, keeping vows similar to mine, will not live long. Through Vyasa's tapasya, as well as through the grace of my meeting you, we have all seen Duryodhana and those who have become denizens of the other world. O Anagha, sinless one, the purpose of my life has been realized, and I now wish to set myself to the practice of the most austere of penances.

You must allow me to do this, and henceforth upon you alone shall rest the obsequial pinda, the fame and achievements, the very race of our ancestors. Mahabaho, do you then depart either tomorrow or this very day. Tarry not, my son. Lord of the Bhaarata vamsa, you have repeatedly heard what the duties are of kings. I do not see what more I can say to you. I no longer have any need of you, O you of great power.'

To the old monarch Yudhishtira replies, 'O you who know every nuance of dharma, it does not become you to cast me off in this way. I am guilty of no fault. Let all my brothers and followers depart, as they like. With steadfast vows, I shall wait upon you and upon these two mothers of mine.' Now Gandhari says to him, 'O son, let it not be so, for the Kuru vamsa is now dependent on you. The pinda, the obsequial cake of my father-in-law, also depends on you. Go now, my son, you have sufficiently honoured and served us. You should do what the king says. Indeed, Yudhishtira, you must obey your father's command.'

Yudhishtira wipes the tears of love that flow from his eyes, and laments, 'Alas, both the king and you, O mother Gandhari of great fame, cast me off, but my heart is bound to you. Filled as I am with grief, how can I leave you? Yet, most righteous queen, I cannot venture to obstruct your tapasya, for there is nothing higher, and it is only through penance that one attains to the Supreme Brahman.

O Queen, my heart no longer turns as of old towards kingdom. My own mind is wholly set upon tapasya now. Most auspicious Devi, the whole world seems empty and hollow to me, and nothing in it gives me pleasure any more. Our kinsmen have been annihilated; our strength is no longer what it was before. The Panchalas have been entirely exterminated; they exist in name only. Mother, Gandhari, I see no one who can renew them and cause them to grow and flourish again. Drona consumed them all on the field of war. And those that remained, his son Aswatthama killed at night.

The Chedis and the Matsyas, who were our friends, no longer exist. Only the tribes of the Vrishnis remain, for Krishna kept them alive. If I have the faintest wish to live, it is only for the sight of the Vrishnis and to acquire punya, and not in the least any more to enjoy artha or kama. I beg you, bless us with your love and grace, for once we leave here we will not see you again. The king will now embark upon the most austere and unbearable tapasya, which will surely take him from us.'

The lord of battle, Mahabaho Sahadeva cries to Yudhishtira, his eyes swimming in tears, 'O Lord of the Bharatas, I cannot leave my mother. You return to our capital quickly. I will remain here and perform tapasya, O mighty one. Even here in this asrama, I will emaciate my body through stern penances, meanwhile serving our uncle and these two mothers of mine, and worshipping at their feet.'

Kunti embraces him and says, 'Go, my son, do not say any more but do as I tell you. Leave this place, all of you, Let peace and happiness be yours, my sons. If you remain here you will surely obstruct our tapasya; bound by my ties of love for you, I will fall away from my vratas. Our time is short, mighty prince.'

Through these and other words of persuasion, Kunti helps Sahadeva and King Yudhishtira regain their composure. The Kuru heroes, best of their vamsa, with their mother's permission and their uncle's, prepare to depart. Yudhishtira says, 'Our hearts are calmed by your auspicious blessings, and we will return to Hastinapura. Indeed, O King, now that we have your leave and your blessing, we will leave this asrama freed from every sin.'

Once more, Rajarishi Dhritarashtra blesses Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, and bids him farewell. The king comforts Bhima, foremost of all men of great strength; Bhima of great buddhi and tejas humbly worships his uncle.

Dhritarashtra embraces Arjuna and the twins fervently and, blessing them repeatedly, directs them also to depart. The brothers worship the feet of Gandhari and receive her blessings also. Their mother Kunti lovingly smells the tops of their heads and dismisses them. The Pandavas circle around Dhritarashtra in pradakshina like calves prevented from drinking at their mothers' teats, their eyes fixed on the blind king.

Led by Draupadi, the royal women of the Kuru household, his daughters-in-law, all worship their father-in-law with rites laid down in the Shastras, and receive his permission to depart. Their mothers-in-law instruct the younger wives and queens in their dharma and Gandhari and Kunti, embracing and blessing each one, bid them go with their husbands.

Now loud shouts are heard from the charioteers and carriage drivers, who order their horses yoked. The air is filled with the neighing of horses, and the grunting of camels. King Yudhishtira, with his wives and troops and all his kinsmen, sets out for Hastinapura."

NARADAGAMANA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, “Two years have passed after the Pandavas’ return, O King, when the Devarishi Narada comes to the city of the elephants, and visits Yudhishtira. The eloquent Dharmaraja duly worships the sage and seats him comfortably. When Narada has rested a while, the Pandava asks him, ‘It is after a long while, Holy One, that you have graced my sabha with your divine presence. Are you at peace and happy, O learned Brahmana? What are the lands through which you have ranged? What shall I do for you? I beg you to tell me, first among all Dvijas and our highest refuge.’ Narada says, ‘Truly, I have not seen you for a long while, and that indeed is why I have come to you from my asrama. I have been to many sacred tirthas, and to the holy Ganga also, O King.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Those dwelling on the banks of the Ganga report that my uncle Dhritarashtra Mahatman is practising the austerest tapasya. Have you seen him there? Is that perpetuator of the Kuru vamsa at peace? Are Gandhari and Pritha, and the Suta’s son Sanjaya also at peace? How, indeed, does my royal sire fare? I am eager to hear this from you, if, Swami, you have seen the king.’

Narada says, ‘Rajan, listen calmly to me as I tell you what I have seen and heard in that asrama. After your return from Kurukshetra, O joy of the Kurus, your sire went away towards Gangadvara. That illustrious king took with him his sacred Agni, Gandhari and his daughter-in-law Kunti, Sanjaya the Suta and all his Yajakas.

Amply possessed of tapodhana, a wealth of penances, your sire set himself to the practice of severe austerities. He held pebbles of stone in his mouth, for his sustenance only breathed air, and abstained altogether from speech. While thus engaged in fierce penance, he was worshipped by all the ascetics in the forest. In six months, the king was reduced to skin and bone, a mere skeleton. Gandhari subsisted on water alone, while Kunti took a little every sixth day. His Yajakas duly worshipped the king's sacred fire, constantly pouring libations of ghrita into it. They did this whether the king saw the rite or not. The king had no fixed habitation; he became a wanderer through those woods. The two queens, as well as Sanjaya, followed him. Sanjaya was their guide always, over flat terrain and uneven land. The faultless Pritha, O King, became the eyes of Gandhari.

One day, that best of kings came to a place on the banks of the Ganga. He bathed in the sacred stream and, finishing his ablutions, turned his face towards his asrama. Suddenly, the wind rose up high, and a ferocious fire broke out, swiftly turning into a conflagration. It began to burn that forest on every side. Herds of animals were consumed all around, as well as the snakes that inhabited that jungle, while herds of wild boar bolted to the nearest marshes, lakes and rivers. When racing flames tore through that forest, and every living creature in it tried to flee on all sides, the emaciated Dhritarashtra found no strength to move from where he sat. Your two mothers, also, both attenuated with the rigours of their tapasya, could not bestir themselves at all to escape the ravening Agni.

Seeing towering flames coming at him from all sides, the old king said calmly to the Suta Sanjaya, that best of all charioteers, "Go, O Sanjaya, and find a place where the fire cannot reach you. As for ourselves, we shall suffer our bodies to be consumed by these flames and attain to the highest goal." Sanjaya said, "My king, such a death, in this fire that is not a sacred one will prove disastrous to you. Yet I do not see any way in which you can escape from this inferno. You must tell me what I should do." The king said again, "This death cannot be a tragedy or a disaster for us, for we left our home of our own will. For sannyasis, water, fire, wind and starvation are praiseworthy means of dying. But you, Sanjaya, must leave us without any delay."

Saying this much to Sanjaya, the king withdrew his mind in dhyana. Facing the east, he sat down with Gandhari and Kunti. Seeing him thus, the wise Sanjaya walked around him in pradakshina saying, "Do you focus yourself in the Atman, mighty one." The son of a Rishi, and himself possessed of great wisdom, the king did so. Restraining all his senses, he sat there still as a post. The blessed Gandhari, and your mother Pritha too, sat in the same attitude. Then was your royal uncle overtaken by the forest fire, and his body turned to ashes. Sanjaya, his loyal minister, escaped the conflagration. I saw him on the banks of the Ganga in the midst of some Rishis. Endowed with great energy and intelligence, he bade them farewell and set out for the mountains of Himavat.

Even thus did the Mahatman Kuru king Dhritarashtra meet with his death, and Gandhari and Kunti, your two mothers. In the course of my wanderings at will, I saw the charred bodies of the king and those two queens, O Bhaarata. Having heard of the end of King Dhritarashtra, many hermits came to that places; none of them grieved in the least for the end that came to the Rajarishi and his queen, as well as your mother. There, O Narottama, I heard all the details of how the king and the two queens had been taken by fire. Son of Pandu, King of kings, you should not grieve for him. Of their own will, and gladly, did the three of them find their end through the flames.'

Hearing how Dhritarashtra left this world, the noble Pandavas all give way to great grief. Lamentation and wailing rends the air from within the inner apartments of the palace, and from the citizens as well. Yudhishtira is like a man struck by lightning. In agony he flings up his arms and cries, 'Ah, fie!' Thinking of his mother, he sobs like a child, as do all his brothers, Bhima the loudest. The women of the royal household also mourn and cry aloud on hearing that Kunti has perished.

All the people grieve upon hearing that the old king who had become childless had been burnt to death so savagely, and that the helpless Gandhari had shared his fate. When the clamour of grief abates somewhat, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja stanches his own tears with all his powers of endurance and manages to speak."

"Yudhishtira says, 'When such a fate overtook that great king, that Mahatman who was performing the most austere tapasya, and despite the fact of his having kinsmen such as ourselves all alive, it seems to me, O regenerate one, that the end of human beings is indeed difficult to predict. Alas, who would have thought that the son of Vichitravirya would be burnt to death in the wilderness!

He had a hundred sons, each endowed with vast prowess and prosperity. Dhritarashtra himself had the strength of ten thousand elephants. Yet he has met his end in a forest fire. He who was once fanned with palm leaves held by the fair hands of beautiful women, was fanned by vultures with their wings after being burnt alive by the wild fire. He who was once roused from sleep every morning by bands of Sutas and Magadhas ended his days, through my sinful deeds, sleeping on the bare ground!

I do not grieve for the great Gandhari who lost all her sons. Observing the same vows as her husband, she has attained to those very realms that have become his. I grieve for my mother Pritha who, abandoning the shining prosperity of her sons, chose to go away into the forest. Fie on this great kingdom and sovereignty of ours, fie on our prowess, fie on the ways of Kshatriyas! Though seemingly alive, we are actually dead.

O greatest of great Brahmanas, the course of Time is truly subtle and inscrutable, when Kunti could leave this kingdom and everything in it, and decide on vanavasa instead. How could she, the mother of Yudhishtira, of Bhima, of Vijaya, be burnt to death like some helpless creature of the jungle! I am staggered when I think of this; I am numb.

Ah, in vain did Arjuna gratify the God of Fire in the Khandava vana. Forgetting the service my brother did to him, that ingrate has burnt to death his benefactor's mother! How could Agni Deva consume Arjuna's mother with his flames? Once, he assumed the guise of a Brahmana and came as a supplicant to Arjuna to help him devour the Khandava vana. Fie on Agni! Fie on the celebrated triumph of the Arjuna's shafts!

Holy One, what happened in the Khandava Prastha seems to me to be doubly horrible since our uncle Dhritarashtra, Lord of the Earth, was not consumed by any sacred fire but by inauspicious flames. How could such a death overtake that Rajarishi of the Kuru vamsa who, after having ruled this entire world, was performing tapasya in the forest? In that great forest there were fires that had been sanctified with holy mantras. Alas, that my sire left this world through being devoured by unholy flames!

Oh, my mind imagines Pritha, my mother, emaciated so that all her veins and arteries show clearly, trembling in fear and crying out at the terrifying approach of the flames, "Yudhishtira! Bhima, save me!" as the fire closed in on her from every side. Alas, that heroic son of Madravati, her darling of all her sons, did not save her either.'

Hearing these lamentations of the king, all present there in the Kuru sabha begin to weep afresh, clasping one another in their grief and sobbing piteously. The five sons of Pandu are so stricken that they resemble living creatures at the time of universal dissolution. The lamentations of the weeping heroes spill out of the capacious chambers of the palace and penetrate the very sky."

CANTO 39

"Narada says, 'The king was not consumed by an unsanctified fire. I was told so in that very place and I say to you, O Bhaarata, such was not the fate of Dhritarashtra. I heard on authority that when the old king of great wisdom began subsisting on just the air he breathed and then entered into the deeper jungle, he abandoned his sacrificial fires after kindling them and performing his sacred rites before them.

The Yajaka Brahmanas he had with him left those sacred fires to burn out in a solitary part of the forest and went away on other errands, O Bharatottama. It was those very sacred fires that were fanned by winds of fate and grew into the general conflagration. This I heard from the ascetics who live on the banks of the Ganga. Dhritarashtra was thus united with his own sacred Agni and met his end on the banks of the Ganga. Sinless one, this is indeed what I was told by the Rishis whom I saw on the banks of the sacred Bhagirathi, O Yudhishtira. Thus it was, Bhumipala, that Dhritarashtra was united with his own sacred fire and attained to the lofty goal that was his. Through the service rendered by her to Dhritarashtra and Gandhari, your mother Kunti, O Lord of men, has also found great success and joy. There is not the slightest doubt about this.

Now, O King of kings, together with your brothers you must perform the tarpana, the rites of water, in their honour. So without delay do what you must towards that end.' Then Yudhishtira, Bhumipala, Purushottama, that bearer of the burdens of the Pandavas, comes out into the open, along with all his brothers as well as the royal women of his household. The people of the city, as well as those of the provinces, out of their fervent loyalty, all join the procession to the banks of the Ganga, each one clad in a single piece of cloth.

There, setting at their head Dhritarashtra's only surviving son, the good Yuyutsu, all those foremost of men enter the holy river and offer oblations of water to the departed Rajarishi. They also offer similar tarpana for Gandhari and Pritha, naming each separately, and their families. Having completed those rites that purify the living, they return but without entering their capital, remain outside Hastinapura. They also despatch a number of trusted Brahmanas, all conversant with the ordinances regarding the cremation of the dead, to Gangadvara where the old king had been consumed by fire. Having first rewarded those men amply, Yudhishtira commands them to accomplish the rites of cremation still awaited by the remains of Dhritarashtra, Gandhari and Kunti.

On the twelfth day, the king, duly purified, performs the sraddhas for his departed kin, which are characterized by gifts given in abundance. In the name and memory of Dhritarashtra, Yudhishtira gives away many gifts of gold and silver, of kine and costly cloths. Uttering next the names of Gandhari and Kunti, the Mahatejasvin king dispenses many splendid gifts in their names. Every man receives whatever he wishes for, and as much of it as he wants. Beds and food, chariots and carriages, jewels and gems and other wealth are given away in profusion. In the name of his two mothers, the king gives a bounty of rathas, fine garments and coverlets, various kinds of food, and female slaves adorned with diverse ornaments. Having made many kinds of gifts in profusion, that Lord of Earth then enters his capital called after the elephant.

The men sent to the banks of the Ganga to cremate the remains of the king and two queens return to the city. They duly honour those remains with garlands and perfumes of many kinds, and then, after the immersion of the ashes, inform Yudhishtira of the accomplishment of their task. Having comforted Yudhishtira Dharmatma, the Devarishi Narada, the eternal itinerant, leaves Hastinapura and resumes his wanderings.

Even thus does King Dhritarashtra leave this world, after passing three years in the forest and ten and five years in the city. Having lost all his sons in battle, he had given many gifts in honour of his kinsmen, relatives, friends, his brethren and own people.

After his uncle's demise, Yudhishtira becomes forlorn and dejected; deprived of so many of his kin, his uncle, his aunt and his mother as well, he somehow finds the strength within himself to bear the burden of sovereignty.

One should listen with rapt attention to this Asramavasa Parva, and having heard it recited, one should feed Brahmanas with havishya, honouring them with perfumes and garlands."

BOOK 16
Mausala Parva

CANTO 1

AUM. Bowing down to Narayana and Nara, foremost of Purushas, and to the Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya!

Vaisampayana said, "When the thirty-sixth year has passed after the Great War, Yudhishtira, joy of the Kurus, sees many strange portents all around him. Winds, dry and strong, loaded with gravel, blow from every side. Flocks of birds wheel in apradakshina, flying in circles from right to left. The great rivers run counter to their flow. The horizon all around seems constantly to be obscured by fog and smoke. Meteors rain down from the sky. The sun's disc, O King, appears at all times obscured with dust. At sunrise, the great luminary of day is shorn of splendour and seems to be crossed by headless human trunks. Around both the sun and the moon ominous rings of light can be seen, of three hues with rough black edges and ashy-red bands.

These and other omens foreshadowing fear and danger, O king, fill the hearts of men with anxiety. Soon after, the Kuru king Yudhishtira hears of the wholesale carnage among the Vrishnis, in consequence of the Rishis' curse. Hearing that only Krishna and Balarama had briefly survived the massacre at which that clan turned on itself, Yudhishtira summons his brothers and takes counsel with them as to what they should do. Assembled together, they are distraught to hear that the Yadavas had met their end through the Brahmanas' rod of chastisement. The Kshatriyas can hardly conceive that Krishna is dead; it is as if the oceans had all dried up. No, they cannot believe that he who wielded the Saranga is dead. But when they hear the tale of the accursed rod of iron, the Pandavas are overwhelmed by grief. They sit speechlessly together in black despair."

Janamejaya said, "O Holy One, how was it that the Andhakas, along with the Vrishnis and those Maharathas, the Bhojas, all perished in the very sight of Krishna?" Vaisampayana replied, "In the thirty-sixth year after the Mahabharata yuddha, calamity overtook the Vrishnis, and fate slew them through the curse of the iron pestle." Janamejaya asked, "Who was it that cursed those incomparable heroes, the Vrishnis, the Andhakas and the Bhojas, to meet with death? O best of Dvijas, tell me all."

Vaisampayana said, "One day, the younger Vrishni heroes, with Sarana among them, see Viswamitra, Kanwa and Narada arrive at Dwaraka. Aggrieved by the rod of punishment wielded by those sages, the young Kshatriyas dress Samba as a woman and take him to the Maharishis, saying, 'This is the wife of Babhru of immeasurable tejas, who wishes for a son. O Munis, can you tell us for certain what this woman will bring forth?'

Hear now, O King, the retort of those great sages with whom these young lions ignorantly trifled. Those Mahamunis, their eyes red with wrath, look at one another and give the unruly pranksters a terrible answer: 'This heir of Krishna, whose name is Samba, will bring forth a fierce iron rod for the destruction of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas! Through that iron rod, you arrogant and cruel ones, intoxicated with pride as you are, you will become the exterminators of your race, leaving just Rama and Janardana. Balarama who wields the halayudha will cast off his body and enter the ocean, while a hunter named Jara will pierce the Mahatman Krishna as he lies on the ground, and he will also leave this world.'

The Rishis then go to Krishna, who in turn summons all the Vrishnis and tells them what has happened. Krishna, who already knows what the end of his vamsa will be, speaks to them quite calmly, saying simply that what is destined to occur will come to pass. Hrishikesa then returns to his palace. The Lord of the universe has no wish to change the course of fate.

The next day, Samba brings forth the iron rod like a huge messenger of death, through which the entire race of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas will perish. The sinister event is reported to King Ugrasena, who in great distress has the rod ground into a fine powder and has his men cast the powder into the sea. Then, at the command of Ahuka, of Krishna, of Rama and of the noble Babhru, it is proclaimed throughout Dwaravati that among all the Vrishnis and the Andhakas no one should make any wine or other intoxicating spirits of any kind, and that whoever did so secretly would be impaled alive with all his kinsmen. Through fear of the king, and knowing that this was the command of Balarama also of unflinching determination, all the people of the ocean city bind themselves to that rule, and abstain from making any wine or spirits."

CANTO 2

Vaisampayana said, "While the Vrishnis and the Andhakas thus seek to avoid impending calamity, the embodied form of Kaala every day wanders through their city and homes. He has the form of a man of terrible and fierce aspect: bald of head, black and tawny of complexion. Sometimes the Vrishnis catch a glimpse of him as he peers into their houses with fearsome eyes.

The mighty bowmen among the Vrishnis shoot thousands of arrows at him, but none can pierce him, for he is Death embodied, the Destroyer of all creatures. Day by day, strong winds blow and many evil omens arise, dreadful forebodings of the extinction of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas. The streets swarm with rats and mice. At night they gnaw away the hair and nails of sleeping men. Earthen pots show cracks or break apart with echoing reports, for no apparent cause. Sarikas chirp ceaselessly, day and night, even within the homes of the Vrishnis. Sarases are heard to imitate the hooting of the owl, O Bhaarata, and goats call like jackals. Many birds appear, summoned by Death, that are pale of feather but have blood-red legs and feet. Pigeons are seen flying everywhere in the houses of the Vrishnis. Cows calve donkeys, and mules bring forth misshapen elephants. Bitches whelp kittens, and mice are born from the mongoose.

As for the Vrishnis themselves, they grow daily more wild and wanton, showing no trace of shame. They flagrantly disregard Brahmanas and the Pitris and Devas. They openly insult and humiliate their elders and preceptors. Rama and Krishna alone continue to conduct themselves with decorum. In Dwaraka, wives deceive their husbands, and husbands their wives. Fires, when lit, cast their flames towards the left. Sometimes they throw out stark blue and vivid red flames.

The sun, whether rising or setting over the city, seems to be surrounded by headless human trunks. In kitchens, dishes of clean, freshly cooked food, when served, are seen infested with worms of all kinds. When Brahmanas, receiving gifts, bless the day or the hour, or when holy men engage in silent recitation of mantras, the rush of countless heavy feet in flight can be heard, but the unnerving stampede can be ascribed to no one.

In the firmament, the constellations frequently appear to collide with the planets, but not a single Yadava can find the stellation of his birth in the sky. When the Panchajanya is blown in their houses, donkeys bray in discordant cacophony from every direction.

Seeing these signs that indicate the perverse course of Time, and seeing that the day of the new moon coincides with the thirteenth and fourteenth lunation, Krishna summons the Yadavas, and says to them, ‘The fourteenth lunation has been made the fifteenth by Rahu once more. It was even such a day as we saw during the time of the great war of the Bharatas. And it seems that it has appeared once more, now for our own destruction.’

Construing the meaning of these omens of Time, Krishna knows that the thirty-sixth year has turned, and that the words Gandhari uttered, burning with grief at the death of her sons and all her kinsmen, are about to come true. The sinister portents are similar to those Yudhishtira saw when the two armies, of the Kauravas and the Pandavas, were arrayed in the vyuhas of battle.

Seeing the omens repeat themselves, Krishna proceeds to catalyze the events that would render Gandhari’s terrible words prophetic. That Parantapa commands the Vrishnis to make a pilgrimage to a holy tirtha. His heralds and messengers proclaim that, at Krishna’s call, the Vrishnis should journey to the coast of the sea to undertake sacred ablutions in the waters of the ocean.”

Vaisampayana said, "During those days of the terrible omens, the Vrishni women dream nightly that a black-skinned woman with gleaming white teeth runs through Dwaraka laughing loudly, enters their homes and snatches away the auspicious threads they wear on their wrists. The men dream that vultures, flying into their houses and holy fire-chambers, rend and gorge themselves on their very bodies. They see their ornaments and parasols, standards and armour all borne off by feral and terrible Rakshasas.

In the very sight of the Vrishnis, the Chakra of Krishna given him by Agni, made of iron with its hub of adamant, suddenly flies up into the sky and vanishes forever. Before the eyes of Krishna's sarathi Daruka, his chariot, bright as the sun and bearing all his weapons, is spirited away by the horses yoked to it, those four great steeds as swift as thought—Saibya, Sugriva, Meghapushpa and Balahaka. Racing across the ocean waves with the splendid ratha behind them, they, too, vanish forever. The two great standards adorning the chariots of Krishna and Balarama, one bearing the emblem of Garuda, the Eagle, and the other that of a Palmyra, banners cherished as sacred by the two, are spirited away by Apsaras who, day and night, call out to the Vrishni and Andhaka heroes to undertake a tirtha-yatra to some place of sacred waters.

Hearing and seeing these and other omens, those foremost of men, the indomitable Vrishni and Andhaka Maharathas, yield to a desire to set out, taking their families with them, on a pilgrimage. They prepare feasts of diverse foods, with meat and wines of every kind. Finally, blazing with splendour, beauty and fierce energy, the Vrishnis and the Andhakas set out from Dwaraka riding their chariots, horses and elephants, accompanied by their troops. With their wives, the Yadavas go forth to sacred Prabhasa, and begin living there, each in their assigned pavilion, all provided with a plenitude of food and drink.

Hearing that they are dwelling in Prabhasa by the sea, Uddhava, wisest of men, master of Yoga, arrives there to bid farewell to his beloved nephew Krishna. With folded hands, Krishna salutes his uncle; seeing the great bhakta bent on leaving the world, and knowing that the end of the Vrishnis is at hand, Krishna feels no inclination to deter him. The Vrishni and Andhaka Maharathas, whose hour has come, watch Uddhava set out on his mahaprayana, his great last journey, lighting the whole sky with his splendour.

The reckless Vrishnis mix wine with the food that had been cooked for high-souled Brahmanas, and feed it to apes and monkeys. Then, at holy Prabhasa, those heroes of fierce tejas begin their high revels, of which drinking without restraint forms the chief feature. The shore echoes with the blare of hundreds of horns and swarms with actors, singers and dancers plying their vocations. In the very sight of Krishna, mighty Rama begins to drink with Kritavarman, Satyaki and Gada, and Babhru joins them. Satyaki Yuyudhana, inebriated with wine, laughs derisively in Kritavarman's face and insults him in the midst of the assembly. He says mockingly, 'What kind of Kshatriya is he who will slay with weapons men locked in the embrace of sleep and, so, already akin to the dead? That is why, O son of Hridika, the Yadavas will never exonerate you for what you did to the Panchala princes.'

Pradyumna, best of Maharathas, approves Satyaki's taunts, showing his contempt for Kritavarman. Incensed, the son of Hridika, affronting Satyaki by pointing at him deliberately with his left hand, retorts, 'You call yourself a Kshatriya! How did you slay the most noble Bhurisravas, who had already lost his arm and had sat down in praya to leave his life?' Hearing this, Krishna himself gives way to anger and glowers at Kritavarman. Then Satyaki tells Krishna what Kritavarman had done to Satrajita in order to take the celebrated Syamantaka from him. Listening to the story, Satyabhama, consumed with rage and anguish, throws herself into her brother Krishna's lap and inflames his anger towards Kritavarman.

Satyaki springs up in rage and shouts, 'I swear by Dharma that I will send Kritavarman after the five sons of Draupadi, and Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandin, all of whom that wretch murdered in their sleep, helped by Drona's son. O slender-waisted Satyabhama, Kritavarman's days and his fame have come to their end!' With these words Satyaki rushes at Kritavarman and, before Krishna's eyes, sloughs off his head with his sword. He then turns on others around him and begins to hack them down. Krishna runs to stop him, but too late, O Rajan; for, possessed by the perverse hour that was upon them, all the Bhojas and Andhakas there converge on Satyaki, son of Sini.

Knowing the nature of the hour that has arrived, Krishna restrains his own anger, even at the sight of all those Kshatriyas rushing at the lone Satyaki from every side. Compelled by fate, mad with drink, they begin to strike Yuyudhana with the very pots from which they had been eating. Seeing Satyaki thus assaulted, Rukmini's son Pradyumna rushes forward to rescue him as he single-handedly engages the Bhojas and the Andhakas The two mighty-armed Vrishni heroes fight bravely and strenuously, but the numbers ranged against them are overwhelming. Both of them are killed in the very sight of Krishna.

Yadunandana Krishna, witnessing the slaughter of his own son and the son of Sini, pulls up a handful of the eraka reeds growing nearby. In his hands that clutch of reeds turns instantly into a bolt of iron, infused with power of a thunderbolt. For those reeds have grown from the powder of the iron rod which Samba brought forth through the Rishis' curse. Cast like astras, those bolts pierce through what no other weapon can penetrate. With it, Krishna slays all who come before him.

The Andhakas and the Bhojas, the Saineyas and the Vrishnis, puppets in the inexorable grasp of Kaala, all pull up blades of those same eraka reeds, until everyone is armed with a vajra in his hands. They fall upon one another, inebriated with wine, and a melee of blood erupts on that sacred shore. Son kills sire, and sire kills son, O Bhaarata. The Kukuras and the Andhakas perish like insects flying into a blazing fire. Not for a moment do any of them consider pausing or fleeing the carnage.

Knowing that the hour of destruction had come, the mighty-armed Krishna stands there, watching, eraka reed in his hand. But on seeing Samba killed before him, along with Charudeshna, Pradyumna and Aniruddha, a terrible rage fills the Avatara; seeing Gada sprawled on the ground, his anger flares up, and then in a moment he is upon his clan; Krishna, wielder of the Saranga, the Sudarshana and the Kaumodaki, slaughters all of them, the Vrishnis and the Andhakas and the rest.

Listen, O King, to what Babhru of mighty tejas, conqueror of hostile towns, and Daruka says then to Krishna, 'Holy One, you have killed multitudes in moments. Let us turn now to where Rama has gone, for we must find him.'" Vaisampayana said, "Daruka, Babhru and Krishna leave that blood-drenched shore and follow Balarama's trail. They soon discover him of infinite tejas, sitting upon the ground in a solitary place, his back against a tree, his gaze turned inward, plunged in dhyana. As soon as they see that Mahatman, Krishna tells Daruka, 'Go to the Kurus, and tell Arjuna that all the Yadavas are dead. Tell him how they perished through the Brahmanas' curse, and let Partha come here quickly.' In a daze, near-senseless at the carnage he has witnessed, Daruka mounts a chariot and rides towards Hastinapura. When he has gone, Krishna turns to Babhru and says, 'Hasten to the women, they need your protection. Let no bandits or thieves be tempted by the ornaments that they wear to do them some injury.'

Still stupefied by wine, but devastated by what he has seen, Babhru goes, after he has sat quietly beside his father for a while. He has not gone far when an eraka reed which has attached itself to a mallet in the hands of a hunter suddenly springs to life and flies at the last of the Yadavas, killing him on the spot. Krishna sees Babhru fall and, turning to his elder brother, says to Balarama, 'Rama, wait here for me. I must go and entrust our women's care into the hands of our kinsmen.'

Entering the city of Dwaravati, Krishna says to his father Vasudeva, 'Do you protect all the women of our house until Arjuna comes. Rama waits for me at the edge of the forest near the sea, and I will meet him today. Today I have beheld the annihilation of the Yadus, even as I saw the carnage of the Kurus thirty-six years ago. I cannot bear to even look at this city of the Yadavas without the Yadus beside me. I will go into the forest and perform tapasya with Rama.' Krishna touches his father's feet with his head, and quickly leaves his presence. A shriek arises from the women and children of his house. Hearing them lament, Krishna returns to them and says, 'Arjuna will come here. That foremost among men will take your grief from you.'

Krishna returns to the forest, where he finds Balarama sitting in the same solitary place. He also sees that Rama has yoked himself in Yoga and, as Krishna watches, a mighty Naga of pristine white issues from Rama's mouth. Leaving the human body which he had inhabited so long, that Mahatman Naga of a thousand heads with shining red eyes, its form as great as a mountain, emerges, and slides its length into the ocean.

The Ocean himself, many celestial Nagas, and many sacred Rivers are all gathered there to receive the Lord Anantasesha with honour. Karkotaka and Vasuki, Takshaka and Prithusravas, Varuna and Kunjara, Misri and Sankha, Kumuda and Pundarika, and the high-souled Naga Dhritarashtra, Hrada and Kratha, Sitikantha of fierce energy, Chakramanda and Atishanda, that foremost of Nagas called Durmukha, Ambarisha and King Varuna himself, O Monarch, are all ranged to welcome him. They come forward to offer Rama arghya and padya, and with diverse rites all worship the mighty Snake of a thousand hoods, Lord of them all.

When his brother has left the world of men, Krishna of divine vision, who entirely knows the end of all things, wanders thoughtfully for some time in that lonely forest. Finally, he of infinite tejas sets himself down on the bare ground at the foot of a tree. Krishna has reflected on all that Gandhari foretold after the war, when she cursed him. He also remembers what Durvasa Muni had said when that Rishi smeared Krishna's body with the remnant of the payasa the sage had eaten in Krishna's home. The greatest of great souls, recalling the annihilation of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, and the previous slaughter of the Kurus, knows that the hour has come for him to leave the world.

He restrains his senses and withdraws his mind in dhyana. Omniscient as he is, and though he is the Paramatman, the Supreme God, Krishna now wishes for death—to dispel every possible doubt about human ends, in order to uphold the three worlds, and also to prove the prophecy of Atri's great son. Yoking himself into the highest Yoga, restraining his senses, mind and speech, Krishna lays himself down upon the earth.

There arrives in the vicinity a fierce hunter, Jara, out on his quest for deer. From some way off, and around the bole of the tree beneath which he has stretched himself, Jara glimpses Krishna lying motionless. Moved irresistibly by destiny, Jara mistakes him for a deer and looses his arrow, piercing Krishna's heel with that fatal shaft. Jara rushes forward to capture his prey and finds instead a lustrous man, clad in yellow robes, rapt in Yoga and endowed with countless arms. Filled with fear at the sin he thinks he has committed, he touches Krishna's feet in contrition. Krishna forgives and comforts his slayer and rises straight into the sky, taking his human body with him, filling the firmament with splendour.

When Krishna enters into Swarga, Indra and the twin Aswins, Rudra and the Adityas, the Vasus and Viswadevas, Munis and Siddhas and many among the greatest Gandharvas, with the Apsaras, come forward to receive him. Greeting and blessing them all, the illustrious Narayana of untold tejas, the Creator and Destroyer of all, that preceptor of Yoga, fills Heaven with his blinding splendour, O King, and, passing on, reaches his own realm.

Krishna then meets the Devas and Devarishis, the Charanas and chief Gandharvas, Siddhas and Sadhyas and Apsaras of unearthly beauty. All of them, bending low, worship the Devadeva, God of gods. The Devas all salute him, O Rajan, and the greatest Munis and Rishis adore him who is the Lord of all. The Gandharvas wait upon him, hymning his praises in their heavenly voices, and Indra also joyfully extols him."

CANTO 5

Vaisampayana said, “Meanwhile, Daruka arrives in Hastinapura and tells those mighty Maharathas, the sons of Pritha, how the Yadavas had slaughtered one another with iron vajras created from the Rishis’ curse. Hearing that the Vrishnis, along with the Bhojas and Andhakas and Kukuras have all been slain, the Pandavas are stricken with anguish.

Then Arjuna, Krishna’s beloved friend, bids his brothers farewell and sets out with Daruka for Dwaraka to meet his uncle—Kunti’s brother, Krishna’s father. He predicts that destruction will soon overtake the world. Arriving with Daruka at Dwaravati, ocean city of the Vrishnis, O puissant King, that Kshatriya hero sees the once-magnificent city looking like a widowed woman. The royal women of that city, who had until then the very Lord of the universe for their protector, were now defenceless. Sixteen thousand of them had been Krishna’s wives and, seeing Arjuna, they set up a loud lament. His eyes well with tears so that he can barely see those beautiful women who have lost the protection of Krishna as well as their sons.

The glorious river that was Dwaraka once had for its water the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, for its fish the noblest horses, for its rafts chariots, for its waves the sound of musical instruments and the rattle of rathas, and for its lakes mansions, palaces and public squares. Gemstones and every manner of jewel were its abundant shining moss. Its walls of adamant were the floating garlands of flowers and its streets and roads were the strong eddies running upon its surface. Rama and Krishna were its two mighty alligators.

Now that river, bereft of all its Vrishni heroes, seems to Arjuna to be the fierce Vaitarani, river of death.

Seeing magical Dwaravati shrivelled and dismal like a lotus flower in winter, and Krishna's many wives plunged in sorrow, Arjuna also breaks down, wailing aloud, and collapses onto the ground, O Rajan. Rukmini and Satyabhama, Satrajita's daughter, fling themselves down beside Dhananjaya, uttering loud cries of grief. Recovering themselves, they raise Arjuna and seat him on a golden throne. The women sit around the Mahatman Kshatriya and grieve with him. The son of Pandu, giving praise to Govinda, soothes and comforts Krishna's widows, then goes to meet his uncle Vasudeva."

CANTO 6

Vaisampayana said, "The Kuru prince sees the Mahatman Anakadundubhi lying on the ground, O Bhaarata, in a fever of grief at the death of his sons. More afflicted than him, Mahabaho Arjuna, his eyes bathed in tears, touches his uncle's feet. The mighty-armed Vasudeva wants to smell his nephew's head in affection, O slayer of foes, but cannot find the strength to do so. The old Mahabaho embraces Arjuna and weeps aloud for his dead sons, brothers, grandsons, daughter's sons and friends.

Vasudeva says, 'Look at me, O Arjuna—I am still alive who will never again see, those Vrishni heroes who subjugated all the kings of the Earth and the Daityas a hundred times. Ah, woe is me, that death is not mine! Through the rashness and wrath of those two heroes who were your dearest sishyas, and whom you held in high regard, O Partha, the Vrishnis have all been destroyed. Those two were considered Atirathas even amongst the greatest Vrishnis; I know how proudly you spoke of them both and how Krishna cherished them—those very Kshatriyas were the main cause for the destruction of the Vrishnis.'

I do not censure the son of Sini or the son of Hridika, O Arjuna. I do not find fault with Akrura or the son of Rukmini. For I have no doubt that the Rishis' curse was the sole cause of the destruction of the Vrishnis. But how could Krishna have remained oblivious of a peril as calamitous as that curse? Krishna, the Lord of the universe, the slayer of Madhu, of Kesin and Kamsa and Chaidya swollen with pride, of Ekalavya, the son of the Nishada king, of the Kalingas, the Magadhas and the Gandharas as well as the king of Kasi—Krishna, who subdued with his prowess so many mighty rulers assembled in the midst of the desert, so many heroes from the East and the South and kings of the mountainous realms!

You, Narada, and the Munis all knew him to be the eternal and sinless Narayana, God of gods, of unfading glory. Alas, even as the all-powerful Vishnu himself, he remained a mute witness to the annihilation of his kinsmen! My son himself must have allowed—why, willed—all this to happen. He was the Lord of the universe. Alas, he did not want to nullify the curse of either Gandhari or the sages, Parantapa, as he so easily could have done!

Before your eyes, Arjuna, Krishna with his tejas revived your stillborn grandson, Parikshit, whom Aswatthama killed with the Brahmasirsa in his mother's womb. Yet your friend chose not to save his own kinsmen. Seeing his sons and grandsons, brothers and friends, all lying dead, he said to me, O chief of Bharata's race, "The end of our vamsa has at last come. Arjuna will come to Dwaravati. Tell him what has happened. I have no doubt that as soon as he hears of the destruction of the Yadus, that hero of great tejas will come to our city. For know, O my father, that I am Arjuna and Arjuna is me. You must do as he says. The son of Pandu will do what is best for our women and children. He will perform your funeral rites. Once Arjuna leaves Dwaravati, she with her walls and edifices will be swallowed by the ocean. As for myself, I will take myself to some sacred place, and there bide my own final hour, with Rama beside me, keeping the strictest vows."

With these words, Hrishikesa of inconceivable prowess left me with the women and children, and went away to some place of which I know nothing. Thinking of the death of those two brothers of yours, Krishna and Rama, and of the terrible end of all my kinsmen, I cannot eat any more and am wasting away with grief. Arjuna, I shall not continue living. It is our good fortune that you and I have met this final time. O Kaunteya, do you accomplish all that Krishna has asked you to. This kingdom, with all these women, and all its wealth, is yours now, O son of Pritha. As for myself, as I have told you, Parantapa, I will certainly forsake my life-breaths, dear as they are.'" Vaisampayana said, "That scorcher of foes, Bibhatsu, his own heart as stricken as Vasudeva's, says to his mother's brother, 'O Matulan, I cannot bear to look at this very Earth when she is bereft of Krishna and my other kinsmen. Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Sahadeva, Nakula and Yagnaseni are all of the same mind. The time has come for the departure of our king also, as it is for the rest of us to leave this world. You are among the most profound knowers of the ways and courses of time. However, Parantapa, I will first convey all the women, the children and aged among the Vrishnis to safety in Indraprastha.'

Arjuna then tells Daruka, 'I must see the main officers of the Vrishni heroes at once.' Grieving for the dead Yadava Maharathas, Arjuna enters the unearthly Sudharma, the great hall of the Yadavas, where they all once sat in such grandeur. When he has taken his place in the great court, the people, including the Brahmanas, and all the ministers of state come and surround him, more dead than alive from sorrow.

Then Partha, more stricken than they are, says to them, fittingly for the occasion, 'I will take with me all of you Vrishnis and Andhakas who remain. The sea will soon engulf this city, and submerge her. Make ready all your chariots and set all your wealth in them. This grandson of Krishna, young Vajra, shall be your king at Sakraprastha. On the seventh day from this, we will set out at sunrise. Make your preparations without delay.' Hearing Pritha's worthy son, all of them hasten their preparations, intent on securing their safety. Arjuna passes that night in Krishna's mansion, alone, overwhelmed with harrowing, benumbing pain.

At the hour of daybreak, Vasudeva of great tejas quits his body through Yoga and attains to the highest goal. Loud lamentation echoes throughout his palace, the sound of women wailing. With hair dishevelled, stripped of their ornaments and flower garlands, they weep aloud, beating their breasts. Those foremost of women, Devaki and Bhadra, Rohini and Madira, throw themselves across the lifeless body of their dead lord. Arjuna directs that Vasudeva's body be carried out on a golden litter borne on the shoulders of his serving men. The people of Dwaraka and those of the provinces follow their beloved ruler. At the head of Vasudeva's funeral procession is carried the white parasol of sovereignty which had been held over him when he concluded his Aswamedha yagna, as well as the sacred fires he had daily worshipped, along with the priests who had once attended them.

The body is followed by his wives, splendidly attired with their royal ornaments, surrounded by their daughters-in-law and thousands of serving women. The last rites are performed in a place often frequented by Vasudeva while he lived. The four wives of Vasudeva, that heroic son of Sura, ascend his funeral pyre and are consumed with the body of their lord. All of them attain to those realms of felicity he has won through his life and his worship. The son of Pandu takes the place of Vasudeva's sons and sets alight the pyre of his uncle and his four wives, heaped with a variety of fragrant wood and perfumed with diverse scented oils. As the fire blazes up with a terrific crackling, the resounding chant of the Samans can be heard even above the wailing of the crowd gathered to witness the cremation. When the pyre has burned down, the young boys of the Vrishni and Andhaka vamsas, led by Vajra and accompanied by the women of the royal household, offer tarpana, oblations of water, to the departed Mahatman who had been the father of the Avatara in this world.

After scrupulously performing the solemn last rites for Vasudeva, O Lord of the Bharatas, Arjuna makes his melancholy way to the place of the Vrishni slaughter. Seeing all around him the bodies lying in the savage attitudes of violent death, the Kuru prince is further convulsed with anguish. However, mastering himself, he does what is required of him; he gathers the ghastly and bloody remains, has them also cremated and orders the last rites to be properly performed for all the slain. The rites are performed and tarpana offered in order of seniority for those heroes slain by thunderbolts that sprang from the eraka reeds by the curse of the Rishis.

At last, Arjuna seeks out the mortal remains of Rama and Krishna, and has these also cremated by men skilled at the task. Thus, after duly and faultlessly performing the sraddha rites for the dead Yadavas, Arjuna mounts his chariot and sets out for Indraprastha on the seventh day after his arrival.

The widows of the Vrishni heroes, wailing aloud, follow the high-souled son of Pandu in carriages and palanquins drawn by bullocks, mules and camels. It is a cavalcade of bleakness and grief. The servants of the Vrishnis, their horsemen and their chariot-mounted guards, too, form part of the procession. At Arjuna's command, all the people of Dwaraka, and of the entire Anarta country, go with that stricken train, now comprising women, children and the aged, devoid of Kshatriya heroes.

Warriors who fought from the backs of elephants like grey hillocks lumber along with common foot soldiers and reserves. The children of the Andhaka and the Vrishni races follow Arjuna in silence. The Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and wealthy Sudras all go forth, keeping before them the sixteen thousand women who had formed Krishna's harem, and Vajra, the grandson of the Avatara who has left both them and the world. The widows of the other heroes of the Bhoja, the Vrishni, and the Andhaka vamsas, lordless now, set out with Arjuna, looking in numbers like a veritable ocean. Pritha's son, that greatest of Maharathas, conqueror of hostile cities, escorts this oceanic crowd of Yadavas, still abounding in wealth.

No sooner have all Dwaraka's people left her walls and set foot on the mainland, than the sea, fathomless home of sharks and crocodiles, swells up in an inexorable tide and floods peerless Dwaraka, with all its vast wealth that her people could not carry away with them. The spectacle spurs the people of Dwaravati to lengthen their stride in fear, crying, 'Ah, ever mysterious is the course of fate!'

Having left Dwaraka, and seen her submerge and vanish forever, Arjuna makes his way by slow marches, frequently stopping in pleasant woods and hills and by refreshing streams so that the Vrishni women can rest. Arriving finally in the country of the five rivers, the mighty Dhananjaya sets up a rich encampment in the midst of a land that abounds with corn and with kine and other animals.

Watching the Yadava party arrive are bands of brigands, the Abhiras, who lurk in the surrounding forest. The bandits do not fail to notice that the women, children and old ones have only Arjuna to protect them, and are seized by temptation. The Abhiras gather in secret conclave in the darkness of the forest and confer, ‘There is just one bowman with them, Arjuna. The other Vrishni soldiers are weaklings and tired, besides. The rest are all old men, women and children.’ As if moved by fate, thousands of these vile men, armed with rough clubs and cudgels, descend in a horde upon the Vrishni concourse. They attack without warning, with murder in their hearts and terrifying leonine roars. Arjuna, who is at one end of the procession, turns swiftly to where the feral Abhiras have attacked the cavalcade.

Smiling, the mighty-armed Kshatriya roars at the brigands, ‘Sinful wretches, forbear if you love your lives, or you will rue this day when I shred your bodies with my arrows.’ Despite his repeated warnings, the wild ones pay him no heed and instead fly at him. Arjuna attempts to string his celestial and indestructible bow, but finds he hardly has the strength to do so. By the time he manages to string Gandiva, the onslaught of the bandits has become furious.

Arjuna then summons his Devastras but they will not come to him. Large as the concourse is, the Abhiras are upon them from every side. Arjuna is deeply shamed at being reduced to a helpless spectator as the Vrishni foot soldiers, elephant-warriors, and rathikas fail to stop the robbers from carrying away the women. Arjuna does his valiant best, but in his very sight, and before the other warriors, many of the royal and most beautiful Vrishni women are roughly dragged away by the coarse felons; others submit to going with the violent raiders.

Supported by the servants of the Vrishnis, Arjuna showers arrows from the Gandiva on the Abhiras and kills many of them. However, all too quickly, his once-inexhaustible quivers are empty. The Kshatriya who was once beyond ordinary human confines now finds himself firmly in the clasp of a dark fate. Despair seizes great Arjuna, and Indra’s son begins to flail wildly at the bandits with his bow.

Those Mlecchas, O Janamejaya, finally retreat, but taking with them many of the most beautiful and distinguished of the Vrishni and Andhaka women. All that Arjuna can do is accept it as the work of destiny. He breathes heavy sighs, brooding on how his astras would no longer appear at his bidding, how the Gandiva would hardly obey him, how his famed twin quivers suddenly fell empty, on the weakness that laid hold of him. At last he ceases all his efforts, admitting to himself that he no longer owned the prowess he once had.

Continuing his journey with those of the Vrishni women that remain, and the wealth that the brigands had failed to plunder, Arjuna arrives in Kurujangala, the land of the Kurus. He establishes in different parts of the country those who remain of the Vrishnis. He establishes Kritavarman's son in the city called Marttikavat, with the women that remain of the Bhoja king. Escorting the rest, with their children and old men and women, the son of Pandu establishes in the city of Indraprastha those who are bereft of all Kshatriya heroes of their own.

Arjuna brings Satyaki's beloved son, the righteous Yuyutsu, with a company of old men and children and women to the banks of the Saraswati and settles them there. The rule of Indraprastha is given to Vajra. The widows of Akrura state their intention of retiring into the forest. Vajra begs of them to desist, but they do not listen to him.

Rukmini, the Princess of Gandhara, Saibya, Haimavati and Queen Jambavati choose to immolate themselves in sati. Satyabhama and Krishna's other wives go into the forest, O King, resolved to set themselves to tapasya. They begin to live on fruits and roots and pass their time in the contemplation of Hari. Going beyond the Himavat, they live in the sacred place called Kalpa.

The men who followed Arjuna from Dwaravati are divided into groups, and bestowed upon Vajra. Having done, his best in the circumstances, Arjuna, his eyes ever bathed in tears, takes himself to the asrama of Krishna Dwaipayana, his grandsire Vyasa. There he sees the Island-born Rishi seated at his ease."

CANTO 8

Vaisampayana said, “As Arjuna enters the asrama of the Rishi of truth, he sees the son of Satyavati seated in a secluded spot. Approaching Vyasa of lofty vratas, knower of dharma, Arjuna declares himself, ‘I am Arjuna,’ and then awaits his pleasure. Satyavati’s son, endued with mighty tapasya and of tranquil soul, welcomes him and says, ‘Please sit down.’

He notices how Partha is beside himself with grief, how his chest heaves with sighs. Vyasa asks him, ‘Have you been sprinkled with water from any person’s nails or hair, or the end of someone’s cloth, or from the mouth of a jar? Have you had improper sexual congress with any woman at the time of her flow? Have you killed a Brahmana? Have you been vanquished in battle? You look like one shorn of all prosperity. I do not know that you have ever been defeated in battle by anyone. Why then, O Bharatottama, this dejected aspect? I ask you to tell me why you are so direly afflicted, if indeed there is no harm in your doing so.’

Arjuna answers, ‘Krishna, he whose complexion was like a newly risen cloud, whose eyes were like a pair of large lotus-petals, has with his brother Rama cast off his body and ascended to Swarga. At Prabhasa, the very race of Vrishnis has perished through thunderbolts that sprang from eraka reeds through the curse of some great Brahmanas. Dreadful has that carnage been, and not a single hero escaped it.

The Kshatriyas of the Bhoja, the Andhaka and the Vrishni vamsas, O Brahmana, all endowed with noble souls, great might and leonine pride, have slaughtered one another in battle. They who had arms like maces of iron, they who could bear the direst strokes of the heaviest clubs and the sharpest arrows, they have all been slain with blades of eraka grass. Ah, Mahamuni, see the perverse course of Time. Full five hundred thousand mighty-armed, invincible warriors have met with death in that encounter. I have no peace, thinking constantly of that carnage of the Yadava warriors of immeasurable tejas, and the death of the illustrious Krishna.

The death of the wielder of Saranga is as incomprehensible to me as the drying up of the ocean, the dislocation of a mountain, the collapse of heaven's vault, or of cooling through fire. Having lost the Vrishni heroes, I do not wish to remain in this world. Yet that is not all. Something further has transpired, even more frightful and painful than this, O you who own the greatest wealth, tapasya. I think ceaselessly of that, and my heart is breaking.

In my very sight, O Tapasvin, thousands of noble Vrishni women were carried away by the Abhiras of the land of the five waters who assailed us. When I took up my bow, I found myself unequal to even stringing it. The strength that was always in my arms vanished clean away. O great Rishi, I summoned my devastras but not one would come to me! And then, my own arrows were depleted and I had not a single shaft left.

Ah, never again will I see that Govinda of immeasurable soul, of four arms, wielding the Sankha, the Chakra and the Gada, clad in yellow robes, his dark complexion and his eyes like lotus-petals. Bereft of my Govinda, what have I to live for, dragging my life on in sorrow? Alas, he who once graced my chariot-head, my reins in his divine hands, his godly form resplendent and mighty before me, consuming all our enemies as we coursed along. Never again will I see him who, through his mystic tejas, consumed all the hostile troops arrayed against us, leaving me to merely strike them down with arrows from the Gandiva. My head spins, O Narottama, I am pierced by grief, and peace has fled far from me.

I do not have the mettle to live on without my heroic Janardana. As soon as I heard that Vishnu had left the Earth, my eyes grew dim and all things disappeared from my sight into a haze. Greatest of great Rishis, I beg you help me! Tell me what is good for me now, for I am now a wanderer with an empty heart, who has lost his kinsmen and his dearest possession.'

Vyasa says, 'The Maharathas, the Vrishni and the Andhaka vamsas, were all consumed by the Brahmanas' curse and have found felicity. O Kurusottama, great Arjuna, it does not become you to grieve at their death.

That which has happened was ordained long ago; it was the destiny of those great Kshatriyas, and it could not have been otherwise. Krishna suffered it to happen, although he could easily have foiled it. Krishna could alter the very course of the universe with all its mobile and unmoving creatures. What then of a curse, even of the greatest Brahmanas?

He who once sat at your chariot head, four-armed and with his discus and mace, through his love for you, was none other the ancient Rishi Narayana. That Mahatman of the large eyes, having lightened the burden of the Earth, cast off his body and has returned to his realm on high. Through you also, O Purushottama, with Bhima to help you, and the twins, has the great task of the gods been accomplished. Best of the Kurus, I regard you and your brothers as crowned with the highest success, for you have indeed accomplished the great purpose of your lives. The time has come for you to leave this world; and this is the course, O mighty one, that is best for you now.

Understanding and prowess and foresight, O Bhaarata, arise when the days of prosperity have not been exhausted and disappear when the hour of adversity comes. Time the root cause, indeed, the seed of the universe, Dhananjaya. It is Time, again, that withdraws everything at its pleasure. Through Time one gains might and through Time loses it. Through Time one becomes a master and rules others, then becomes a servant, at the behest of others.

Your weapons, having achieved success, have departed to the place they came from. They will once again come into your hands when it is time for them to return. And now, truly, the stage has come, O Bhaarata, for all of you to attain to the highest goal. That is what I believe will be best for you all now, O Bhaarata.'

Having heard the words of Tejasvin Vyasa, Partha takes his leave of him and returns to the city named after the elephant. Entering it, the Kshatriya goes to Yudhishtira and tells him whatever transpired in Dwaraka and with the Vrishnis."

The end of Mausala Parva

BOOK 17
Mahaprasthanika Parva

CANTO 1

AUM. Bowing down to Narayana and Nara, foremost of Purushas, and to the Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya!

Janamejaya said, "Hearing Arjuna's account of how the Vrishni and the Andhaka vamsa perished through thunderbolts formed of eraka reeds, and of Krishna's ascension to heaven, what do the Pandavas do?"

Vaisampayana said, "Hearing the particulars of the great slaughter of the Vrishnis, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja sets his heart on leaving the world. He says to Arjuna, 'O wise one, it is Time that cooks every creature in his cauldron. All we have experienced and witnessed has been because of being bound by the meshes of Kaala. You must also understand this.' Arjuna, endorsing his wise brother's view, only cries, 'Ah, Time! Kaala!' Seeing Arjuna's resolution, Bhimasena and the twins also whole-heartedly concur. The Pandavas, resolute on retiring from the world in quest of punya, fetch Yuyutsu before them. Yudhishtira makes the Kuru kingdom over to the son of Dhritarashtra by his Vaisya wife.

Installing on the throne your father Parikshit, in whose name the faithful Yuyutsu would rule until the young king was of age, the eldest Pandava, full of sorrow, says to Subhadra, 'This son of your son will be the king of the Kurus. The survivor of the Yadus, Krishna's grandson Vajra, has also been made a king. Parikshit will rule in Hastinapura and the Yadava prince will rule in Indraprastha. You must protect both of them equally, and never set your heart on the path of adharma.'

Saying this, Yudhishtira the Just, along with his brothers offers solemn tarpana to Krishna of the fathomless soul, as well as to Kunti's brother

Vasudeva, to Rama and all the others. He duly performs the sraddhas of all his departed kinsmen. The king holds a feast to honour the memory of Hari, and naming him repeatedly, plies with every manner of delicacy the Island-born Vyasa, Narada Rishi, Markandeya possessed of the wealth of great tapasya and Yajnavalkya of Bharadvaja's vamsa.

In honour of Krishna, he also gives away to the Dvijottamas many priceless jewels and gemstones, robes and rich garments, villages, horses and chariots, and female slaves by the multitude. He calls together the people of Hastinapura, appoints the wise Kripa to be the Acharya and Guru to Parikshit, and gives the young prince into his care to be his sishya. When this is formally done, Yudhishtira summons all his subjects, the people of Hastinapura as well as those from the provinces, and tells them that he and his brothers intend to retire from the world.

Hearing this, panic and anxiety sweep through the great crowd. "This should never be!" they remonstrate to him. Yudhishtira, profound knower of the changing ways of time, pays their protests no heed and instead persuades them to accept what he has decided is the best and true course for his brothers and himself.

Yudhishtira and his brothers prepare in earnest to achieve the end upon which they have set their hearts: to leave the world. Dharmaputra Yudhishtira casts off his royal ornaments and robes, and puts on austere valkala, rough cloth worn from tree-bark. Bhima, Arjuna and the twins and Draupadi also discard their finery, O King, to don the garb of ascetics. They perform the ordained rituals of initiation and those Purushottamas then quench in water the sacred Agnis they have worshipped daily all these years.

When the royal women of the Kuru household and the people of the city see the Pandavas and Draupadi clad in valkala and smeared with ashes, they begin to weep aloud. They are reminded of another day, many years ago, when the five brothers, and Panchali making a sixth, all roughly clad, left Hastinapura after they lost everything at the game of dice.

However, the sons of Pandu themselves are full of anticipation. No other course is possible for them after the extinction of the Yadavas, and when Yudhishtira has set his heart upon relinquishing the worldly life. The five brothers, with Draupadi, set out on their final journey. As they are leaving, a dog joins their small company, forming its seventh member. And so does Yudhishtira Dharmaraja the Magnificent depart the city of the elephant, at the head of a party of seven. The people and the women of the royal household follow them for some distance. But none venture again to persuade the king to change his mind. Finally, the people of Hastinapura and Anarta turn back.

Kripa and some others of importance stand around Yuyutsu, who will now rule. Ulupi, the daughter of the Naga king, returns to her home in the waters of the Ganga, O Kurusottama, and the princess Chitrangada too sets out for her home, the capital of Manipura. The grandmothers and aunts of Parikshit centre themselves around him.

The Pandava Mahatman and their queen Panchali of great fame observe the prescribed fast and set out with their faces towards the east. Setting themselves on the path of Yoga, those noblest ones traverse numerous countries, rivers and seas, resolved to observe the dharma of vairagya, renunciation. Yudhishtira always walks at the head of the company. Behind him walks Bhima; after Bhima, Arjuna; then come the twins in order of birth; and behind them, O Janamejaya Bharatashreshta, comes Draupadi, first among all women, beautiful with her dark skin and eyes like lotus-petals. Following the Pandava company is the dog.

Walking on, those heroes reach the vicinity of the sea of red waters. Dhananjaya has not yet abandoned his celestial bow, the Gandiva, O king, nor his twin inexhaustible quivers, for he is still compelled by the attachment men have for the possessions they value most.

There on the shore of the western ocean, the Pandavas behold Agni Deva, the God of Fire, barring their way like a hill. Standing before them in his embodied form, the God of seven flames addresses the sons of Pandu: 'Heroic sons of Pandu, know me to be the God of Fire. Yudhishtira Mahabaho, O Bhimasena Parantapa, O Arjuna, and you indomitable twins, hear me! Kurusottamas, with the might of Arjuna and of Narayana himself, I am the god who consumed the Khandava vana. Phalguna can go into the forest only after giving up the noble Gandiva. He no longer has any need for it. The precious Chakra belonging to Krishna Mahatman has disappeared from the world. When the time comes again, it will return into his hands. This Gandiva, greatest of bows, I obtained from Varuna for Partha. Now let him make it over to Varuna himself.'

All Arjuna's brothers urge him to do as the Fire God says. Dhananjaya casts into the waves both the bow and the two inexhaustible quivers and Agni Deva, his task accomplished, vanishes from before their eyes.

Now the sons of Pandu turn their faces to the south and journey in that direction. Along the coast of the salt sea, those princes of the Bhaarata vamsa travel to the south-west, arriving where the wondrous and magnificent city of Dwaravati once stood, now vanished into the ocean deeps. Turning then to the north, those heroes continue their final yatra. Observing Yoga all the while, they intend to make a pilgrimage across the face of the Earth."

CANTO 2

Vaisampayana said, “Immersed in Yoga, their senses restrained, the sons of Pandu journey north until they see majestic Himavat. Crossing the sacred range, they see a vast desert of sand stretch out before them and, beyond, the fabled peak Meru, the foremost mountain of the world.

Rapt in dhyana, they begin to climb the mountain. Suddenly, Draupadi falls away from Yoga, and drops down dead. Bhimasena of matchless strength turns to his brother Yudhishtira Dharmatma in anguish and demands, ‘O Parantapa, never during her life did this princess sin in any way. Tell us why she has now fallen to her death!’

Yudhishtira says, ‘O best of men, though we were all equally her husbands, she always harboured in her heart a partiality for Arjuna. What has happened to her today is the fruit of that bias.’ And without a backward glance Yudhishtira, that taintless man of dharma, continues climbing, his being indrawn, focused in dhyana.

When they have climbed a little further, Sahadeva of great intelligence abruptly falls down, all life extinct. Bhima asks the king, in anguish, ‘Our brother Sahadeva served us all with the utmost humility. Ah, why has Madravati’s son fallen to his death?’ Yudhishtira says, ‘He always felt that none was his equal in intelligence and wisdom. It is for that fault that this Kshatriya has fallen.’ Saying no more, and never so much as glancing back to where his younger brother had fallen, Yudhishtira continues to climb, his surviving brothers and the dog following.

Then the resplendent Nakula, whose love for his kin is immense, himself falls away from dhyana and collapses, lifeless. Bhima turns again to Yudhishtira in despair and cries, ‘Our Nakula was a man of immaculate dharma. He always obeyed us without a murmur or question. No man alive was as handsome as he. And now he has also fallen by the way and is dead. Why, Yudhishtira?’

Yudhishtira says calmly, ‘Nakula was indeed of righteous soul and the best among all men of intelligence. Yet he, too, had a grave flaw, for he believed he was superior to all in physical beauty. It is for his vanity that Nakula has fallen to his death. Know this well, Vrikodara. Whatever has been ordained for a man, O Kshatriya, that he must inexorably endure.’And Yudhishtira continues his climb.

Next falls Pandu’s son Swetavahana, Arjuna of the white steeds, his heart giving way completely to grief. When that invincible Parantapa, foremost of men, with the energy of Sakra, is on the point on death, Bhima asks Yudhishtira, ‘I do not remember a single lie ever having been spoken by this Mahatman. Not even in jest did he ever utter a falsehood. What, then, is the evil whose consequence this is?’

Yudhishtira replies, ‘Arjuna boasted that he would consume all our enemies in a single day but he did not accomplish what he said. He was proud of his archery and disdained all other masters of the bow. Hence he has fallen. One who wishes for felicity should not indulge in such hubris.’

Saying this, Yudhishtira continues to climb the mountain. All at once the mighty Bhima too falls down. As he feels life ebbing away, he asks Yudhishtira the Just, ‘O my king, look, I, who was ever your darling, have fallen too. Tell me if you know why,’ Yudhishtira says, ‘You frequently boasted of your strength, and you were gluttonous, never attending to others around you. It is for that, O Bhima, that you have fallen.’

Saying no more, Yudhishtira walks on without looking back. Now he has only one companion, the dog I have often mentioned to you, still following at his heels.”

CANTO 3

Vaisampayana said, "When Yudhishtira has gone a little further, earth and sky suddenly resound with a loud noise. Indra descends from his vimana and invites Yudhishtira to climb into it. Yudhishtira Dharmaraja says to the god of a thousand eyes, 'My brothers have all fallen on the way here. They must go with me. Without them I do not wish to enter Swargaloka, O Lord of all the Devas. The delicate Panchali, who deserves ever comfort, should go with us, O Purandara. It is fitting for you to allow this.'

Indra says, 'You will see your brothers in Devaloka, for they have got there before you. Verily, you shall see all of them there, with Draupadi. Do not yield to grief, O King of the Bharatas. Having cast off their human bodies, they have gone to my realm. As for you, it has been ordained that for your taintless dharma you will enter Swarga in your own body.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O Lord of Past and Present, this dog is devoted to me. He must come with me, for my heart is full of tenderness for him.' Indra replies, 'You have won today the felicity of Swarga, O King—immortality and a condition equal to mine, prosperity extending in all directions, and lofty success. Leave behind this dog; there will be no cruelty in that, I assure you.' Yudhishtira says, 'O you of a thousand eyes, of righteous conduct, it is difficult for me to abandon dharma. I do not desire that prosperity for which I must forsake one devoted to me.' Indra says, 'There is no place in Swarga for people with dogs, and the Krodhavasas take away all the punya of such people. Reflect on this, O Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, and leave the animal. There is no cruelty in that.'

Yudhishtira says, 'It has been said that it is infinitely sinful to abandon one who is devoted—equal to the sin of killing a Brahmana. Hence, O great Indra, I shall not abandon this dog today, certainly not from wanting for myself the happiness of Swarga. I have always sworn never to forsake anyone who is devoted to me, who seeks my protection from destitution, anyone in distress, or who is frightened, or weak and helpless, anyone who comes to me to save his life, or, indeed anyone who comes to me for refuge. And I will never break this vow as long as I live.'

Indra says, 'Whatever gifts are made, or sacrifices spread out, or libations poured on the sacred fire, if they are so much as seen by a dog, are taken by the Krodhavasas. It is imperative for you, therefore, to abandon this dog. By doing so you will attain Devaloka, the realm of the gods. Having abandoned your brothers and Panchali, O Kshatriya, you have acquired a realm of great felicity through your own deeds. Why are you so confused? You have renounced everything; why not, then, this dog?'

Yudhishtira says, 'It is well known in all the worlds that with the dead there is neither friendship nor enmity. When my brothers and Draupadi died, I could not revive them. Hence it was that I abandoned them. I never forsook them as long as they were alive. To affright one that has sought protection, to kill a woman, to steal what belongs to a Brahmana, and to injure a friend—each of these four, O Sakra, I believe to be equal to forsaking one that is devoted.'

At these words of Yudhishtira the Just, the dog stands transformed and refulgent: it is Dharma Deva himself. The God of Truth says to him in sweet tones of approval, 'You are well-born indeed, O King of kings, and truly possess the intelligence and uprightness of Pandu. You have compassion for all creatures, O Bhaarata, of which this is a bright example. Once I tested you in Dwaita vana, O son, beside a lake where your brothers of great prowess seemed to lie dead before you. When I offered to revive one of your brothers, you passed over Bhima and Arjuna and asked for Nakula's life instead, saying than if he lived at least one of Madri's sons would be preserved.

But today you have surpassed yourself, Yudhishtira; you have renounced the chariot of the celestials and Swarga itself for the sake of a devoted dog! O king, there is no one in Heaven that is your equal. Hence, O Bhaarata, all the realms of inexhaustible felicity will be yours. You have won them, O Kurusottama, and beyond all doubt yours will be a most divine and transcendent reward.'

Dharma and Indra, the Maruts, and the Aswins, other deities and the Devarishis now make Yudhishtira climb into Indra's vimana. The Gods and other divine ones can go anywhere in the three realms at will in their own vimanas. Yudhishtira, perpetuator of Kuru's race, flies to Devaloka in Indra's chariot in a blaze of splendour.

Now Narada, most eloquent of all Devarishis, of fathomless tapasya, knower of all the worlds, says in that gathering of gods in Swarga, 'Yudhishtira has surpassed all the Rajarishis of old who are here in Devaloka, even the greatest of them, by his conduct and achievement. He has covered the worlds with his fame and splendour and by his wealth of immaculate dharma, and that is how he alone has attained to Swarga in his human body. None else besides this son of Pandu has ever achieved this.'

Hearing Narada's praise, the Dharmatma salutes all the Devas and Rajarishis and says simply, 'Wherever my brothers are, happy or miserable, I have but one wish, my lords, to go straight to them. I have no desire to go anywhere else, O great ones.'

Indra, king of the Devas, says to Yudhishtira, 'Do you, O King of kings, live in this blissful place, won through your peerless dharma and noble deeds. Why do you still cherish human affections? You have attained to a great reward, the like of which no other man ever has. Your brothers, O delighter of the Kurus, have also won regions of felicity. Yet, human affections and attachments still trammel you. This is Swarga. Behold these celestial Rishis and Siddhas who have attained to the world of the Devas.'

Wise Yudhishtira answers the Deva king, saying again, 'O Conqueror of Daityas, I do not aspire to dwell anywhere separated from my brothers. I want to go where they have gone. I want to go to where that best of women has gone, my statuesque dark Draupadi of great wisdom and virtue.'"

Swargarohanika Parva

AUM. Bowing down to Narayana and Nara, foremost of Purushas, and to the Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya! Janamejaya said, “Having reached Swarga, what realms did my grandsires, the Pandavas and the sons of Dhritarashtra, attain? I am eager to hear this. You know all things, having been taught by the great Rishi Vyasa of marvellous accomplishments.”

Vaisampayana said, “Listen to what your grandsires, Yudhishtira and others, did after attaining the realm of the Gods. Arriving in Devaloka, in Indra’s resplendent sabha, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja sees, seated upon a majestic throne, Duryodhana, wearing all the signs of glory belonging to Kshatriya heroes, blazing with effulgence like the sun, amidst many deities of lustrous splendour and Sadhyas of righteous deeds.

Seeing Duryodhana thus glorified, rage fills Yudhishtira and he turns his face away, saying, ‘I have no wish to share the realms of felicity with Duryodhana, stained as he was by greed and bereft of foresight. It was on his account that friends and kinsmen from across the world were slaughtered by us, upon whom he inflicted untold suffering in the wilderness. It was because of him that our wife, the princess of Panchala, Draupadi of unsullied aspect, was dragged into the midst of the Kuru sabha before all our elders. Devas, I have no wish to even look at Suyodhana. I want to go where my brothers are.’

Narada, smiling, said to him, ‘It should not be thus, O King of kings. In Swargaloka, all enmities cease. O Mahabaho Yudhishtira, do not speak so about King Duryodhana. Listen to me. Here sits your cousin Suyodhana. He is worshipped with the gods by all those men of dharma and the greatest kings of yore who are now denizens of Heaven. By having his body poured as a libation into the fire of war, he has attained the end found by Kshatriyas who die in battle. It is true that you and your brothers, veritable gods on earth, were ceaselessly persecuted by him. Yet, through his observance of Kshatriya dharma, he has attained this divine realm. This Bhumipala was never once afraid during the dreadful war fraught with terror.

My son, you should not harbour in your heart the trials and griefs you endured on account of the game of dice. It does not become you to remember the afflictions of Draupadi; it does not become you to recall the other woes that were yours in consequence of what your kinsmen did, either in the deep forest or in battle. Go and meet Suyodhana in accord with the canons of courtesy. This is Swarga, O Lord of men. There can be no enmities here.'

Though Narada has spoken thus to him, Yudhishtira, Mahabuddhi, still demands to know, 'If these celestial regions be reserved for Duryodhana, the sinner who destroyed his friends and laid waste the world, with all her horses and elephants and men, the devil who burned us with wrath and so turned our hearts to horrible revenge, I want to see the place which my brothers have attained, those great souls of firm vratas, who always kept their word, who were truthful and honest and distinguished for their valour.

Tell me where I can find Karna, noblest of men, the son of Kunti, whom no one could vanquish in battle, Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki, the sons of Dhrishtadyumna and all the other Kshatriyas who died while observing Kshatriya dharma. Where are those Lords of Earth, O Brahmana? I do not see them here, O Narada. I want to see Virata and Drupada and the other great Kshatriyas led by Dhrishtaketu. I want to see the Panchala prince Sikhandi, the sons of Draupadi, and Abhimanyu, the irresistible warrior.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You gods, I see neither Radha's son of immeasurable prowess here, nor my other great brothers, nor Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, those Maharathas who also poured their bodies as libations on the fire of battle, those kings and princes who met with death for my sake in war. Where are those tameless and fierce heroes who were like tigers in strength? Have those best of men acquired this divine world? Only if they have, O Devas, shall I dwell here with them. If those kings among men have not attained this auspicious and eternal realm, then know, you Gods, that without those brothers, friends and kinsmen of mine, I will not remain here.

While I performed the water rites after the war, I heard my mother's bidding, "Do you offer tarpana to Karna, for he was your brother." Ever since I heard those words, grief consumes me—ah, it burns my very soul. It pierces me incessantly that when I noticed how Karna's feet were so like the feet of Kunti, I did not immediately understand who he was and surrender myself to his command, my older brother of immeasurable soul, that Parantapa without equal. If Karna and we had stood together, not even the hosts of Indra could have vanquished us in battle. Wherever that son of Surya is, I want to see him! Alas, that I did not know he was our brother and had Arjuna kill him, for it was him I feared above every other enemy on the field.

And my Bhima, of terrible prowess, dearer to me than my life-breaths, Arjuna, too, who was like Indra himself, the twins who resembled Yama in person on the field—I must see them all. I yearn to see our queen, the Princess of Panchala, who was always as righteous as she was beautiful above every other woman. I have no wish to remain here, for I tell you truly, O greatest of gods, what is any Swarga to me if I am without my brothers? Why, this for me is no heaven at all.'

The lustrous Devas say, 'If you so long to be there, then go to your brothers, O son, without delay. At the command of Indra, we are ready to do as you ask.' The Gods command the Devaduta, the messenger of Swarga, 'Take Yudhishtira to his friends and kinsmen.' They two set out together, the royal son of Kunti and the celestial messenger, for the place where they are whom Yudhishtira wants to see.

The messenger walks ahead, with Yudhishtira following. Soon the path they tread grows sinister and inauspicious, surely a passage trodden by sinners. Mantled in heavy darkness, it has human hair and moss for its grass. A stench of decay hangs heavy; both sides of the trail are mired with raw flesh and blood and abound with vermin—stinging gnats, flies and hornets, while fearsome bears stalk the awful passage.

Rotting corpses, bones and hair lie all around them, swarming with worms and insects. Pits of fire fringe the pathway. Crows, vultures and other dreadful birds with beaks of iron, fly and wheel on every side, and evil spirits, Pisachas with long mouths pointed like needles, Over the scene loom mountains swathed in gloom, lofty as the Vindhyas. Human corpses are strewn everywhere, smeared with fat and blood, dismembered, with raw wounds where flesh has been savagely cut away from their arms and thighs, or with entrails torn out.

Along that path rank with the stench of rotting corpses, and hideous with countless horrors, walks the Dharmaraja, his spirit plunged in darkness, his mind in a frenzy. He sees a river full of boiling water, impossible to cross, and a forest of trees whose leaves are sharp swords and razors. He sees deserts of smoking hot sand, and rocks and stones of iron. Great cauldrons of iron stand around, all full of boiling oil, and Kuta-salmalika trees with thorns like thick needles, excruciating to the touch. All around him, Kunti's son sees sinners being savagely tortured. Oppressed by the foulness of the vile place, Yudhishtira asks the Devaduta, his guide, 'How far are we to go along this path? You must tell me where my brothers are. And tell me also, which realm of the gods this can be.' The messenger stops and says, 'The denizens of Swarga commanded me to stop in this very place, for thus far is your way. If you are tired, O King of kings, you may return with me.'

Yudhishtira is benumbed by the horrors and stench of this monstrous place and turns back, resolved to retrace his footsteps. But at that very moment he hears heart-rending lamentations all around him, piteous cries from the darkness.

'O Dharmaputra, O Rajarishi, O you of sacred origins! O son of Pandu, be merciful to us and remain here for a few moments.'

'At your coming, invincible one, a delightful breeze has begun to blow, bearing the fragrance of your person and bringing us some relief.'

'O greatest of kings, seeing you is balm to our tormented spirits.'

'O son of Pritha, let our comfort last a few moments longer. Ah, we beg you, stay, O Bhaarata, for even a short while.'

'As long as you are here, our suffering is assuaged and we find some solace.'

Hearing all around him those voices of souls in agony, the compassionate Yudhishtira is deeply moved and exclaims, 'Alas for their anguish!' The king stands still. It seems to the Pandava that the voices which call out to him in such desolation are familiar, although he cannot yet distinguish them. Dharma's son calls out, 'Who are you? And why are you here?'

They answer him from everywhere:

'I am Karna!'

'I am Bhima!'

'I am Arjuna!'

'I am Nakula!'

'I am Sahadeva!'

'I am Dhrishtadyumna!'

'I am Panchali!'

'We are the sons of Draupadi!'

Even thus, O King, do those voices call back to Yudhishtira.

Yudhishtira cries out to himself, 'Ah, what perverse destiny is this! What are the sins of these pure and noblest ones, Karna and the sons of Draupadi, and the slender-waisted Princess of Panchala, that they have been cast into this foetid and gruesome hell!

I cannot think of any sins that these souls of dharma have committed that would consign them to this stinking, loathsome pit. And what noble deed did Dhritarashtra's son Suyodhana, and all his wretched adherents do, that he has been invested with such grace and prosperity? Why, he, unabashed sinner, is being adored like a god in Indra's glorious sabha, while these truly deserving ones find themselves in hell.

My brothers were heroes, devoted to the truth and to the Vedas; they never violated Kshatriya dharma; they were unfailingly righteous in everything they did. Each one performed sacrifices and gave generously to Brahmanas throughout their lives. Ah, this cannot be! Am I asleep or awake? Am I conscious or is all of this a delusion of my fevered mind?'

In turmoil, overwhelmed by woe, Yudhishtira is immersed for a long time in these sombre reflections. Then, the royal Dharmaputra gives way to wrath and rails against the gods, against Dharma himself. Plagued by the abominable stench, he says to the duta, 'Return to those whose messenger you are. Tell them that I shall not go back to where they are. My presence has brought some comfort to my afflicted brothers and I will remain here with them.'

The celestial messenger returns to the court of the king of the Devas, Indra of a hundred sacrifices, and tells him what Yudhishtira did and said. Indeed, O ruler of men, he spares no detail of all that Dharma's son said!"

CANTO 3

Vaisampayana said, “Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, son of Pritha, has not remained in that hell for more than a moment when, all the Devas with Indra at their head arrive there, O Kurusottama, including Dharma Deva in his embodied form. As soon as those resplendent deities of sanctified and noble deeds appear, the darkness shrouding the place is dispelled. The tortured cries of sinners are silenced.

The river Vaitarani, the thorny Salmali, the frightful cauldrons and boulders of iron, all vanish entirely. The repulsive dismembered corpses disappear. A delicious breeze, laden with heavenly fragrances, pure and cool, O Bhaarata, blows there now with the presence of the Gods.

The Maruts, with Indra, the Vasus with the twin Aswins, the Sadhyas, the Rudras, the Adityas, and the other inhabitants of Swarga, along with the Siddhas and the great Rishis, all throng the place where Dharma’s royal son of great tejas stands.

Indra of blazing glory comforts Yudhishtira: ‘Come, O Dharmaputra, Mahabaho, come, O Lord of men. The dark illusions are ended, O mighty one. You have now attained to final success, and eternal realms of felicity have become yours. Do not give in to anger, Yudhishtira—listen to me. Every king must of necessity witness and experience hell. Of both good and evil, there is abundance past reckoning. He who first enjoys the heavenly fruits of his good deeds must inexorably endure hell, when his punya is exhausted. On the other hand, he who first suffers Naraka, will later find Swarga without end. He whose sins are many enjoys heaven first, and then falls into hell.

It is for this, O King, and wishing your weal, that I first sent you to first taste hell. Once, on Kurukshetra, you deceived your Acharya Drona by affirming that his son Aswatthama was dead. It was for that untruth that you were shown hell. Like you, Bhima and Arjuna, and Draupadi, all have been shown the place of sinners briefly, each for their own sins. O Lord of men, through that experience of horror, they have all been purged of their sins, as have all the kings and Kshatriyas who fought for and died during the great war. All of them are now in Swarga after their short tenure in darkness.

Come now, and see them, O Bharatottama. Karna, mighty bowman, greatest of all wielders of weapons, for whom you grieve so sorely, has found the highest honour and bliss. Come, mighty Yudhishtira, and look at that radiant son of Surya. He is now in a station of his own. Kill this grief of yours, and behold your brothers and all the other noble kings who espoused your cause. They have all attained to their rightful places of lustrous felicity.

Let the fever of your heart be dispelled, O son of the Kurus. Having endured a little torment first, abide with me from now on in joy, divested entirely of grief, all your sickness of heart dispelled. Enjoy the rewards of all your deeds of righteousness, O King, those realms of bliss that you have earned through your tapasya and all the daana that you have given so abundantly.

Let Devas and Gandharvas, and celestial Apsaras, clad in wondrous raiment and adorned with splendid ornaments, wait upon you and serve you. Do you, now, Mahabaho, enjoy those worlds of splendour and majesty which have become yours by virtue of the Rajasuya yagna you performed, whose fruit has been enhanced by the blade of sacrifice and truth which you wielded as king of the Kurus.

Come and enjoy the high fruits of all your penances, for the realms you have earned for yourself, O Yudhishtira, are loftier than those of other kings, O son of Pritha, they are equal to those of Harishchandra. Come, sport in bliss where the Rajarishi Mandhatri is, where the great Bhagiratha dwells, why, where Dushyanta's son Bharata is—that is where you will abide in ineffable joy. Look, here is the celestial river sanctifying the three worlds—the Akasa Ganga. Enter her current, Yudhishtira, and you will find yourself in your own realms. Having bathed in this stream, you will be divested of all vestiges of your human, mortal nature. Indeed, you will be free from all conflict, your grief dispelled entire, your ailments all conquered.'

O Janamejaya, after Indra, Lord of the Devas, has said this much to Yudhishtira, the God of Righteousness, Dharma Deva, in his embodied form, addresses the Dharmaputra. 'King of truth, O you of great wisdom, I am highly gratified in you, my son, by your devotion to me, by your truthfulness of speech, your forgiveness and your self-restraint.

That was the third test to which I put you, O son of Pritha. You are indeed incapable, of being swerved from your nature or reason. My first trial of you was in the Dwaita vana, when you came to the lake there to recover a Brahmana's arani twigs. You stood it well. I tested you once more, O son, in the shape of a dog, when your brothers and Draupadi had fallen upon Meru. And this was your final trial, when you, noblest king, said you would remain in Naraka for the sake of your brothers.

Blessed Yudhishtira, you have been purified of all traces of sin. Now be at peace and be happy. Son of Pritha, your brothers were not such as to deserve hell in any way. All that you saw was an illusion created by Indra. Yet every king must once, for certain, behold hell, and for that reason have you briefly been subjected to this torment.

O King, neither Arjuna nor Bhima, neither Sahadeva nor Nakula, and surely not Karna, all of them ever truthful and possessed of courage and valour beyond compare, could deserve to be sent to Naraka for any length of time. The princess Krishnaa too, O Yudhishtira, could never deserve that place of sinners. Come, come, O Bharatottama, greatest of the Bhaaratas, and behold Ganga who flows her sacred currents through the three worlds.'

That Rajarishi, your grandsire, goes with Dharma and all the other gods to the Akasa Ganga and, bathing in her sanctifying waters, ever adored by the Rishis, he casts off his human body. Assuming a celestial form, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja loses all enmity and grief.

Surrounded by the deities, Yudhishtira leaves with his father Dharma, while the greatest Rishis utter his praises. Soon he arrives in a hallowed place where those foremost of men, those heroes, the Pandavas and the Dhartarashtras, all freed from mundane human wrath, have found and enjoy each his own lofty, illustrious status."

CANTO 4

Vaisampayana said, “Thus lauded by the Devas, the Maruts and the Rishis, Yudhishtira comes to where those other great Kurusottamas are. He sees Krishna first, in his true form, that of the Saguna Brahman. Yudhishtira recognizes him in his utmost glory because this Divine Form still resembles that of the Krishna he had known in the world of men. But here the Dark One is adorned with the Sudarshana Chakra and his other weapons, each embodied and terrible. He sees heroic Arjuna, also blazing with lustre and worshipping Krishna. They are Nara-Narayana, being adored by all the Devas. Seeing Yudhishtira, the two greatest of created Beings welcome him with due honour.

In another place, Yudhishtira sees Karna, greatest of all wielders of weapons, as resplendent as a dozen Suryas. Elsewhere, he sees the mighty Bhimasena, who sits in the midst of the Maruts, he, too, shining with a great and divine form of light. Handsome and glorious, he sits beside Vayu, the Wind God, having found his ultimate goal and divine condition. In the quarter of the Aswins, Yudhishtira sees Nakula and Sahadeva, both radiant with their own effulgence.

He sees Panchali, adorned with lotus garlands; having attained grace, she too sits in Swarga dazzling like the sun. Suddenly, Yudhishtira wants to ask her who she really is. Illustrious Indra answers his question. ‘This one is Sree herself. It was for your sake that she was born as the daughter of Drupada, into humankind, issuing not from any mother’s womb, O Yudhishtira, but from the sacred fire. She was created for your delight by the Trishulin, Lord Siva himself. She was born in the race of Drupada and all of you enjoyed her. Look at these five Gandharvas, glowing with the effulgence of flames—they were Draupadi's sons by your brothers and you.

Behold Dhritarashtra, the king of the Gandharvas, possessed of great wisdom. Know that he was born as your father Pandu's elder brother. And this one here is your own eldest brother, the son of Kunti, with the brilliance of fire. The son of Surya, this greatest of men, was known in the world as Radha's son. He now moves in the company of Surya Deva. Look upon him, and be glad.

These resplendent ones here are all Sadhyas, Devas, Viswadevas and Maruts—behold, O King of kings, the mighty Maharathas of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, those heroes among whom Satyaki was foremost, and these others here are the great Bhojas.

And see here the mighty bowman Abhimanyu, Subhadra's son, invincible in battle, who now remains with Soma Deva, the Moon God, of whom he is an amsa. Indeed, he is as softly lambent as the luminary of the night. Here is none other than the mighty bowman Pandu, now united forever with Kunti and Madri. Your sire frequently comes to me in his celestial vimana. Behold the royal Bhishma, son of Santanu, now back in the midst of the Vasus. And recognize this one by the side of Brihaspati as your Acharya Drona.

These and other kings who fought the Great War on your part, O son of Pandu, now all walk with the Gandharvas or Yakshas or other heavenly beings. Some have attained to the status of Guhyakas, O King. Having cast off their mortal bodies, they have conquered Swarga through the punya they acquired through word, thought and deed during their lifetimes.'" Janamejaya said, “Bhishma and Drona, those two Mahatmans; the great King Dhritarashtra; Virata and Drupada, Sankha and Uttara; Dhrishtaketu and Jayatsena and King Satyajit; the sons of Duryodhana, and Sakuni’s son by Subala; Karna’s sons of great prowess; King Jayadratha of the Sindhus; Ghatotkacha and others whom you have not mentioned, heroic kings of burning glory—tell me for what period or time they remained in Heaven. O Dvijottama, was theirs an eternal place in Swarga?

CANTO 5

What was the end attained to by these greatest of men when their karma was exhausted and their lives came to an end? I ask you this eagerly because you see all things through your profound and searing tapasya.”’

Sauti said, ‘Thus questioned, the magnificent Vaisampayana, with leave from his master the Maharishi Vyasa, set himself to answer the king.

Vaisampayana said, “Not everyone, O King of men, can return to his own true condition and nature at the end of his deeds—this is the essence of your deep question, Yudhishtira, and it is a worthy one. Hear, then, O King, about this mystery of the Gods, once discoursed upon by our guru Krishna Dwaipayana, the Island-born son of Parasara Muni, Veda Vyasa of fervid tejas, divine vision and great power, observer of stern austerities, whose understanding is fathomless, who is omniscient, and knows the end of all deeds, lives and karma.

Bhishma of powerful energy and radiance returned to his original state of being a Vasu. You see eight Vasus before you now, O Lord of the Bharata vamsa.

Drona, greatest among the descendants of Angiras, entered into Brihaspati. Hridika's son Kritavarman entered the Maruts. Pradyumna entered the Rishi Sanatkumara, whence he had issued. Dhritarashtra gained the regions, so difficult of acquisition, which belong to Kubera, the Lord of Treasures. The famed Gandhari found the same realms as her husband.

Pandu with both his wives went to Indraloka. Virata, Drupada and King Dhrishtaketu, as well as Nishatha, Akrura, Samba, Bhanukampa and Viduratha, Bhurisravas and Sala, King Bhuri and Kamsa, Ugrasena and Vasudeva, and Uttara, that foremost of princes, with his brother Sankha—all these great ones entered into the being of the Devas.

Soma's own son of great prowess, Varchas of mighty energy, was born as Abhimanyu, the son of Arjuna, that lion among men. Having fought the war in accord with Kshatriya dharma, with valour such as none else had ever been able to show, that mighty-armed and righteous-souled being returned to his originator Soma. Slain on the field of battle, Karna returned to his sire Surya. Sakuni was absorbed into Dwapara, of whom he was an amsa, and Dhrishtadyumna into Agni, from whom he sprang. The sons of Dhritarashtra were all Rakshasas of fierce might. Sanctified by death through weapons, those Mahatmans of prosperity all succeeded in attaining Swarga.

Both Vidura, the Kshattri, and Yudhishtira entered into Dharma Deva, the God of Righteousness. The holy and most illustrious Ananta, born as Balarama, left the world of men and went back into sacred Patala, the world below Bhumi, where by the command of Brahma, the Grandsire of Creation, he supported the Earth through his Yoga shakti. Vasudeva was an amsa of that Eternal God of gods, the Devadeva called Narayana. Accordingly, he entered into Narayana.

Sixteen thousand women had been Krishna's wives in Dwaravati. When the time came, O Janamejaya, they committed jalasamadhi in the Saraswati. Casting off their human bodies, they returned to Swarga. Transformed again into the Apsaras they had always been, they went back into the presence of Vasudeva.

Those most mighty Maharathas, Ghatotkacha and others who were slain in the Great War, returned to the condition of Devas or Yakshas. Those who fought on the side of Duryodhana are said to have been Rakshasas. Gradually, O King, they have all attained to exalted regions of felicity.

Some of them have attained to the abode of Indra, some to that of Kubera of great intellect, and some to that of Varuna of the deeps.

I have now recounted, O you of grand majesty, everything about the deeds and ends of both the Kurus and the Pandavas, O Bhaarata."'

Sauti said, 'Hearing this greatest of Itihasas, the Mahabharata, O Dvijottamas, King Janamejaya was filled with wonder and reverence. His sacrificial priests then finished the remaining rites. Astika was filled with rejoicing at having rescued the Nagas. King Janamejaya then gratified all the Brahmanas at his Sarpa yagna with copious gifts and returned from Takshasila to the city named after the elephant. Those learned Brahmanas, thus worshipped by the king, returned, each to his own home and asrama.

I have now told you everything that Vaisampayana narrated, at the command of his master Vyasa, to the king at his snake sacrifice.

Called an Itihasa, a history, this Mahabharata is sacred, sanctifying and without peer. It was composed, O Brahmana, by the Maharishi Krishna Dwaipayana of truthful speech. He is omniscient, conversant with all the sacred ordinances, possessed of knowledge of all dharma, endowed with piety, capable of perceiving what is beyond the ken of the senses, pure of soul, having been cleansed by tapasya, possessed of the six highest attributes, and devoted to Sankhya Yoga. He composed this great Epic, seeing it all with divine and mystic vision purified and strengthened by the sacred lore.

Vyasa did this wishing to spread the fame, throughout the world, of the Mahatman Pandavas, as well as of all the other Kshatriyas prodigiously rich in tejas. The learned man who recites this history on sacred days in the midst of an attentive audience is exorcised of every sin, conquers Swarga and attains to the Brahman. Anyone who listens with rapt attention to the narration of the whole of this, the fourth Veda, composed by the Island-born Krishna, will be cleansed of a million sins, even the gravest ones such as Brahmahatya, the killing of a Brahmana.

Even a small portion of this Itihasa recited at a sraddha ceremony obtains inexhaustible sustenance for the Pitris of one who recounts it. The sins that one commits during the day with one's senses or mind are all expiated before evening by reciting a portion of the Mahabharata. Whatever sins a Brahmana may commit at night with women are set at naught before dawn by reciting a portion of the Mahabharata.

The exalted Bharata vamsa is the subject of this matchless Epic. Hence it is called the Bharata. And because of its profound import, it is called the Mahabharata. He who is versed in interpretations of this great treatise is rid of his every sin. Such a man lives in dharma, artha and kama, and attains to mukti also, O Lord of the Bhaarata vamsa.

That which is found in this Itihasa occurs everywhere, and that which is not found here can be found nowhere else. This Itihasa among itihasas is also known by the name Jaya. It should be heard by all who desire moksha. It should be read by Brahmanas, by Kshatriyas and by women quick with children, so that he who desires Swarga attains to Heaven, he that wishes for mastery reaps victory, and the pregnant woman obtains a godsend for a child.

The puissant Island-born Krishna, who is Mukti incarnate, and who will never have to return to this samsara, was impelled to further the cause of dharma in this world; thus did he compose the Mahabharata, as I have recounted to you. He created another, altogether vaster Mahabharata, containing sixty lakhs of verses. Thirty lakhs of these were given in Devaloka, where the Gods dwell. In Pitriloka, realm of the manes, a Mahabharata of fifteen hundred thousand slokas is current, while in the realm of the Yakshas a Bharata of fourteen lakhs is in usage. The Mahabharata that exists in the world of men is the one with a hundred thousand slokas.

Narada recited the Mahabharata to the Devas; Asita-Devala to the Pitris; Suka to the Rakshasas and the Yakshas; and Vaisampayana to Manavas, human beings. This Itihasa is sacred and of high import, and regarded as equal to the Vedas. The man who hears this Itihasa in front of a Brahmana, O Saunaka, acquires both fame and the fruition of all his wishes. He who with earnest attention listens to a recitation of the Mahabharata attains to high success, through the punya attached to understanding even a very small portion of this Jaya. All sins are dissolved of one who recites or listens to this Itihasa with devotion.

In former times, the great Rishi Vyasa, having composed this treatise, caused his son Suka to recite it with him, along with these four slokas: Thousands of mothers and fathers, and hundreds of sons and wives constantly enter the world and depart from it. Others too will arise and depart. There are thousands of occasions for joy and hundreds of occasions for fear. These affect only one that is ignorant, never one that is wise. With upraised arms I cry this aloud, but nobody hears me.

From dharma comes artha, as well as kama. Why should not dharma, therefore, be courted? For neither pleasure, nor fear, nor greed, should anyone abandon dharma. Indeed, not for the sake of life itself should one forsake holy dharma. Dharma is eternal. Pleasure and pain are not eternal. The Jiva is eternal, although the Jiva being invested with a body is not.

That man who, waking at dawn, reads this essential Savitri of the Bharata, acquires all the rewards attached to a full recitation of this Itihasa and ultimately attains to the highest Brahman. As the sacred Ocean and the Himavat mountain are both regarded as vast repositories of precious jewels, even so is this Mahabharata considered a treasure trove.

The man of learning who recites this veritable Veda or Agama composed by the Sage earns wealth. There is no doubt that he who, with rapt attention, recites this Epic of the Bhaaratas, attains to high success. What need has that man of a sprinkling of the waters of Pushkara who attentively listens to the Mahabharata? This Itihasa is verily the nectar, the Amrita that fell from the lips of the Island-born. It is immeasurable, sacred, sanctifying, sin-cleansing and auspicious.

CANTO 6

Janamejaya said, "O Holy One, what rites should the learned observe listening to the Mahabharata? What fruits are to be gained by hearing it? What deities are to be worshipped during the several paranas? What should be the gifts that one should make, great Vaisampayana, at every parva or sacred day of the narration? Who is qualified to recite the Mahabharata? Answer me!"

Vaisampayana said, "Attend, O King, to what the method is, and what the fruits are, O Bhaarata, that will spring from listening to a recitation of the Mahabharata. This, O King of kings, is indeed what you have asked me.

The Mahabharata narrates the births of Rishis and Devas into the world, this Bhumi. The Devas of Heaven, O Bhumipala, came to this world for their sport and, having achieved their task, they returned once more to Swarga. In this treatise called Bharata, O foremost one of Bhaarata's race, you will find gathered in a single space the eternal Rudras, the Sadhyas, and the Viswadevas; the Adityas, the two Aswin Kumaras, the Lokapalas, regents of the world, the Devarishis, the Guhyakas, the Gandharvas, the Nagas, the Vidyadharas, the Siddhas, the diverse Devas, the Self-born Brahman incarnate, as well as countless other Maharishis; the Hills and Mountains, Oceans and Seas and Rivers, the diverse tribes of Apsaras; the Planets, the Years, the Half-years, and the Seasons; and the whole universe of mobile and immobile beings, with all the Devas and Asuras.

Harkening to their eminence, and the recitation of their names and achievements, even one who has committed the most terrible sins will be purified. When, with a concentrated soul and cleansed body, one has duly listened to the entire Itihasa, from beginning to end, one should make sraddha offerings, O Bhaarata, unto all those foremost of men and Gods and sages who have been mentioned in it.

To the Brahmanas also, Lord of the Bharata vamsa, with due devotion and according to one's ability and power, let generous gifts and diverse kinds of jewels and ornaments be given, and kine, and vessels of white brass for milking cows, and maidens decked with every ornament, and possessed of every accomplishment suited to kama, enjoyment, as well as diverse kinds of carriages and other conveyances, opulent mansions, plots of land and the finest cloths.

Animals also should be given, such as horses and elephants in musth, and beds of great comfort, and covered palanquins borne on the shoulders of strong men, and well-adorned and equipped chariots. Whatever valuable and beautiful articles are found in a goodly home, whatever wealth you have, should be given away to Brahmanas. Indeed, one should give away one's own self, wives and children!

One who wants to hear the Mahabharata should listen to it without a doubting heart, with cheerfulness and joy; and as he listens to its narration, he should, according to the extent of his means, make gifts with great devotion.

Listen to how a sincere man, devoted to dharma, who is self-restrained, pure in mind, and has a way of life conducive to purity, who is endowed with faith and who has subjugated anger, attains to success in the matter of a recitation of the Bharata.

He should appoint as narrator one who is pure of body and body, whose life and conduct are pious and impeccable, who has complete mastery over his passions and is cleansed of all his sins, who is conversant with every branch of learning, who has full faith, who is free from malice, handsome and radiant in appearance and robed in white, self-restrained, truthful, and beloved of all for the gifts he makes and the honours which he receives wherever he goes.

The Suta, seated at his ease, free from all bodily disorders, with rapt attention must recite the text at an even pace, neither too slowly nor too fast, without straining his voice—effortlessly and calmly, yet sonorously and energetically, never confusing the words and couplets, with diction and intonation rendering all the sixty-three letters of the alphabet clearly and flawlessly, from the eight places of their utterance.

Bowing unto Narayana, and to Nara, that foremost of Purushas, as well as to the Devi Sarasvati, the spirit of Jaya should be first of all invoked.

Listening to the Bharata, O King, narrated by a Pauranika of such excellence the listener, keeping all vratas after the initiatory rites of purification, acquires the most valuable fruits, both material and spiritual.

On reaching the first Parana, the end of the first division of the narrative, the hearer should gratify Brahmanas with every manner of desirable gift. By doing this, he obtains the fruits of an Agnistoma yagna. He acquires a large celestial vimana, full of diverse orders of Apsaras who wait upon him. With his heart rapt in felicity and bliss, and with the Devas for company, he flies to Devaloka.

When the second Parana is reached, the hearer acquires the fruits of the Atiratra vrata. He gains a vimana made entirely of precious gemstones. Wearing celestial garlands and robes, and anointed with unguents exuding a heavenly fragrance, he receives high honour in Swarga.

When the third Parana is reached, he acquires the fruits of the Dwadasha vrata. Indeed, he dwells in Swarga for countless years, like a god himself.

At the fourth Parana he acquires the fruits of the Vajapeya yagna. At the fifth, twice those fruits are his. Ascending a vimana that resembles the rising sun or a blazing fire, and with the Devas for his companions, he goes into Swarga and sports in great bliss for an untold number of years in Indra's very halls.

At the sixth Parana, twice, and at the seventh, thrice those rewards become his. Ascending a celestial chariot that resembles the summit of the Kailasa mountains in beauty and grandeur, which has a vedi, an altar, made of stones of lapis lazuli and other incomparable gemstones, with diverse objects of unearthly beauty all around, adorned with corals and other great and priceless stones, which flies at the will of the rider and is thronged with attentive Apsaras, he ranges through all the lokas of utmost felicity, like a second Surya.

At the eighth Parana, he acquires the fruits of the Rajasuya yagna. He gains a vimana as lambent as the rising moon, to which are yoked steeds white as the rays of the moon and with the speed of thought. He is served by women of surpassing beauty, with faces more enchanting than the moon. He hears the music of the girdles that encircle their hips and the nupuras around their ankles. Sleeping with his head on the laps of such women of transcendent beauty, he awakes profoundly refreshed.

At the ninth Parana, he acquires, O Bhaarata, the fruits of that greatest of all sacrifices, the Aswamedha yagna. Flying into Swarga in an even more splendid vimana, with a grand chamber covered with a canopy supported by columns of gold, furnished with a throne made of the purest lapis lazuli, with windows on all sides framed with pure gold, and attended by throngs of Apsaras, Gandharvas and other celestials, he blazes forth in splendour. Clad in divine garlands and robes, and adorned with celestial pastes, he sports in bliss, the gods his companions, like a Deva himself.

Reaching the tenth Parana and gratifying Brahmanas, he gains a vimana fit for the dwelling of the most righteous, tinkling with innumerable bells and decked with flags and banners, furnished with a throne of precious gems with arches of lapis lazuli encased in nets of filigreed gold, with turrets of coral, and accompanied by Gandharvas and Apsaras skilled in singing and dancing. Crowned with a diadem the colour of fire, adorned with ornaments of gold, anointed with celestial sandalwood paste, draped in garlands made from unfading flowers plucked from the Nandana, he roves through all realms of Heaven, enjoying every transcendent pleasure and resplendent in person by the grace of the Devas.

Thus accoutred and blessed, he receives high honour in Swarga for many long years. With Gandharvas in his company, for full twenty-one thousand years of the Devas, he sports in utmost bliss with Indra himself in the palace of Sakra. He ranges at his pleasure through the countless lokas of the Gods, riding on wondrous chariots and magnificent carriages, and surrounded by Apsaras of surpassing beauty.

He is able to travel to the abode of Surya Deva, of Soma, and even of Siva, O king. Indeed, he comes to Vishnuloka and spends his time with Narayana himself! A person listening with faith becomes even so, O monarch, do not doubt it. I was told this by my guru Vyasa.

Upon the Suta who recites the Mahabharata, the listener must bestow everything that he might wish for—elephants and horses, chariots and carriages, and vehicles drawn by animals, a bracelet of gold, a pair of earrings, sacred threads, beautiful robes and perfumes. By worshipping as a God one who recounts the Mahabharata, one attains to the realm of Vishnu.

Now I will tell you about what should be given away to Brahmanas, as each Parva is arrived at of the Mahabharata during its recitation, after ascertaining their birth, country, truthfulness as well as their greatness and devotion; and to Kshatriyas, too, O King, after similar ascertainment of their origins, qualities and greatness.

The actual recitation should commence after the Brahmanas have been prompted to utter the prescribed blessings. When a Parva is finished, the Brahmanas should be worshipped to the best of one's capacity. At first, the narrator, the Suta, clad in fine robes and anointed with fragrant sandalwood paste, should be duly fed with honey and payasa of the best kind, O King.

When the Astika Parva is being recited, Brahmanas should be entertained with fruits and roots, payasa, honey and ghee, and rice boiled with raw sugar.

When the Sabha Parva is being recited, Brahmanas should be fed havishya along with apupas and pupas and modakas, O Rajan.

While the Aranyaka Parva is being recited, Brahmanas should be fed with fruits and roots.

When the Arani Parva is reached, waterpots full of water should be given away. Many superior kinds of food, rice and fruits and roots, and a variety of other delicacies should be given to the Brahmanas.

During the recitation of the Virata Parva, O Lord of the Bharatas, diverse kinds of robes should be given away; and during that of the Udyoga Parva, the Dvijas, adorned with perfumes and garlands, should again be entertained with food of the finest flavour.

During the recitation of the Bhishma Parva, O King of kings, after the Brahmanas have been given fine chariots and conveyances, they should be fed the purest and best sattvik fare.

During the Drona Parva, again, food of the most superior kind must be given to learned Brahmanas, as well as choice beds and mattresses, bows and fine swords.

During the recitation of the Karna Parva, also, food of the foremost sort, always pure and delicious, should be given by the grihasta with a rapt mind to the Brahmanas present.

During the recitation of the Shalya Parva, Rajadhiraja, more fine dishes, along with the finest sweets and rice payasa boiled with raw sugar, as well as cakes of wheat and other soothing and nutritious food and drink should be served.

During the recitation of the Gada Parva, Brahmanas should be entertained with food mixed with mudga.

During the recitation of the Stri Parva, the foremost of Brahmanas must be gifted precious jewels and gemstones; during the recitation of the Astika Parva, rice boiled in ghee should be served first, and then more pure and excellently prepared dishes, of both superlative taste and nutrition.

During the recitation of the Shanti Parva, the Brahmanas should be fed with havishya.

When the Aswamedhika Parva is reached, again fine fare is served; and when the Asramavasika is reached, the Brahmanas should be entertained with havishya.

When the Mausala is arrived at, superb perfumes and the garlands should be given.

During the Mahaprasthanika, similar presents should be made, agreeable and gratifying in every way.

When the Swarga Parva is reached, the Brahmanas should be fed with havishya.

Upon the conclusion of the Harivamsa, a thousand Brahmanas should be fed generously. Each of them should be gifted with a cow and a fair amount of gold. Half of this same offering, apart from the cow, should be given to every poor man who comes to the grand narration of the Mahabharata, O King.

Upon the conclusion of all the Parvas, the grihasta of wisdom should give to the Suta a copy of the Mahabharata with a bar of gold. When the Harivamsa Parva is being recited, Brahmanas should be fed with payasa at each successive Parana. Having finished all the Parvas, one versed in the Shastras, robing himself in white, wearing garlands, decked with ornaments, and properly purified, should place a copy of the Mahabharata in an auspicious spot and cover it with a piece of silken cloth and worship it, according to the prescribed rites, with perfumes and garlands, offering each at a time.

Indeed, O King, the several volumes of this Itihasa should be worshipped by one with devotion and concentration. Offerings should be made to them of diverse kinds of food and flowers and drinks and various other auspicious articles of enjoyment. Gold and other precious metals should be given as dakshina.

The names should be taken of all the Devas, and of Nara and Narayana. Then, the bodies of some great Brahmanas should be touched with perfumes and their persons adorned with garlands, and they should be gratified with a myriad fine and valuable gifts. By doing this, one attains to the punya of the Atiratra yagna. Indeed, at each successive Parva, the one who causes the Mahabharata to be read acquires the merits that attach to the performance of a great sacrifice.

The one who recites the sacred Itihasa, O Lord of the Bharatas, should be possessed of learning and blessed with a good voice and clear and proficient diction and intonation of both letters and words. Only such a man should recite the incomparable Bharata.

After entertaining a number of the best Brahmanas, gifts should be given to them according to the ordinances of the Shastras. The reciter also, O Bhaarata, should be decked with the finest ornaments and fed sumptuously. By gratifying the reciter, the Grihasta attains to a lofty and auspicious contentment.

If the Brahmanas are gratified, all the deities are gratified. After this is done, O King of the Bharatas, Brahmanas should be duly entertained with diverse kinds of items of enjoyments and other exclusive and superior things.

And so, in answer to your questions, I have told you of all the laws, Purushottama, for the narration of the Mahabharata of Krishna Dwaipayana Vyasa. You must observe them with devotion. In listening to a recitation of the Bharata and at each Parana, O best of kings, he that wishes to attain to the highest good should listen with the greatest care and attention.

One should listen to the Bharata daily and proclaim its merits. One in whose house the Bharata is found has in his hands all those scriptures known by the name of Jaya. The Bharata is cleansing and sacred. In it diverse subjects can be found. The Bharata is worshipped by the very gods. It is the highest goal and the foremost of all scriptures. One attains to Mukti, the final Emancipation, through the Bharata. This that I tell you is certain truth. He that proclaims the merits of this Itihasa called the Mahabharata, of the Earth, of the cow, of Saraswati, of Brahmanas and of Krishna, has never to languish in dolour.

In the Vedas, in the Ramayana, and in the sacred Bharata, O Lord of the Bhaarata vamsa, Hari is sung in the beginning, the middle and at the end. Men who want to attain to the highest goal should listen to that which has the most excellent pronouncements relating to Vishnu, and the eternal Srutis. This scripture is sanctifying, the highest treatise on dharma, and endued with every merit. Indeed, one who wishes for true prosperity should listen to it fervently.

Sins committed by the body, through words, and by the mind, are all destroyed through listening to the Bharata, even as darkness is banished at sunrise. Through this Mahabharata one devoted to Vishnu acquires that punya gained by listening to the eighteen Puranas. There is no doubt of this.

Through listening to the Bharata, both men and women attain to the very condition of Vishnu Narayana. Women who wish for children should certainly listen to this holy work which proclaims the fame of Vishnu. One who wishes to attain to the fruits that attach to a recitation of the Bharata should, according to his or her means, give dakshina and gold to the Suta who recites it. One who wants his own weal should give to the reciter a Kapila cow with horns cased in gold, accompanied by her calf covered with a rich cloth.

Ornaments for the arms and for the ears should be given. Besides these, other kinds of wealth should be gifted, as should generous lands. There is no gift like that of land, nor will there be.

The man who listens to the Mahabharata with devotion, or he that tells it to others, becomes cleansed of all his sins and attains at last to the very condition and status of Vishnu. Such a man redeems his ancestors to the eleventh generation, O King of the Bharata vamsa, as well as himself with his wives and sons.

After concluding a recitation of the Bharata, one should perform a Homa with all its ten angas."

Vaisampayana said, "I have thus in your presence, O Lord of men, recounted in its entirety the Mahabharata of my Guru Krishna Dwaipayana Vyasa.

He that listens with devotion to this Bharata from the beginning is purified of every sin, even if he be guilty of Brahmahatya or the violation of his guru's bed, or even if he be a drinker of alcohol or a thief, or even if he be born a Chandala. Destroying all his sins as the maker of day destroys darkness, such a man, beyond doubt, sports in felicity and bliss in the world of Vishnu, verily like Vishnu himself."

The end of the Swargarohanika Parva

The eighteen Parvas of the Mahabharata are thus complete.
